The play is set in New York City, during a particularly warm summer. As a result, the streets are hot, tempers are short, and people are dying. The City is tearing itself apart and, in particular, the focus is on one building where both young renters and old-timers live. This building is coming down and threatens to destroy the neighborhood.

Robyn, the main character is a one-time stripper trying to clean up her act and build a new life. She wants to leave, but first she must find her father, an old man living in an urban cave. They are mutually searching for one another but lost in the crumbling city.

Professor Kaplan is a faculty member of the Smith theatre department for acting and directing. She was a Fulbright Scholar in Costa Rica in 1990 where she directed and taught theatre. She was also a Fulbright Artist-in-Residence in Hong Kong.

As an actress and director she has performed internationally and all over the United States. Most recently she has appeared in "Afterlives", a performance piece at the Lower East Side Tenement Museum in New York, "Liturgies" at the Fifth International Theatre Festival in Jerusalem, Israel, and as Gloucester in Company of Women's "King Lear" at Smith College.

Her plays have been performed in Europe as well at the United States.

Kaplan is also a video documentary producer and has recently finished work on "Mixed Blessings: Voices on the Margin". She also produced a CD-ROM about Mexican author Juan Rulfo. Awkward comedian way that Stephen Wright or Brian Posehn are. He is just goofy and manages to make jokes that are mostly clean by today's standards, yet still funny.

There are some occasionally edgy jokes about his Catholic upbringing, going to a Catholic college (where condoms are not sold) and his parents getting pornographic material on their computer. What's more awkward than that?

He occasionally takes shots at President Bush, but at this point that is no longer edgy or divisive. On Bush's characteristic snicker: "[Bush] laughs when he doesn't get it, and... that's why we're all going to die."

On Fox News: "At least with Fox News, you know it's not true. It's like solving a murder mystery: if that didn't happen, [that narrows it down,] then what did?"

On college: "[College is] where dorks go to have sex with other dorks. It's like a dork mating service."

Surprisingly, Birbiglia was not the class clown growing up. "The class clown was always a little mean. He'd just walk into a room and say 'you're fat' or 'you're gay!' And I was a little fat and a little gay, so [that really hurt.]...[Instead,] I was always the kid that stuff happened to."

Birbiglia walks a fine line of self-deprecation, and he pulls it off. It is far too easy to overdo self-mockery and self-loathing. Birbiglia does not seek pity or compassion. Instead he treats the audience like a bunch of new friends, which they become by the end of his performance.

His act is remarkably well-crafted and full of references to previous jokes. Before listening to the CD, you probably never laughed at the phrase "Joes Bag-of-Donuts" or "I'm in the future also," but you will Birbiglia says it. It's as if all his jokes are just one long joke, which is a sign of a true comedic craftsman.

His awkwardness is his best asset. Some examples are tales of offending Roger Clemens, journalists, charity golfers, having to urinate on stage and unintentionally insulting blind people.

Birbiglia's style of comedic storytelling comes from a recommendation by his therapist, which undoubtedly influenced his style. None of the stories have happy endings, just funny, embarrassing or otherwise weird ones. While many popular comedians do this, Birbiglia's stories cover unbeaten ground, a major asset which makes him and his act unique.

The best part about Birbiglia is that he generally shuns the hackneyed, played out tropes of today's comedy. He doesn't show off about getting beaten by his parents as a child, he doesn't compare black people and white people while mocking both, he doesn't disrespect women.

While Birbiglia is not perfect, he is about as far from Carlos Mencia as you can get. Unfortunately, that is one reason why Birbiglia will probably never get his own show; how do you market a likeable guy as a comedian?

Most comedians seem to have more issues than Time Magazine, but Birbiglia comes off as normal and fun, even while talking about his therapist. Many of his fans feel it is a shame that he does not get the recognition many believe he deserves, largely because it's so hard to pronounce his name. In his act, he recalls being introduced and advertized as "Bahooski," and "Biggleby."

So maybe the reason he's not such a big name is because his name is just too big. For now, the Massachusetts native will have to remain underappreciated, underpaid and hilarious.

University. Bues has performed as an improvisational comedian across the U.S.

In the past she taught the "Harold" method as a workshop at Smith. The Harold was popularized by the improvisational games on the television show "Who's Line Is It Anyways?" Actors perform a series of scenes that are all connected by a general theme.

The "Harold" method was created in the 60s by Del Close, director at Second City in Chicago where numerous heavyweight comedians like Stephen Colbert, Amy Sedaris, Paul Dinello, Steve Carell, Bill Murray, Mike Meyers and Tiny Fey also attended. Bues studied with Del Close and performed the "Harold" comedy method at his Chicago Company Improv Olympics.

"Soul of the City" starts at 8 p.m. and is free. However tickets are on a first come, first served basis so get there early.

to market cereals to little children. Lately I've noticed that they are ...intense creatures," he added, suggesting that the Iris Rabbit would eventually stage a massacre due to his inability to be accepted by cereal-eating children. Other animated targets were the hexagonal Honeycombs dude and the Quaker Oats man, who Szajgin hypothesized, was engaging in inappropriate manual activity on the cereal's logo.

Although Szajgin performed second to last, no hilarious humor would sway the crowd's poker chip votes from Ryan and Harrington, who have performed together since their Braintree High School days in the band Grilling Wilson.

Ryan's moving vocals on the closer, "She Was My Baby" was enough to make even the stone-faced fashion police in the crowd forgive his Doug Funnie sweater vest faux pas. Meanwhile, Hamilton's melodically flawless guitar solo transcended the piece, aiding lyrics like, "Well, you did not win today."

While winning was in fact in the cards for Braintree's freshmen phenoms, it was Szajgin who reaped immediate financial rewards. With Journey's "Don't Stop Believin" blaring through the Blue Wall speakers, a final tabulation of votes and spare change revealed multiple champions. "Adam," the emcee announced. "You made $1.90."

Additionally, the University Dancers will perform choreographed works by Billboh Brown, a nationally recognized figure known for his work on television commercials and his abilities to educate as a professor both domestically and abroad. The skilled group of dancers will provide a welcome visual element to the showcase, accompanying the overwhelming depth of musical performances.

Other performing groups include the University's acclaimed Orchestra & Wind Ensemble and the Symphony Band, both under the guide of Laura Resvoth. In addition MASS Marimba Band and UMass Marimba Ensemble will also be performing, providing a taste of West African and Central American culture and instrumentation to the crowd.

Win streak on line on road

against such a talented team, one misstep can lead to a goal. Teams like SLU do not miss opportunities when they get them.

"We've got to stay behind the ball and make sure that we stay focused," Koch said. "We want to take away the space behind us and make sure that they don't have the space to move around in our defensive third."

The Billikens have been equally impressive on the defensive side of the ball, allowing more than a goal once. In their first two conference games, SLU defeated Duquesne and St. Bonaventure, 1-0. SLU was on the road for both games. After its matchup with UMass, the Billikens take on Rhode Island in a rematch of last season's A-10 Championship game which URI won, 2-0.

On the field, neither team can show UMass something it hasn't seen before. But the atmosphere will certainly be something different for the Minutemen. SLU's Robert R. Hermann Stadium holds more than 6,000 people. Koch expects most seats filled for tomorrow's 7 p.m. kickoff.

The second half of the matchup with SLU will test the Minutemen. Both teams do most of their scoring in the second frame and rely on solid defense late to preserve leads. Junior Prince Ofosu, who missed last Sunday's match with Xavier due to an ankle injury, has the skill set that may allow for the type of break UMass needs to score against such a talented SLU defense. At some point, the Billikens will test the UMass defense with a barrage of shots. Ofosu's speed makes him a target on the counterattack and although UMass hasn't consistently converted these chances into goals, Ofosu can break out at any point in time.

Freshman forward Stuart Amick and sophomore midfielder Mark DeSantis enter this weekend looking to continue their recent individual hot streaks. Amick is tied for the team lead in goals with three including the game-winner in the win over Xavier. He also scored the decisive goal in the Sept. 29 win over Boston University.

After scoring the first two goals of his career in last Friday's win over Dayton, DeSantis assisted on Amick's game-winner on Sunday.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

Junior Prince Ofosu has one goal and one assist this season for the Minutemen. He has appeared in all 11 games, starting in six of them.

Team's depth to be tested

ter recruiting classes.

Leading the Rams in scoring is junior Katie Sanchez, with 11 points (four goals, three assists). Junior forward Kim Boulous is the top scorer with five goals.

"Their priority is that they are going to outscore you. They haven't scored a lot of goals but they haven't let them up either," Rudy said. "Boulous is small and quicker, just a real fast kid."

The Rams play in a different and better facility and Rudy said that has enabled them to recruit and attract better players to the team. The Rams have run off three straight victories, but it has been against opponents toward the bottom of the A-10.

The Minutewomen will also host La Salle (8-6-0, 2-3 A-10) Sunday. They lead the all-time series, 6-4. La Salle beat the Minutewomen last season, 3-1.

"They have a lot of kids that have scored goals for them this year," Rudy said.

Explorers senior forward Kristin Hextall leads the team in scoring with 22 points (nine goals, four assists). Hextall is the daughter of former Philadelphia Flyer goaltender Ron Hextall.

"She's tearing it up this year," Rudy said. "She's had three game-winners already."

Sophomore Christina Adams replaced Stoll last game and will play in her place this weekend. Rudy has been working her hard this week to get her used to playing a 90-minute game.

"We've tried to establish a link between her and [senior forward] Britt [Canfield]," Rudy said. "I didn't let her take too many breaks, when she'd lose the ball I wanted her immediately cracking back and playing defense."

Steve Games can be reached at sgames@student.umass.edu.

Sophomore Christina Adams replaced the injured Sydney Stoll in last Thursday's loss to Rhode Island, registering a goal and an assist.

man year she saw action in 17 games and registered one goal and one assist. The second-highest scorer is Katie Sanchez, who has accumulated four goals and three assists for 11 points this season.

"That's all the kid does, is score goals," Rudy said. "She hangs around up there (near the net) and when she gets her chances she puts them away. She's got the knack."

With 12 goals, Sanchez was one of the conference's top scorers last year and was selected to the Second Team All-Atlantic 10 and Third Team All-Northeast teams in 2006.

The team's other main scorer is another transfer, this one a front-runner out of UNLV. Erica Frizzell (two goals and an assist) left UNLV before her junior season and has proven a crucial part of the Rams' offensive attack.

"(She's) going to be an interesting player," Rudy said. "(She) has subbed recently but has also started in the majority of their games. I think that gives them a dynamic front-running package."

Rudy said other players on his team will have to watch out for are Alexis Ribadeneyra, Courtney Fedge and Correy Cerrato.

"They lead midfield with five midfielders. They get two kids high and they go at you," he said.

He added that although the Minutewomen will have to face a very physical team – and talented goal scorers like Kristin Hextall, Traci DePasquale and Dana Giordano – in the La Salle Explorers (8-6, 2-3 A-10) Sunday, they must focus on the task at hand.

UMass is five points behind Fordham and tied with La Salle in the A-10 standings and the weekend's matchups will be influential in who plays in the A-10 tournament and who watches it from home.

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

FIELD HOCKEY from page 8

Minutewomen face off with Richmond at Garber Field. The Spiders are only 4-10 on the season, but look to be in prime form to continue their dominance of the A-10. All but one of its wins have come in conference play, and Richmond has won the conference five years in a row.

Its sole loss of the season came against West Chester, and the Spiders certainly won't be looking to lose another game after going undefeated in conference play from 2002-2006.

Sarah Blythe-Wood leads the offensive charge for the Spiders with five goals, and is one of four players on the team with at least four goals. UMass also has four players with at least three goals. After King's seven goals, Katie Kelly, Jaime Boumarrets and Lauren Gillespie are tied for second on the team with three goals apiece.

One problem for Richmond this season has been shots and penalty corners. It has been outshot by opponents, 259-125, while also allowing 101 penalty corners and winning 50.

Motivation should not be a problem for UMass coach Justine Sowry's squad this weekend. In its previous eight meetings over the last five seasons, UMass has been outscored 39-8 by Richmond. The Minutewomen have also been knocked out of the A-10 tournament three times in that span, including in 2004 and 2005 when some current players were on the team. The most recent meeting between the teams resulted in a 5-2 Spider victory back on Oct. 15 of last year.

Sunday is also Senior Day for the Minutewomen. A ceremony before the game will honor Kristina DiRosario, Becky Letourneau, Rachael Mervine, Kara Murphy, Erin O'Brien and Nicole Phelan.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu.

Senior midfielder Kara Murphy has five points this season, scoring one goal and assisting on three others. She had one goal in 20 games in 2006.

Prestigious event headlines rowing season

this point in the course, rowers must make a 90-degree left turn under Weeks Bridge while avoiding other boats, then immediately set up for a 90-degree right turn under another bridge.

Each race begins with every boat in single file leaving DeWolf, staggered every 15 seconds. Their time is recorded until they cross into Herter. The boat with the fastest time for each event is named the "Head of the Charles," for that particular event.

This year, 8,600 participants from 18 different countries with approximately 300,000 spectators are expected to be at the regatta. Needless to say, parking is going to be difficult. This is the world's largest rowing event and one of the major sporting, as well as social, events in the city.

Much like a NASCAR event, many spectators enjoy seeing crews crashing their $12,000 boat into the abutment of any bridge. This adds to the popularity of the Weeks Footbridge location because it is the narrowest and windiest portion of the course and has the most incidents yearly.

The crashes are not the only enjoyment outside of the race. Both sides of the river have events scheduled to complement the race itself. On the Cambridge side of the river there is a concert performance with appearances by reggae artists Toots and the Maytals.

Afterwards guitarist Tim Reynolds, known for playing with Dave Matthews Band, will headline the event. The Boston portion features a tent with booths set up featuring most of the crews, which is known as "Reunion Village."

While people will be coming from near and far for the pleasure of the Regatta, the Minutewomen will arrive in Boston for business in hopes of earning the title, Head of the Charles.

Injuries to test depth of team

UM welcomes Explorers, Rams to Rudd with depleted roster

BY STEVE GAMES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After battling injuries the Massachusetts women's soccer team looks to regroup this weekend against Fordham and La Salle.

The Minutewomen (7-3-1, 2-3 Atlantic 10) are coming off a crushing, 3-2 overtime loss to Rhode Island. In that game they lost sophomore forward Sydney Stoll to a season-ending collarbone injury. Sophomore midfielder Meghan Gould also left the game after suffering a concussion in the first half. Gould has been evaluated each day and UMass coach Jim Rudy said that she will not play this weekend.

"The main thing is going to be playing without Sid," Rudy said. "Then making adjustments with [junior forward Vanessa] Patry's role and also adjusting to playing without Meghan Gould."

Patry played most of the season as a scoring forward, but the injuries have forced her to play mostly in the middle of the field. Rudy does not want to make too many changes to the team because, he said, in some cases it might work, but it can also backfire. The middle of the field is important because they are the first line of defense and they help start the offense and sometimes score long-range goals.

"At this point we don't want to abandon ship and make dramatic changes," Rudy said. "We could make some changes and get [Patry] up a little bit higher, but it might be asking too much.

"There are some adjustments we could do and if they work out, it's like, 'Wow, that was cool, that worked,' and if they don't [it's], 'what the hell are you doing, Terry Francona?'" Rudy joked.

The injury bug has forced Rudy to play more players, and he held two intense practices to help get the fitness level up for the players that do not normally play.

"We had two days off, two days of heavy fitness, another day off and [Wednesday and Thursday] we'll finish up [with] fine tuning," Rudy said.

Billikens, 49ers await scorching Minutemen

The last time the Massachusetts men's soccer team played Saint Louis, the Billikens were No. 9 in the NSCAA/adidas poll. And the Minutemen were at the end of a disappointing season.

Things have changed a little since last Oct. 27 when the Minutemen (7-4-0, 2-0 Atlantic 10) lost, 3-1, to the Billikens in Amherst. SLU still sits in the national top 15, but UMass enters the contest riding a five-game winning streak, and the Billikens (6-1-3, 2-0 A-10) rank No. 12 in the latest NSCAA poll.

UMass has lost its only two meetings with SLU, including a 5-0 massacre the last time the two teams met in SLU in 2005. At that time, however, the Minutemen had lost 5-of-6 games. UMass coach Sam Koch sees the matchup with the Billikens as an important test, but understands the challenge they pose.

"[The Billikens] have a hell of a team. We've got nothing to lose," he said. "We're underdogs going in. It was important to get the points this past weekend and now we're going on this trip to try and get a couple of results with the understanding that we're not favored. But we feel good about the way we're playing and we think we can do it."

The Minutemen head to Charlotte for a matchup with the 49ers after tonight's test in St. Louis. The 49ers (6-5-0, 2-0 A-10) dropped their first two A-10 games last weekend: losing to Duquesne, 2-1, and St. Bonaventure, 3-2.

The 49ers and Billikens possess two of the most prolific offenses in the conference and some of the A-10's best offensive players. SLU junior midfielder Kyle Patterson leads the team with 10 points on four goals and two assists.

Superb defensive play from midfielders propelled UMass on its recent winning streak. Against SLU, junior Mike DeSantis maintained his position and properly anticipated passes made by the Billikens. In a game

Rudy sees change in recruiting against familiar opponents

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's soccer team first squared off against Fordham in 1995. Since then, it has enjoyed a pretty one-sided tradition, with an all-time record of 16-1 against the Rams.

But UMass coach Jim Rudy said that is no indication of how the Minutewomen (7-3-1, 2-3 Atlantic 10) will fare when it hosts Fordham (6-3-3, 3-0-2 A-10) at 3 p.m. today. Fordham finished last season with a 14-7 record, going 6-3 against A-10 foes.

"In the old days we had our way with Fordham. But things have changed," said Rudy. "Last year they had sort of like their miracle season. They had a great run, had some great A-10 results, got into the A-10 tournament and made the final

"Coaches from the A-10 say they're a solid team," he continued. "They come out and they want to go at you and they want to score more goals than you do."

He said that for years, Fordham did not seem to take its women's soccer program very seriously. He said schools obeyed Title IX, a 1972 federal law requiring educational institutions to have policies, practices and programs, such as sports, that do not discriminate based on gender, but did not do much more than that.

Many schools maintained a women's soccer team, but did not put effort into making it successful. This soon changed, however, and Rudy has noticed that Fordham, and other teams in the A-10, boast squads that recently have improved immensely.

Rudy said that for many years Fordham had mediocre records and a dingy field to show its prospects. These inadequate recruitment tools made it hard to garner talent. The Rams now play at the school's football field and have put more energy into recruiting.

It was these improvements that helped Fordham obtain some of the players Rudy has been preparing his team for all week.

The team's leading goal scorer is Kim Boulos. A transfer from South Carolina, she has started eight of Fordham's 12 games, scoring five goals for 10 points.

The junior is producing better results than she ever did with the Gamecocks. Last year she recorded one assist in 20 games. Her fresh-

Freshman defender Alyssa Visconti may see an increased role this weekend for a pair of Atlantic 10 matchups. The Minutewomen have suffered a number of injuries lately, testing the team's depth.

Maroon and White attack prepares for weekend pair

BY MIKE CONNORS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If the Massachusetts field hockey team wants to pick up a pair of conference wins this weekend, it will have to earn one against a Richmond team that had won 44 straight conference games until last Friday.

The Minutewomen (8-7, 3-1 Atlantic 10) have won three of their first four A-10 contests after falling a game under .500 in their first 11 non-conference games.

First up this weekend is a Friday trip to St. Louis. The Billikens (3-13, 1-3 A-10) have struggled all year, especially at home. After winning their first home match against Missouri State on Aug. 28, St. Louis has dropped its other five home contests.

UMass has won all four previous meetings with St. Louis, including a 1-0 victory last year in Amherst.

Though the Billikens have struggled at home, UMass has had its share of difficulty on the road. The Maroon and White have won just three of nine road games, but St. Louis will be one of its easier games if conference record is any indicator.

Goals have come at a premium for the Billikens in 2007. They are averaging less than a goal per contest and have few offensive threats. Forward Molly Boyne and midfielder Jaclyn McGranahan lead the team with four and three goals, respectively.

Teams are generally unsuccessful when the opposition is able to penetrate the defense and shoot at will – this has been St. Louis's problem this year. Goalkeeper Sarah Wasserman has started all 16 games this season and made 157 saves. Unfortunately for Wasserman, the porous Billiken defense has constantly allowed opponents within striking range this year, and 49 shots have gone by the senior.

Cher King and the rest of the UMass goal scorers should be presented with plenty of opportunities. King has seven goals to lead the team, and her high offensive skill set should become evident against the St. Louis defense.

The defense continues to improve its resume as the season progresses. Led by senior captain Erin O'Brien and goalkeeper Becky Letourneau, the Minutewomen are fifth in the country in shutouts per game (0.40) and 10th in team goals-against average, with just over one.

The real challenge of the weekend comes at noon Sunday when the Second home meet ahead for swimmers

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER

The Massachusetts swimming and diving teams compete against Stony Brook today at 2 p.m. in Boyden Gym in its second consecutive home meet.

Last season, UMass got the best of Stony Brook as the men's and women's teams swept the Sea Wolves on the road. The UMass squads combined for 23 first-place finishes out of a possible 32.

The Minutemen return five top-finishers from last year's meet, including senior captain A.J. Vozella.

UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth is pleased that swimmers who made minor miscues last week have focused on those mistakes and learned from them.

"I think that they learned from the situation," Yarworth said. "You can't improve [the mistakes] right away when you're not in competition."

Along with Vozella, senior co-captain Zack Priest has done a good job of leading not only by example but also by instilling the proper mindset in the team.

"Physically, I think that the whole team is going through some tough practices," Priest said. "I think everyone's bummed out about [the loss against BU] but you can't really get too bummed out in October. We've still got a long season to go."

The women's team has undergone an intense change of pace in training as well. The Minutewomen are coming off a meet where the team achieved only one first-place finish. Junior Cecelia Jenkins won the 50-yard freestyle.

Given the outcome of last weekend's meet, women's coach Bob Newcomb put his stroke swimmers through more workouts based on technique and distance. Yet the strength program for all swimmers has remained the same, so as not to slow any other swimmers down.

Newcomb is satisfied with the pace that his new swimmers are going at right now. At this point in the season, he is not expecting numerous wins out of his freshmen, but is expecting that they become smarter and adjust quicker to the pace of collegiate swim meets.

Although Stony Brook has competed in two meets as opposed to the Minutewomen's one meet, Newcomb is excited to see a good matchup.

"I think that we will match up very well with them," Newcomb said. "I think we're also a better team this year so I think that we should do pretty well against [the Seawolves]."

The Minutewomen return six swimmers from last year's meet against Stony Brook, including senior captain Allison Volpe. Last season, Volpe won the 50-yard freestyle race and she performed well against the Terriers last week. She placed third in the 50-yard freestyle and was in the winning line of the 400-yard freestyle relay.

Junior Christa Narus also silenced the Sea Wolves last year with a first-place finish in the 100-yard butterfly. Narus also had a strong performance last week against BU, earning second place in both the 200-yard and 500-yard freestyle events.

The divers have also had good success against Stony Brook. Last year, senior co-captain R.J. Rappe swept the 100- and 300-meter events for the men and will take to New York the success that he had last week versus BU. He placed first in the 100-meter dive and second in the 300-meter.

For the Minutewomen, junior Karen Upperco dominated the boards last season against the Sea Wolves, sweeping both the 100 and 300 meter diving events. Upperco claimed second place in both of those events last week against the Terriers.

Volpe worked hard this week at bettering her time coming off the starting blocks. She is also doing her part as an active captain.

"We have really bonded well as a team so far this year," Volpe said. "I think that we are ready to go for our meet season."

Two officers added to UM police force

BY JENNIFER BERGEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Two new officers have been added to the UMass Amherst Police Department. Mike Williams and Aaron Boesch, both recent graduates from the police academy, have begun their duty after having successfully completed a three-month training program.

Williams, from Westfield State College, and Boesch, also from Westfield but with a master's from the University of Central Florida, were participants in the UMPD cadet program. UMPD Police Chief Barbara O'Connor commented that both officers did a terrific job while members of the program.

The program, founded by O'Connor in 2002, has shaped many officers for later addition to the force. Boesch and Williams are prime examples of two such officers, said O'Connor.

O'Connor started the program with the intention of improving campus safety by producing sufficiently-trained officers to aid in on-campus duties.

"The cadet program acted as our first line of defense...over the course of the program they've called in a number of serious calls," she said.

The program recruits college students who have at least a 2.5 grade point average and pass both a physical examination and an academic test.

Since the launching of the cadet program, many students have benefited by partaking in this organization. Many of the members of the cadet program, like Boesch and Williams, have graduated and gone on to work for police departments such as the Connecticut State Police and the Southwick and Fairfield police departments.

According to O'Connor, the main goal of launching the cadet program was to allow students first-hand experience by working on campus. It is a great opportunity for students and has been proven effective through the success stories of both Officer Williams and Officer Boesch.

"We're proud to have them here, and it speaks well of the cadet program," said Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald. "We're reaping the benefits of our work training young men and women for careers in law enforcement."

Red Sox Nation at the University of Massachusetts Amherst has been known to celebrate whether they win or lose. Last night was no exception, as students gathered in the Southwest residential area following the Red Sox game seven win.

Crowds gathered around 11:45 p.m. shortly after Cleveland Indian Casey Blake flied out to Red Sox center fielder Coco Crisp deep in center field. Cheers and chants were heard all throughout the Southwest residential area, ranging from the classic "Yankees Suck" chant to a crowd of hundreds of people singing Neil Diamond's "Sweet Caroline."

By 12:30 p.m. hundreds of students emerged from their dorm rooms to join in celebrating the victory. At one point the students took a stab at the police force as one student screamed to the crowd, "Whose school?" The crowd responded back, "Our school."

Popular site shut down by University

BY DEVON COURTNEY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Although gambling promotion on college campuses is illegal, one Web site depicted Sam the Minuteman rolling dice and playing cards.

Pressure has emerged from University of Massachusetts officials for UMasspoker.com's moderator, and UMass graduate Brett Burdick, to shut down the site or to face legal action. Currently, the site states on its page that it is "offline."

"We never got any grief over it," Burdick told the Associated Press in an interview. "There's sites just like this all over the country on college campuses."

The site's forum is still functional and the page urges students to register with a username to talk about "what's going on with the site."

The controversy has affected both serious and casual poker players at UMass.

"I really don't know the legality of it," said senior psychology major Dante Ciliberti. "It's probably illegal to gamble on campus."

Senior English major Trenton Bollinger offered another perspective.

"I know people who go to online poker sites for games and info," Bollinger said. "But nobody [at UMass] tells us anything about what's not allowed."

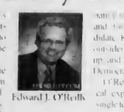
In a brightly-colored, two-story house set back behind a long driveway on North Pleasant Street in Amherst, a University of Massachusetts alumnus and his campaign staff are planning to unseat Massachusetts Senator John Kerry.

Edward J. O'Reilly, a criminal defense attorney and third generation firefighter, opened his western Massachusetts campaign office at 178A North Pleasant Street in downtown Amherst this past Friday, Oct. 19.



"I think that we need to have a western Massachusetts presence," said O'Reilly, citing the concentrated population of progressive Democrats in the Amherst area as a selling point for setting up shop on North Pleasant Street.

He was also drawn by the location's proximity to the University and he said, "I thought that it would be a good idea to involve students."

Although the response from UMass students was limited at the opening of the western Massachusetts campaign office, the O'Reilly campaign hopes that the location's convenience will encourage University students to become active before the 2008 election season.

"I've enjoyed the process of watching him bud as a politician," said Jason Scheer, a UMass senior and self-described independent who works as an intern with Adrian d'Errico, a local filmmaker spearheading media production for the campaign. "I think a lot of people should have the experience of watching a campaign."

Tuchman speaks at Hampshire College

Lecture explores autism and the false fear of epidemic

BY ELIZABETH HAWLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Dr. Roberto Tuchman gave a lecture titled "Autism: What does it mean to be a spectrum disorder?" as a part of the Culture Brain and Development Program, the final installment of the semester on Thursday night at Hampshire College.

Dr. Tuchman is an acclaimed expert in the autism field, a Hampshire graduate and the director of Developmental and Behavioral Neurology at Miami Children's Hospital.

Dr. Tuchman described autism as a disorder historically treated by psychiatrists. As a neurology resident, he said, "when I talked to my fellow residents ... they would say, 'well it's an interesting topic but where's the neurology?'"

It was not until the 1990s, when autism was linked to Rhett's syndrome, that autism was even considered a neurological disorder.

Now, however, he said neurologists are involved in a number of aspects of treating autism; they are coming up with medications and treatments to help autistic children, as well as finding new ways to diagnose autism earlier.

Some researchers are trying to isolate the genes that lead to autism, a feat which is proving difficult, according to Dr. Tuchman, because of autism's status as a spectrum disorder.

"Autism isn't one thing," said Dr. Tuchman.

One child with autism may have trouble holding a conversation, while another may have trouble responding to something another person in the room is doing. Some patients with autism may not exhibit many signs at all.

"There are individuals who fall within the autism spectrum who are better than us," Dr. Tuchman said. "They have a better understanding of what it is to be good."

There are also those patients who can't function in society and suffering from severe aggression and other symptoms which stop them from participating in the world as a "normal" person would. Those are the patients for whom Dr.

Pilfered phones cause trouble

What to do if a cell is stolen

BY LORRAINE BURGOS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Fifty percent of all Americans living in the United States own cell phones, approximately 150,569,970 people, according to Gallup News Service Poll. Sixty-seven percent say that they use their cellular phones everyday. Individuals have become accustomed to having everything from phone numbers and addresses to music and Internet access right at their fingertips.

Being so dependent on this technology, it is easy to see how some lose everything when they lose their cell phones.

It is a common experience when one realizes his cell phone isn't in his back pocket, bag, car or dorm room. Two choices remain: keep looking or cancel the service. The problem is that one face a cancellation fee and a restarting fee, in addition to a regular bill, upon selecting to cancel. Many choose to keep looking and hope to find it, holding off canceling service for as long as possible. When that happens, the risk of letting someone rack up the bill while the owner searches is real. Cell phone owners are responsible for all calls made until the cell phone is reported stolen.

To make a full police report for a stolen cell phone, the owner has to know the service provider and the make, model and serial number on the phone – information most people do not keep in mind.

There are thousands of cell phone thefts weekly. Hundreds of those thousands of victims are shocked to see their next bill come in, drastically more expensive than they are used to paying. Cell phones are a common steal because it is so easy to do it. They're small, can be sold for fifty to one hundred dollars, and can be kept for the thief's personal use. With over 150 million users, the likelihood of a cell phone being left on a couch or table or falling out of a bag is common, as is the likelihood of it being stolen.

"Our customers can access their call history online and call in any fraudulent calls made," said Justin, customer service representative for Verizon Wireless.

Collegian in transition

Last Thursday, the Daily Collegian reported that the Student Government Association discussed an outstanding loan held by the Collegian at their Senate meeting. Since then, the financial stability of this newspaper has been called into question. It is true that the Collegian is facing financial challenges. It is possible that in the future, this paper as we know it may go through some changes. However, I would like to assure our readers that we have taken, and continue to take, the steps necessary to operate as a successful and responsible student business.

In December of 2005, the University decided to pull its annual loan to the Collegian, which had historically allowed the paper to operate in accordance with University payroll standards. Prior to this move, the newspaper received annual bridge loans from the University in order to cover the salaries of two full-time clerical positions. These salaries must be paid up front and are deducted from the Collegian budget at the beginning of each fiscal year, over the summer when the Collegian is not operating.

To avoid shutting down, the Collegian turned to the SGA and requested a 130,000-dollar loan, with the stipulation that the loan would be paid back by the end of that academic year. Unfortunately, the management that year did not make any budget cuts and continued to spend beyond our financial means. When the 2005-2006 academic year came to a close, the Collegian was unable to repay the loan, and requested that the SGA defer payment for another year.

In September of 2006, the Collegian began making budget cuts in order to repay the SGA. However, a drastic decrease in advertising revenue left us well short of our anticipated goal.

This past August, the Collegian executive board approached the SGA to ask for an additional 30,000 dollars in order to open a purchase order with our printer. We were given 20,000, which allowed us to begin publishing on schedule. These additional funds were loaned to the Collegian as a short-term emergency loan, with payment due on Jan. 1, 2008.

In order to fulfill our obligations to the SGA, we have made a number of budget cuts that previous Collegian executive board members would have considered severe. These include cutting every salary on our payroll and eliminating over 20 paid staff positions. In comparison to 2006-2007, we estimate payroll reductions of close to 37,000 dollars over the course of the year.

We also continue to be mindful about our printing expenses, we print as few pages as possible daily, and paper size is dictated by the volume of our advertising revenue, rather than by content. We are also printing far fewer editions in color, which can be extremely expensive. According to our projected budget, we will save between 20,000 and 30,000 dollars this year in printing expenses.

Perhaps the biggest step we have taken in trying to improve our model as a student business has been forming an advisory board, which includes faculty members and professionals in journalism, business, graphic design and advertising. Historically, the Collegian has claimed absolute independence. However, we are now seeking advice from outsiders with experience in order to better ourselves, without sacrificing our status as an independent, student-run paper.

I'd also like to mention that we receive no funding from the University or the SGA. We operate purely on advertising sales revenue. Unfortunately, sales have been steadily declining over the past several years. Our sales trends reflect a common problem in print media: online advertising is taking away from newspaper sales, and we have been slow to adjust. A major priority going forward will be our website, www.dailycollegian.com, which will be going through a major overhaul to better serve our readers outside the Amherst area and provide content exclusive to the web.

I'll conclude by making a promise to you, the reader. The Collegian is taking the necessary steps to succeed in a changing media landscape. We aren't going anywhere, and my staff and I will continue to work tirelessly to secure our place here at UMass as New England's largest college daily.

Thank you,
Nicholas Belanger

Cuba holds elections, vote to decide the island's future

By Will Weissert
Associated Press

HAVANA — Cubans opened an election cycle Sunday that will lead to a decision next year on whether ailing leader Fidel Castro will remain atop the communist-run island's supreme governing body.

The nationwide municipal voting marked the start of a multi-tiered process that culminates with parliamentary elections next spring. Lawmakers could then decide to officially replace Castro, 81, with his younger brother Raul as head of the 31-member Council of State.

The elder Castro has been the island's unchallenged leader since his revolution toppled dictator Fulgencio Batista in 1959. But he has not been seen in public since undergoing emergency intestinal surgeries and ceding power to a provisional government headed by his brother in July 2006.

Some 37,258 candidates were vying for 15,236 positions on municipal assemblies nationwide and official media has said turnout of over 95 percent of the island's 8.2 million eligible voters is expected.

"If my commandant recovers his health, we will want him as president forever. There's no one like him," said Voter Gladys Veitia, tears welling in her eyes.

Fidel Castro has looked lucid in recent state videos, but also frail and in little condition to return to power. Cuban television reported he cast his ballot around midday without leaving the undisclosed location where he has been recovering for nearly 15 months.

In a statement read on official television during a subsequent national newscast, Castro did not mention the elections, but referred to news from Washington that, in coming days, President Bush planned to announce initiatives aimed at fostering democratic transition in Cuba.

"Bush is obsessed with Cuba," Castro wrote, accusing the U.S. administration of harboring terrorists, torturing terror suspects held at the U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay and prolonging the 45-year-old trade embargo against the island, which he called "your genocidal blockade."

The White House said Bush would announce "new initiatives" on Cuba at the State Department on Wednesday. White House spokesman Tony Fratto said last week that Bush would "emphasize the importance of democracy for the Cuban people and the role the international community can play in Cuba's transition."

The municipal elections are held every two and a half years. Voting is not mandatory, though failing to cast a ballot can draw unwanted attention in neighborhoods, where Revolutionary Defense Committees keep tabs on residents. Any one over 16 years old can cast a ballot.

Organized campaigning is forbidden, but officials posted resumes and photographs of candidates which listed age, marital status, education and experience. The Communist Party is the only one allowed by the constitution, and while candidates do not have to be members, critics claim they are the only ones who ever win.

Authorities will announce official results late Monday. Many races feature three or more candidates, and run-off elections next week will decide contests where no one receives a majority of votes.

Raul Castro voted at a polling place near Havana's sprawling Revolution Plaza. He chatted with children in school uniforms and exchanged pleasantries with a few military leaders who also voted.

Polling stations in Cuba are manned by children who salute voters as they stuff completed ballots into boxes decorated in a variety of colors. Signs, some hand-scrawled, were posted outside booths proclaiming "Vote early," and "Choose the best and most capable."

Loitering near Havana's seaside Malecon late Saturday, two teens said they would vote to avoid political repercussions, but that they didn't support the elections.

"Nothing will change," said one, a college student who insisted on anonymity.

Government critics and human rights groups – which are tolerated but dismissed as mercenaries of U.S. authorities by Cuba's government – boycotted the process.

Leading dissident Martha Beatriz Roque said elections are not secret since all candidates nominated for municipal positions were chosen by a show of hands at neighborhood gatherings – where no one dares nominate opposition leaders.

A woman casts her ballot at a polling station during Cuba's municipal elections in Havanna.

"[Kerry is] just another man who didn't stand up for what I believe he should've stood up for. He didn't stand up for Democratic principles; he voted for the war authorization in Iraq," said O'Reilly.

"He didn't really believe his vote was correct," he said. "But at that time the polls indicated that if he wanted to be the nominee for president for the Democratic Party that he would have to vote for war authorization."

"He is reactive rather than being proactive," said O'Reilly of Senator Kerry's policies. O'Reilly sees the ongoing war with Iraq as a major issue in the upcoming election, as well as the Senate approval of the Kyl-Lieberman amendment, which he describes as "[paving] the way for war against Iran." His campaign staff describes his stance on these issues as, "get out of Iraq, stay out of Iran."

Although his campaign has not raised millions to match the fundraising of the incumbent Kerry, $7.2 million dollars of which O'Reilly claims was left over from the Senator's presidential campaign efforts, it is not his main concern.

"I'm focused on people, not fundraising," he said.

When reached for comment, Vincent Morris, a spokesperson for Senator Kerry, said O'Reilly was "mistaken in his claim about funds raised in the last election."

Born in Boston, O'Reilly is the son of former Watertown Fire Chief Robert C. O'Reilly. A third generation fire fighter, O'Reilly served as a paid call fire fighter for the town of Amherst while attending the University. He graduated in 1975, earning a B.A. in Legal Studies, Magna Cum Laude.

After graduating, O'Reilly began work as an officer in the Department of Corrections at Norfolk State Prison, and at one time, worked as a commercial lobsterman. He has stepped back from his current position as an attorney to focus full-time on his campaign.

The Amherst office of Ed O'Reilly for Senate '08 serves as the western Massachusetts base of operations, with another office located in Gloucester.

When asked how long owners must wait to receive a call history report for a stolen phone, Tiara, customer service representative of Sprint answered, "It depends when their bill cycle ends. They can't get a report until they receive their next bill."

Potential victims are left with the question of what to do in the case of cell phone fraud. Some of the easier steps users can take focus on securing their phones. They can set up a password to access the keypad so that no one can read any personal information. Users can also avoid using personal information altogether. Cell phone owners are urged to report their phones being stolen immediately to avoid a big bill later.

"If the phone is reported stolen and [the owner] has insurance on the phone, we can file an insurance claim, and we terminate the service immediately," said a Verizon sales representative.

Identity Guard is a credit monitoring service that watches out for identity theft, but also has a branch focused on cell phone surveillance. There are several services like this one, but they are only effective if you are a member of such a group.

Students stayed between Berkshire dining hall and JQA while more cautious students watched from afar. Fans rejoiced for approximately an hour, by 1:00 a.m. most people were leaving their voices or losing interest in screaming, as they dispersed without any major incidents.

As early as 8:00 p.m. last night, UMass police along with Massachusetts State Police and Amherst town police began preparing for the potential threat of riots. Around 30 officers on foot were in attendance while several mounted officers patrolled supported their effort. Police officers had blocked off entries into Southwest in hopes of preventing more people from showing up.

Police were extremely tight-lipped, not giving out any details regarding the precautions taken for the night. The only advice given was to "Go home." Police did not want last night to resemble the December 15, 2006 riots a result of the UMass football team's loss to Appalachian State University. That riot involved over 1,800 people with property damage in the hundred thousand dollar range.

According to Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor last night's efforts were successful as they avoided all the problems of the previous year's riots. She ended her statements with an enthusiastic "Go Sox."

Missy Penedo, a UMass junior, said, "rioting is a way to celebrate your team's victory; but if your school is concerned about riots, then they should have a University sanctioned rally or another way for students to safely express their team spirit."

From a different perspective, intoxicated Red Sox fan Tony "Anonymous" said "It is my natural-born right as a United States American and as a devoted fan to the Red Sox Nation to get 'wicked mint pissah hammadaced' and destroy everything in sight to express my undying love for the Boston Red Sox." Tony was ecstatic about the game seven victory last night, as he showed off his Boston Red Sox "B" tattoo while screaming "All Bow Down to Pedroia," at the top of his lungs.

Since 2004, there have been over 145 students who were sanctioned for their participation in the riotous behavior on this campus, up to and including suspension and expulsion from the University.

Students arrested last night will also be processed through the criminal Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in addition to University sanctions.

National sudoku contest held

PHILADELPHIA — Sudoku, the numbers puzzle that claims 167 million U.S. players, held its first national championship on Saturday, drawing more than 800 people from as far away as California and British Columbia.

Organizers said the event attracted a larger crowd than expected, and proved the popularity of the puzzle that has been a fixture in many U.S. newspapers since 2005, after being popularized by The Times of London the previous year.

A survey last summer by the Philadelphia Inquirer, which sponsored the event, found 56 percent of the U.S. population had played the game – invented in the United States but named Sudoku in Japan.

The Philadelphia event was won by Sudoku's reigning world champion, Thomas Snyder, 27, who completed the "advanced" section in seven minutes, eight seconds – about three minutes ahead of his nearest rival – and took home the first prize of $10,000.

Snyder, a postdoctoral student of bioengineering at Stanford University in Palo Alto, CA, and a Harvard University Ph.D. in chemistry, said he had been playing puzzles including Sudoku since he was 5 years old but had only been into "competitive puzzling" for the last 2 1/2 years.

Secrets of his success included "note-taking that's designed for speed," he said, adding that he looked forward to defending his world title in India next year.

But he stressed that he treated puzzling as just a hobby, and did not see it as a "meaningful" activity.

Alicia Leshner, 46, an intensive care nurse from Lafayette Hill, PA, was also playing the advanced category but entertained no thoughts of winning.

"I just like puzzles," she said. "I do a lot of crossword puzzles. It takes me away from all the other things I have to worry about."

Jennifer Maienza, 49, a kindergarten teacher from Laurel Springs, NJ, said she entered the contest because her husband dared her, and because she wanted to meet the event's host, Will Shortz, puzzle master of The New York Times.

"He's the Bruce Springsteen of puzzles," Maienza said.

The 857 contestants, aged six to 87, supported by about 300 spectators, sat in silence for 30 minutes at a time to tackle three rounds of Sudoku, which requires players to fill in blanks in a grid of numbers without repeating them vertically, horizontally or in four quadrants within the grid.

The game's popularity is explained by the fact that anyone can do it, as opposed to crossword puzzles, which assume a certain vocabulary and some cultural knowledge, said Jay Devine, a spokesman for the Philadelphia event.

"Sudoku cuts across all that and allows young and old alike to play it," he said.

Poker site closes

According to an advisory sent out by the Attorney General two years ago, most poker tournaments are illegal unless operated by a licensed non-profit organization. This means that it is illegal to promote or participate in poker tournaments where money or prizes are at stake.

Since last week, UMasspoker.com had undergone several changes in order to comply with UMass's request. The Sam the Minuteman picture was removed and the forum and tournament listings were taken down. Currently, the Web site depicts nothing other than the administrator's message and e-mail address.

The shutdown of the Web site is a preliminary step to addressing the problems of both legal and illegal gambling at UMass.

Student health counselors are planning programs intended to educate students about the dangers of compulsive gambling.

"I figured there wouldn't be that many compulsive gamblers in our age group" said freshman English major Stephanie Medeiros. "But it must be a big problem if University Health Services needs to start a program."

Health services will be working with residence life staff to further its outreach to students, according to University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski.

Guests speak of problems for Palestine, Israel in lectures

Danielle Kahn
Collegian Staff

"If internationals want peace, they must come to Palestine and help with a demonstration," said Rateb Abu Rahma at Thursday night's lecture on Bil'in, a village on the West Bank.

Rahma, a Palestinian activist, and Israeli activist Kobi Snitz spoke on how they work together for peace.

Their main focus was on the farming village Bil'in. The people of Bil'in have been actively participating in a non-violent protest of a wall being built around the West Bank. Each week they come up with new, creative ways to protest. Some include chaining themselves to olive trees, creating clever art promoting peace made from rubber bullets and tear gas cans and a large snake made to represent the wall devouring their land.

"Armed resistance is a shortcut," said Snitz. "Non-violent resistance is a lot harder."

So far, they have had over 200 joint demonstrations with Palestinians, Israelis and internationals. One of these actually ended in a victory when their case made to the High Court ended in a ruling that the building of the wall was illegal.

Unfortunately, the wall is still being built despite the decision. According to Palestinians, the wall is acting as a cage for the those who live on the West Bank. It is seen as not separating Palestinians from Israelis; it is separating Palestinians from other Palestinians.

Rahma and Snitz said if nothing is done about this wall, there will most certainly be constant warfare between the Palestinians and Israelis. The activists of Palestine and Israel who are working together for peace are looking for people from other countries to come in and help.

They openly invite people to see and experience the wall for themselves. They said that through this outreach of knowledge, the message of Bil'in can be spread and the wall can come down.

Snitz offered advice on how to spread their message, saying, "Do meaningful stuff and tell people about it."

Safety and security

Thomas Sitzer

I have been thinking a lot about the nature of security. The notion probably means quite a few different things from person to person, but in my own terms security is protection from harm or loss. Some people would certainly consider "safety" a synonym, but there are significant differences that rely on action and inaction in the two cases. Safety is nothing more than a condition that states, "nothing that one values will be lost," these values ranging from religious to material contexts. However, safety is as fleeting as a fawn's shady reprieve in coyote territory. The extension of safety relies strictly on the maintenance of security. That is, there is some role an entity must play to ensure the promise to the individual that safety will be provided to them.

When you practice your beliefs and amalgamate your possessions, you become fiercely aware of how temporary these items are. You know that you have to ensure that these values will not only endure the trials of a lifetime, but you also hope that they will allow your future generations to succeed and prosper as well.

But there is a conflict in interests between college students and the various forms of policing.

Let's talk about government — an institution that protects people from people, fostering diplomacy and shunning violence. The shepherd does not always fulfill his duties, however, as we as students at the University have recently witnessed in the Student Union stabbings. Here we have a situation that was completely avoidable and, to me, utterly humiliating. At the venue of the symbol of student unity, utter chaos ensued when a late-night party was not properly administered. With lack of control at a community event came the stabbing of a significant member of our immediate society. So who's to blame? Where is the shepherd?

With lack of control at a community event came the stabbing of a significant member of our immediate society. So who's to blame?

The fraternity sponsoring the event tried to run things smoothly, but under the late-night circumstances and amid a high volume of people, control was lost. With police presence, the dance could easily have been broken up when necessary. Or, with more appropriate duties designated to them, student officials could have dispersed the crowd, at least to the extent that no violence would have occurred on campus jurisdiction. Surely we like to consider ourselves responsible for our own safety, and capable of self-preservation independently or within a smaller community like a fraternity, but nobody wants a police force around on campus all of the time, and cadets can only do so much.

Student workers play a large role in campus security. They are essentially the eyes and ears of the police here on campus. But these employees of the University are regularly harangued by students who are totally unaware of school policy. Residence hall desk workers work very, very hard on the weekends, harassed nightly for trying to uphold basic measures while some sot chews them out for being a hard-ass and then walks away with nasty words spoken under their breath. This shows that, much of the time, ignorance of policy alone results in conflict.

Regardless of high-tension events like the Student Union stabbing, it is fair to say that at one point or another, everyone has felt unsafe on campus. Violent incidents occur all of the time, and despite claims by UMass Director of News and Information Ed Blaguszewski and campus police that violence is on a downward trend, there is regularity in the alert emails we receive almost weekly. On Oct. 12, a student carrying a knife is accused of smashing the window of a McNamara dormitory and beating another student with a baseball hat before fleeing in his Jeep. Could this have been prevented by some sort of security maintenance? Probably, but it occurred early in the morning and besides, isolated events are difficult. However, the police apprehended the suspect quickly.

It is plausible, then, that personnel cannot carry out that security maintenance alone. Therefore, it is imperative that security be fostered through infrastructure. One way this is being instituted is with the new campus warning siren system demonstrated this week at various campus locations. "Given the growing public safety risks on college campuses," said UMass Director of Environmental Health and Safety Don Robinson, "UMass Amherst is assessing the many options available to notify the community if it faces imminent danger." Blaguszewski explained that the system "can be used to alert the campus community in instances of severe weather, criminal activity, large chemical spills or other emergency situations that call for immediate action."

Ultimately, safety is an abstract balance between utility and public functions. There are hard working people, students, administrators and police alike that try to make our campus clean and safe, but sometimes mistakes are made, and occasional unavoidable disturbances are to be expected. Still, there needs to be a heightened awareness of the violent trends of this campus, as well as logical, preordained measures taken, to ensure the quality of life here at UMass.

Neither the time nor the (polling) place

Evan Powers

The much-anticipated announcement of the decision to run for president of the United States did not come from Fred Thompson, but from satirical-Conservative television host Stephen Colbert, host of Comedy Central's hit show "The Colbert Report." His decision to run as both a Democrat and a Republican — in his own words, "so he could lose twice" — has drawn national attention now that he's thrown his hat into the ring and has even drawn comments about how he could wind up receiving a considerable amount of votes in his home state, South Carolina, where he'll be running. However, is he crossing the line that separates entertainment and politics?

Colbert has done well for himself since he began his spinoff of Comedy Central's other news parody, "The Daily Show," in 2005. "The Colbert Report" became one of the network's highest-rated series, earned several Emmy nominations, and amassed millions of dedicated viewers who watch the show every night. Colbert has been able to remain in character as a mock news broadcaster so well that some are unable to tell whether his campaign for President is even genuinely serious. Colbert maintains that it is, despite the fact that his primary sponsor for his campaign is Doritos, the only funding for his campaign is actually coming from his show's "coverage" of the campaign, and he has hinted that his running mate will be Michael Huckabee, Russian President Vladimir Putin or just Colbert himself.

Colbert's celebrity status in the entertainment world is right up there with some of today's best comedians, and while he may only be filing to run for President in South Carolina, his popularity among his viewers could actually lead to him receiving votes in the election. Whether it be voters who will not be satisfied with the other (real) candidates, general apathy toward politics, or simply getting a kick out of putting a big X next to Stephen Colbert's name, the votes will come in. It's happened before. In 1968, comedian Pat Paulsen, who wasn't satisfied with the candidates for president at the time, decided to run and ended up receiving over 200,000 votes.

Would the results be justified knowing someone who clearly had no intent to run the country took votes away from legitimate candidates?

That's a fairly large number for someone who ran almost 40 years ago. Imagine the number of votes Colbert could receive considering his popularity.

It is safe to say that Colbert will not win the presidency in 2008, or even the state of South Carolina for that matter. He could even come onto his show next week and announce that he's dropping out of the race. However, it certainly brings up the idea of votes being tossed away, voting for someone of Colbert's status, as well as taking the real issues of the presidential race out of the picture. South Carolina is one of the early and important primaries for presidential hopefuls. Imagine being neck and neck with another candidate, only to find yourself leaving a state primary losing by 200,000 votes because someone the likes of Stephen Colbert was on the ballot. Had he not been there, what would the results have looked like? Would the results be justified knowing someone who clearly had no intent to run the country took votes away from legitimate candidates?

They say that anyone can run for president if they wish. It's their right, and if they're capable of funding a campaign for themselves, then all the power to them. But is it really necessary to take something as important as the presidential election and use it for entertainment purposes, especially considering that it's more than likely that people will vote for the celebrity rather than the person that would be best fit to run our country and serve the people? It's been proven in the past that every vote counts in an election, but I think it's safe to say a vote for Stephen Colbert would almost be like not voting at all. As humorous as Colbert's stunt is, I think he'd be better off bringing "truthiness" to viewers on his television show — and on his television shows only.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

Dear Editor:

On Monday, Oct. 1, students from the University of Massachusetts, Amherst College, Hampshire College and the Amherst Public Schools walked out to speak out in support of 6 black students in Jena, LA. The walk out and march was a part of a national effort to protest the Jena 6 case, in which six black students were arrested and charged with attempted second-degree murder after having a small fight with a white student.

The fight, which occurred in November 2006, followed tension after white students hung nooses under a tree known as the "white tree," a hangout for white students, after a black student sat there. The students who hung the nooses were suspended for three days. Since then, racial tension has continued, and there have been several disturbing cases of violence and threats against black students and their families.

What occurred in Amherst was something grassroots and spontaneous. It developed out of frustration with the lack of awareness about this situation on campus and with the obvious disparate treatment of the six black students.

The protest here and around the country is not merely because of six high school students — it goes deeper. Maybe it's because of 400 years of oppression, scars of slavery, Jim Crow, lynching, rape, brutality and destruction. Or maybe it is for the fact that this destructive legacy still exists today in the structural makeup of American society. This is evident in the presence of inequitable school systems, police brutality and racial profiling, a racist criminal justice system, the prison industrial complex, abject poverty, high rates of unemployment, substandard housing and so on. Maybe it's also for the scars from the nation's response to Hurricane Katrina. Or maybe it is also for the fatal shooting of Sean Bell. Or maybe it is also for the brutal rape and torture of an African-American woman by six whites.

I know it is tempting to believe that racial equality exists in the United States, but this is not true. Consider the term "racial discrimination." Let it marinate for a moment in your mind. Now consider generations cut off and locked down because of racial discrimination. Now consider the term "white supremacy." Every non-white race has struggled to survive in America, but especially black people. Today, black people continue to struggle to survive in white America.

What intrigues me is the fact that some white people have now reduced the nation's response to the Jena 6 to "racial theatre." How quickly we forget who implements the racist practices of this society. What also intrigues me is the modern, colorblind, race-does-not-matter perception. In fact race has always mattered in the United States. It is interesting how dominant groups (white Americans) generally do not like to be reminded of the existence of race, let alone racial inequality.

And how often do rich white college kids get screwed by the system? Is it not rich white people who create the systems in which we live?

When is it appropriate to label established leaders "frauds" and "clowns?" Even if one disagrees with their politics, Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton represent the voices of many black communities, however controversial they may be. It is not like they implemented monetary policies that distressed nations or waged war to result in billions of dollars spent and thousands of deaths.

It is good to acknowledge that African Americans are strong, independent and accomplished citizens. They are strong in the sense that they played an important role in bringing about the downfall of the slave system and in eliminating some of the marks of Jim Crow, and today are continuing to fight racism and racial discrimination in America. Blacks have always protested the conditions of their life in this country. If you want to praise Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., acknowledge his emphasis on the right to protest: "We have known humiliation, we have known abusive language, we have been plunged into the abyss of oppression. And we decided to rise up only with the weapon of protest."

Jazz concert adds diversity

Miguel Zenon and his band enhanced Homecoming

By Tonya Eckert
Collegian Correspondent

Smooth jazz was united with rhythmic salsa as Miguel Zenón took the stage at Bowker Auditorium on Thursday night, His Oct. 18 concert was the last of four performances in association with the Fine Arts Center's Center Series 2007-2008.

The musical medley, premiering Zenón on alto sax, drew inspiration from bebop and Latin jazz. Accompanying Zenón onstage was Luis Perdomo (piano), Matt Penman (bass), and Jeff Ballard (drums). Within the quartet, each musician's personal style was complemented by the others' playing. The balance between exhilarating improvisations and percussive accompaniments created a smooth and harmonious sound.

Zenón and his quartet prepared a five-song set which lasted approximately 90 minutes. From start to finish, each song intermittently ranged from slow and somber to upbeat and energetic. While the songs might have sounded confusingly similar to an untrained ear, the jazz-friendly audience responded with a standing ovation.

The show was opened with "Villarán", the seventh track from Zenón's most recent album, Improvising a crowd-pleasing solo, Zenón cut through the silence in the auditorium with the rich timber of his alto sax. The spotlight then expanded to include Perdomo, Penman, and Ballard providing the harmony for Zenón's complicated melody.

In time, each member of the quartet got his chance to solo and was met with resounding approval from the lively audience. It was interesting to hear how different each instrument sounded when isolated from the others. Solos on the saxophone, piano, and drums generated a reverberating sensation through the crowd. However, when the bass took the lead, its deep pitch was somewhat less invigorating.

Following the opening crowd-pleaser, Zenon and his quartet went on to play "Cameron," "Ulysses in Slow Motion," "Santos," and "Que Te Pedi." It was difficult to decipher where each song stopped and the next began. The music would gradually become softer and then suddenly reach a crescendo. The dynamics of the music kept the audience continually guessing how far along in the set the band had come.

Adding to that confusion was the fact that Zenón seemed to favor collective improv, which features all instruments soloing at once. With all of the musicians playing different tunes simultaneously, the music became slightly garbled. And even when the improvising was restricted to solos, the melodic deviations were still complicated to follow.

At a break between the last two songs, Zenón addressed the audience with a thick Puerto Rican accent and thanked them for their attendance, despite the ongoing Red Sox game. He also took this time to present his quartet, providing heart-felt introductions, like, "the one and only Jeff Ballard on the drums!"

After the closing of the fifth number, Zenón and his quartet cleared the stage. When the house lights remained off, it was an indication that the band would return. Sure enough, Zenón, Perdomo, Penman and Ballard returned for an encore in response to a standing ovation. Those audience members eager to leave the auditorium at the end of the fifth number were deprived a real treat, for Zenón slowly eased into a smooth song which was fairly unique among the others heard that night.

Recording his first CD in 2001, Zenon has since released three albums and is preparing to release a fourth, titled "Awake," in spring 2008. Perdomo's jazz piano is featured on all four albums, but Penman and Ballard have not collaborated on any of Zenón's CDs released to date.

Zenón's third album is titled "Jibaro. Translated, "jibaro" represents the true Puerto Rican as being hard-working, simple and independent, an image that has frequently been portrayed in a sympathetic light. Many see the jibaro as the roots of Puerto Rican people today, and many songs express the jibaro as a symbol of the strength of traditional values. This album won Zenon well-deserved recognition for its placement on several top-ten lists, including The New York Times.

Born and raised in San Juan, Puerto Rico, a young Zenon first studied saxophone at Escuela Libre de Musica, an institution famed for turning out musical prodigies. He then received further schooling at the Berklee School of Music and Manhattan School of Music. Now in his thirties, the young musician already has an impressive career. He started out collaborating with an acclaimed group of artists and is now the premier soloist in his own quartet.

While on campus for his scheduled performance, Zenon agreed to appear as a guest lecturer. This exceptional treat was granted to several classes within the UMass music department.

Grammy winner entertains the FAC

By Andrew Sheridan

This Saturday the Fine Arts Center hosted Grammy-award winning artist Rosanne Cash. The concert, entitled "Black Cadillac," took place in the FAC concert hall in front of a packed house full of artistic 40-year-olds and enthusiastic country music fans.

The event began as the backdrop, which appeared originally as a simple image of a red-lit black rose, shifted into an oceanic scene while a recording of Cash's voice echoed throughout the hall. Cash narrated about her past, her feelings and something about rivers. This type of introspective song intro was repeated several times throughout the concert, and while it was kind of nice, most found it pointless.

The music itself was more interesting. Rosanne Cash is an artist who is difficult to fit into any one genre, and her style shifted considerably throughout the performance. Some songs were slow piano ballads, and some could be considered pure blues if not for a strong rock drum beat. Most of the songs, however, could most accurately be described as a fusion of country and rock.

"Black Cadillac" was mostly made up of titles from Cash's most recent album of the same name. The album was written as a reflection on the death of her mother, her stepmother and her father, Johnny Cash. Some of her lyrics were metaphorical, while some, such as those to "House on the Lake," dealt directly with those deaths and their effect on her family. Detached yet emotional, her storytelling skill is truly impressive.

Although the audience was generally calm, the house was rocking when she veered off the album track and played some classic country hits, mostly by her father.

She talked a good bit about the late Johnny Cash. His influence was clearly evident in songs such as "Burn Down This House" and "Radio Operator," written in tribute to him. Particularly interesting was her story about her father giving her a list of 100 essential country-western songs to complete her musical education.

Her live song intros were insightful, and she broke up the monotony with some witty banter, such as thanking everyone for missing the Red Sox game to come see her. The background changed constantly throughout the performance, portraying various images of her past and generic scenes of roses and highways.

In addition to providing vocals, Cash played the acoustic guitar and the piano, although the latter only occasionally. She was accompanied by a three-piece band made up of drums, bass and electric guitar. The guitarist John Leventhal stole the show. Proficient in both country-western and rock, his solos easily outshined Cash's vocals and brought much-needed energy to the performance.

This concert was the final engagement in the two-year run of the Black Cadillac tour, so for the vast majority of people who missed Saturday's performance, they will have to wait quite a while to see the singer-songwriter live.

Right before the encore, she announced that she would be taking several years off of touring to raise her two children. She is expected to release her as-of-yet untitled memoirs in 2008, raising her book count to three.

Cash's unique brand of country music was different from the majority of acts that come to the University, and her Grammy-winning status brought her the prestige to fill the room. All in all, the concert was fantastic, straightforward but just short of thrilling.

"Two years he walks the earth. No phone, no pool, no pets, no cigarettes. An aesthetic voyager whose home is the road...no longer to be poisoned by the civilization he flees, and walks alone upon the land to become lost in the wild."

It took Director Sean Penn nine years to acquire the rights to "Into the Wild," a retelling of Jon Krakauer's national bestseller by the same name.

Emile Hirsch ("Lords of Dogtown," "Girl Next Door") plays the role of wandering Christopher McCandless, who sacrifices his $20,000 bank account, Harvard Law School acceptance, his social security card and his name to become Alexander Supertramp, a 23 year-old who gathers strength from his paperback companions Jack London, Henry David Thoreau and Leo Tolstoy — to leave his comfortable life and live in isolation from the childhood his fully-domesticated parents (William Hurt, Marcia Gay Harden) either created or destroyed through their quantifiable perversion of happiness.

Hirsh's role is a convincing one thanks to Penn, who spared him no pain in connecting to the role. "Rather than love, than money, than fame," the real-life McCandless chose a version of truth that he believed existed only within himself and was reachable only through introspection away from the "poisonous" influences of his prior life.

McCandless' ultimate destination is Alaska, where he lives off the game he shoots and the plants he properly identifies. The story is as much about the journey as about the life he enjoys when his dream is temporarily realized.

McCandless is in a state of constant confusion and discovery. The epic, swirling shots of western landscapes constantly reflect the nature of his mind. Like a prophet, McCandless rocks the foundations of the beliefs of those he encounters. A 30-year-old widower (Hal Holbrook) leaves home and two aging flower children (Catherine Keener, Brian Dierker) redefine love.

Hirsch looks completely engrossed in the dogma within the now-famous journal of McCandless. He looks enlightened, a constant state that his companions are both troubled and inspired by. His connection to his environment comes across as genuine. McCandless describes his inability to properly a handle the slain moose, as one of the greatest tragedies of his life. Hirsch washes his bloodstained hands in a mountain stream, a scene reminiscent of Pilate's symbolic apology.

Penn's best work yet as a director, his other films include "The Indian Runner," "The Crossing Guard," and "The Pledge. "Into the Wild" successfully critiques humanity, while examining its most fundamental aspects: the need for freedom, food, shelter, love, etc.

The film feels like a documentary. Penn shoots in the same locations made famous by McCandless, whose journeys inspires like-minded youth, who in turn raise McCandless

Bouncing Souls puts on a show for energetic audience

By Michelle Abbascano
Staff Writer

The legendary punk rock band the Bouncing Souls put on a high-energy show to an even livelier audience this past Thursday night at the Pearl Street Nightclub. The band, which is doing a short fall tour of the east coast, had three openers on the bill with them. The Low Budgets, Modern Life is War, and World Inferno Friendship Society. Greg Attonito, lead singer of the Bouncing Souls, proclaimed during their set that this was one of the best tours they have ever been on, with an incredible and diverse lineup.

The Low Budgets, a 4-piece punk band from Philadelphia, were the first to take the stage. Although the sound quality of the venue that night was not in the band's favor, they still put on an entertaining set, with catchy beats and fast-paced, hard-driven songs that had everyone moving and bobbing their heads along. Each of their songs sounded different and distinguishable, which was refreshing and kept their performance interesting and fun to watch and listen to.

The next band to take the stage, Modern Life is War, which is a hardcore punk band signed to Equal Vision Records, was a completely different sounding band than the first. They were much heavier, with the majority of their songs comprised of screaming the words rather than singing them. Overall, they had a lot of energy and the crowd seemed to be enjoying them. By the second song, members of the audience were jumping on stage to scream along, and a mosh-pit had opened up and lasted for the duration of their set. Their songs were also catchy in their own ways and had the crowd jumping their fists along.

World Inferno Friendship Society, who can only be described as a punk-cabaret band, was the next to go on before the Souls took the stage. This was by far the most interesting and unique band of the night. They had seven members on the stage, including two females, all of whom were dressed from head to toe in black. The singer of the band, Jack Terricciano, sang into his own old-fashioned style microphone, and opened with their

Thomas Sitzer

I have been thinking a lot about the nature of security. The notion probably means quite a few different things from person to person, but in my own terms security is protection from harm or loss. Some people would certainly consider "safety" a synonym, but there are significant differences that rely on action and inaction in the two cases. Safety is nothing more than a condition that states, "nothing that one values will be lost," these values ranging from religious to material contexts. However, safety is as fleeting as a fawn's shady reprieve in coyote territory. The extension of safety relies strictly on the maintenance of security. That is, there is some role an entity must play to ensure the promise to the individual that safety will be provided to them.

When you practice your beliefs and amalgamate your possessions, you become fiercely aware of how temporary these items are. You know that you have to ensure that these values will not only endure the trials of a lifetime, but you also hope that they will allow your future generations to succeed and prosper as well.

But there is a conflict in interests between college students and the various forms of policing.

Let's talk about government – an institution that protects people from people, fostering diplomacy and shunning violence. The shepherd does not always fulfill his duties, however, as we as students at the University have recently witnessed in the Student Union stabbings. Here we have a situation that was completely avoidable and, to me, utterly humiliating. At the venue of the symbol of student unity, utter chaos ensued when a late-night party was not properly administered. With lack of control at a community event came the stabbing of a significant member of our immediate society. So who's to blame? Where is the shepherd?

With lack of control at a community event came the stabbing of a significant member of our immediate society. So who's to blame?

The fraternity sponsoring the event tried to run things smoothly, but under the late-night circumstances and amid a high volume of people, control was lost. With police presence, the dance could easily have been broken up when necessary. Or, with more appropriate duties designated to them, student officials could have dispersed the crowd, at least to the extent that no violence would have occurred on campus jurisdiction. Surely we like to consider ourselves responsible for our own safety, and capable of self-preservation independently or within a smaller community like a fraternity, but nobody wants a police force around on campus all of the time, and cadets can only do so much.

Student workers play a large role in campus security. They are essentially the eyes and ears of the police here on campus. But these employees of the University are regularly harangued by students who are totally unaware of school policy. Residence hall desk workers work very, very hard on the weekends, harassed nightly for trying to uphold basic measures while some sot chews them out for being a hard-ass and then walks away with nasty words spoken under their breath. This shows that, much of the time, ignorance of policy alone results in conflict.

Regardless of high-tension events like the Student Union stabbing, it is fair to say that at one point or another, everyone has felt unsafe on campus. Violent incidents occur all of the time, and despite claims by UMass Director of News and Information Ed Blaguszewski and campus police that violence is on a downward trend, there is regularity in the alert emails we receive almost weekly. On Oct. 12, a student carrying a knife is accused of smashing the window of a McNamara dormitory and beating another student with a baseball bat before fleeing in his Jeep. Could this have been prevented by some sort of security maintenance? Probably, but it occurred early in the morning and besides, isolated events are difficult. However, the police apprehended the suspect quickly.

It is plausible, then, that personnel cannot carry out that security maintenance alone. Therefore, it is imperative that security be fostered through infrastructure. One way this is being instituted is with the new campus warning siren system demonstrated this week at various campus locations. "Given the growing public safety risks on college campuses," said UMass Director of Environmental Health and Safety Don Robinson, "UMass Amherst is assessing the many options available to notify the community if it faces imminent danger." Blaguszewski explained that the system "can be used to alert the campus community in instances of severe weather, criminal activity, large chemical spills or other emergency situations that call for immediate action."

Ultimately, safety is an abstract balance between utility and public functions. There are hard working people, students, administrators and police alike that try to make our campus clean and safe, but sometimes mistakes are made, and occasional unavoidable disturbances are to be expected. Still, there needs to be a heightened awareness of the violent trends of this campus, as well as logical, preordained measures taken, to ensure the quality of life here at UMass.

Neither the time nor the (polling) place

Evan Powers

The much-anticipated announcement of the decision to run for president of the United States did not come from Fred Thompson, but from satirical-Conservative television host Stephen Colbert, host of Comedy Central's hit show "The Colbert Report." His decision to run as both a Democrat and a Republican – in his own words, "so he could lose twice" – has drawn national attention now that he's thrown his hat into the ring and has even drawn comments about how he could wind up receiving a considerable amount of votes in his home state, South Carolina, where he'll be running. However, is he crossing the line that separates entertainment and politics?

Colbert has done well for himself since he began his spinoff of Comedy Central's other news parody, "The Daily Show," in 2005. "The Colbert Report" became one of the network's highest-rated series, earned several Emmy nominations, and amassed millions of dedicated viewers who watch the show every night. Colbert has been able to remain in character as a mock news broadcaster so well that some are unable to tell whether his campaign for President is even genuinely serious. Colbert maintains that it is, despite the fact that his primary sponsor for his campaign is Doritos, the only funding for his campaign is actually coming from his show's "coverage" of the campaign, and he has hinted that his running mate will be Michael Huckabee, Russian President Vladimir Putin or just Colbert himself.

Colbert's celebrity status in the entertainment world is right up there with some of today's best comedians, and while he may only be filing to run for President in South Carolina, his popularity among his viewers could actually lead to him receiving votes in the election. Whether it be voters who will not be satisfied with the other (real) candidates, general apathy toward politics, or simply getting a kick out of putting a big X next to Stephen Colbert's name, the votes will come in. It's happened before. In 1968, comedian Pat Paulsen, who wasn't satisfied with the candidates for president at the time, decided to run and ended up receiving over 200,000 votes.

Would the results be justified knowing someone who clearly had no intent to run the country took votes away from legitimate candidates?

WWW.WANTMEDIA.COM

That's a fairly large number for someone who ran almost 40 years ago. Imagine the number of votes Colbert could receive considering his popularity.

It is safe to say that Colbert will not win the presidency in 2008, or even the state of South Carolina for that matter. He could even come onto his show next week and announce that he's dropping out of the race. However, it certainly brings up the idea of votes being tossed away voting for someone of Colbert's status, as well as taking the real issues of the presidential race out of the picture. South Carolina is one of the early and important primaries for presidential hopefuls. Imagine being neck and neck with another candidate, only to find yourself leaving a state primary losing by 200,000 votes because someone the likes of Stephen Colbert was on the ballot. Had he not been there, what would the results have looked like? Would the results be justified knowing someone who clearly had no intent to run the country took votes away from legitimate candidates?

They say that anyone can run for president if they wish. It's their right, and if they're capable of funding a campaign for themselves, then all the power to them. But is it really necessary to take something as important as the presidential election and use it for entertainment purposes, especially considering that it's more than likely that people will vote for the celebrity rather than the person that would be best fit to run our country and serve the people? It's been proven in the past that every vote counts in an election, but I think it's safe to say a vote for Stephen Colbert would almost be like not voting at all. As humorous as Colbert's stunt is, I think he'd be better off bringing "truthiness" to viewers on his television show – and on his television show only.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

EditorLtE@DailyCollegian.com

Dear Editor:

On Monday, Oct. 1, students from the University of Massachusetts, Amherst College, Hampshire College and the Amherst Public Schools walked out to speak out in support of 6 black students in Jena, LA. The walk out and march was a part of a national effort to protest the Jena 6 case, in which six black students were arrested and charged with attempted second-degree murder after having a small fight with a white student.

The fight, which occurred in November 2006, followed tension after white students hung nooses under a tree known as the "white tree," a hangout for white students, after a black student sat there. The students who hung the nooses were suspended for three days. Since then, racial tension has continued, and there have been several disturbing cases of violence and threats against black students and their families.

What occurred in Amherst was something grassroots and spontaneous. It developed out of frustration with the lack of awareness about this situation on campus and with the obvious disparate treatment of the six black students.

The protest here and around the country is not merely because of six high school students – it goes deeper. Maybe it's because of 400 years of oppression, scars of slavery, Jim Crow, lynching, rape, brutality and destruction. Or maybe it is for the fact that this destructive legacy still exists today in the structural makeup of American society. This is evident in the presence of inequitable school systems, police brutality and racial profiling, a racist criminal justice system, the prison industrial complex, abject poverty, high rates of unemployment, substandard housing and so on. Maybe it's also for the scars from the nation's response to Hurricane Katrina. Or maybe it is also for the fatal shooting of Sean Bell. Or maybe it is also for the brutal rape and torture of an African-American woman by six whites.

I know it is tempting to believe that racial equality exists in the United States, but this is not true. Consider the term "racial discrimination." Let it marinate for a moment in your mind. Now consider generations cut off and locked down because of racial discrimination. Now consider the term "white supremacy." Every non-white race has struggled to survive in America, but especially black people. Today, black people continue to struggle to survive in white America.

What intrigues me is the fact that some white people have now reduced the nation's response to the Jena 6 to "racial theatre." How quickly we forget who implements the racist practices of this society. What also intrigues me is the modern, colorblind, race-does-not-matter perception. In fact race has always mattered in the United States. It is interesting how dominant groups (white Americans) generally do not like to be reminded of the existence of race, let alone racial inequality.

And how often do rich white college kids get screwed by the system? Is it not rich white people who create the systems in which we live?

When is it appropriate to label established leaders "frauds" and "clowns?" Even if one disagrees with their politics, Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton represent the voices of many black communities, however controversial they may be. It is not like they implemented monetary policies that distressed nations or waged war to result in billions of dollars spent and thousands of deaths.

It is good to acknowledge that African Americans are strong, independent and accomplished citizens. They are strong in the sense that they played an important role in bringing about the downfall of the slave system and in eliminating some of the marks of Jim Crow, and today are continuing to fight racism and racial discrimination in America. Blacks have always protested the conditions of their life in this country. If you want to praise Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., acknowledge his emphasis on the right to protest: "We have known humiliation, we have known abusive language, we have been plunged into the abyss of oppression. And we decided to rise up only with the weapon of protest."

Jazz concert adds diversity

Miguel Zenon and his band enhanced Homecoming

By Tonya Eckert
Collegian Correspondent

Smooth jazz was united with rhythmic salsa as Miguel Zenón took the stage at Bowker Auditorium on Thursday night. His Oct. 18 concert was the last of four performances in association with the Fine Arts Center's Center Series 2007-2008.

The musical medley, premiering Zenón on alto sax, drew inspiration from bebop and Latin jazz. Accompanying Zenon onstage was Luis Perdomo (piano), Matt Penman (bass), and Jeff Ballard (drums). Within the quartet, each musician's personal style was complemented by the others' playing. The balance between exhilarating improvisations and percussive accompaniments created a smooth and harmonious sound.

Zenón and his quartet prepared a five-song set which lasted approximately 90 minutes. From start to finish, each song intermittently ranged from slow and somber to upbeat and energetic. While the songs might have sounded confusingly similar to an untrained ear, the jazz-friendly audience responded with a standing ovation.

The show was opened with "Villarán", the seventh track from Zenón's most recent album, Improvising a crowd-pleasing solo, Zenón cut through the silence in the auditorium with the rich timber of his alto sax. The spotlight then expanded to include Perdomo, Penman, and Ballard providing the harmony for Zenón's complicated melody.

In time, each member of the quartet got his chance to solo and was met with resounding approval from the lively audience. It was interesting to hear how different each instrument sounded when isolated from the others. Solos on the saxophone, piano, and drums generated a reverberating sensation through the crowd. However, when the bass took the lead, its deep pitch was somewhat less invigorating.

Following the opening crowd-pleaser, Zenon and his quartet went on to play "Cameron," "Ulysses in Slow Motion," "Santos," and "Que Te Pedi." It was difficult to decipher where each song stopped and the next began. The music would gradually become softer and then suddenly reach a crescendo. The dynamics of the music kept the audience continually guessing how far along in the set the band had come.

Adding to that confusion was the fact that Zenón seemed to favor collective improv, which features all instruments soloing at once. With all of the musicians playing different tunes simultaneously, the music became slightly garbled. And even when the improvising was restricted to solos, the melodic deviations were still complicated to follow.

At a break between the last two songs, Zenón addressed the audience with a thick Puerto Rican accent and thanked them for their attendance, despite the ongoing Red Sox game. He also took this time to present his quartet, providing heart-felt introductions, like, "the one and only Jeff Ballard on the drums!"

After the closing of the fifth number, Zenon and his quartet cleared the stage. When the house lights remained off, it was an indication that the band would return. Sure enough, Zenon, Perdomo, Penman and Ballard returned for an encore in response to a standing ovation. Those audience members eager to leave the auditorium at the end of the fifth number were deprived a real treat, for Zenón slowly eased into a smooth song which was fairly unique among the others heard that night.

Recording his first CD in 2001, Zenon has since released three albums and is preparing to release a fourth, titled "Awake," in spring 2008. Perdomo's jazz piano is featured on all four albums, but Penman and Ballard have not collaborated on any of Zenón's CDs released to date.

Zenón's third album is titled "Jibaro." Translated, "jibaro" represents the true Puerto Rican as being hard-working, simple and independent, an image that has frequently been portrayed in a sympathetic light. Many see the jibaro as the roots of Puerto Rican people today, and many songs express the jibaro as a symbol of the strength of traditional values. This album won Zenon well-deserved recognition for its placement on several top-ten lists, including The New York Times'.

Born and raised in San Juan, Puerto Rico, a young Zenon first studied saxophone at Escuela Libre de Musica, an institution famed for turning out musical prodigies. He then received further schooling at the Berklee School of Music and Manhattan School of Music. Now in his thirties, the young musician already has an impressive career. he started out collaborating with an acclaimed group of artists and is now the premier soloist in his own quartet.

While on campus for his scheduled performance, Zenon agreed to appear as a guest lecturer. This exceptional treat was granted to several classes within the UMass music department.

Grammy winner entertains the FAC

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Correspondent

This Saturday the Fine Arts Center hosted Grammy-award winning artist Rosanne Cash. The concert, entitled "Black Cadillac," took place in the FAC concert hall in front of a packed house full of artistic 40-year-olds and enthusiastic country music fans.

The event began as the backdrop, which appeared originally as a simple image of a red-lit black rose, shifted into an oceanic scene while a recording of Cash's voice echoed throughout the hall. Cash narrated about her past, her feelings and something about rivers. This type of introspective song intro was repeated several times throughout the concert, and while it was kind of nice, most found it pointless.

The music itself was more interesting. Rosanne Cash is an artist who is difficult to fit into any one genre, and her style shifted considerably throughout the performance. Some songs were slow piano ballads, and some could be considered pure blues if not for a strong rock drum beat. Most of the songs, however, could most accurately be described as a fusion of country and rock.

"Black Cadillac" was mostly made up of titles from Cash's most recent album of the same name. The album was written as a reflection on the death of her mother, her stepmother and her father, Johnny Cash. Some of her lyrics were metaphorical, while some, such as those to "House on the Lake," dealt directly with those deaths and their effect on her family. Detached yet emotional, her storytelling skill is truly impressive.

Although the audience was generally calm, the house was rocking when she veered off the album track and played some classic country hits, mostly by her father.

She talked a good bit about the late Johnny Cash. His influence was clearly evident in songs such as "Burn Down This House" and "Radio Operator," written in tribute to him. Particularly interesting was her story about her father giving her a list of 100 essential country-western songs to complete her musical education.

Her live song intros were insightful, and she broke up the monotony with some witty banter, such as thanking everyone for missing the Red Sox game to come see her. The background changed constantly throughout the performance, portraying various images of her past and generic scenes of roses and highways.

In addition to providing vocals, Cash played the acoustic guitar and the piano, although the latter only occasionally. She was accompanied by a three-piece band made up of drums, bass and electric guitar. The guitarist John Leventhal stole the show. Proficient in both country-western and rock, his solos easily outshined Cash's vocals and brought much-needed energy to the performance. Some songs were slow piano ballads, and some could be considered pure blues if not for a strong rock drum beat. Most of the songs, however, could most accurately be described as a fusion of country and rock.

This concert was the final engagement in the two-year run of the Black Cadillac tour, so for the vast majority of people who missed Saturday's performance, they will have to wait quite a while to see the singer-songwriter live.

Right before the encore, she announced that she would be taking several years off of touring to raise her two children. She is expected to release her as-of-yet untitled memoirs in 2008, raising her book count to three.

Cash's unique brand of country music was different from the majority of acts that come to the University, and her Grammy-winning status brought her the prestige to fill the room. All in all, the concert was heartfelt, insightful but just short of thrilling.

'Into the Wild' brings book to life

very popular crowd favorite, "Tattoos Fade." World Inferno had the whole floor moving throughout their entire set, with everyone dancing along and truly having a good time.

They also made sure they incorporated the audience as much as possible with plenty of crowd participation, including short "quizzes" to introduce some of their songs. One was, "Which do you relate to more: robots, ninjas or pirates?" They played all of the crowd favorites and had everyone jumping and clapping along to the beat. At the end of their set, after the band departed from the stage, the audience apparently wanted more because they chanted "One more song, hey!" for about five minutes strong, but eventually gave up when the band started removing their instruments from the stage and packing up.

After the World Inferno fans settled down and dispersed, and it got closer and closer to the start of the Bouncing Souls' set, the anxiousness in the room built to a high. The crowd awaited the start of their set by chanting "Ole, Ole!" which is one of the Souls' songs.

The band finally emerged onto the stage to a roar and deafening applause from the audience. They wasted no time and dove right into their first three songs without pausing between any of them to address the crowd or introduce the song names. The audience seemed ecstatic to be able to sing along as loud as they could in front of this band that they obviously loved. Every body in the room was moving along to the tunes and danced along to every song. The Souls played all of their biggest hits including the ever popular "I can on Sheena," which provoked an insanely loud audience sing-along, as well as "Sing Along Forever" and "Punks in Vegas."

Attonito was full of energy and bounced around on stage. The band looked like they were having just as much fun as the audience, and it was very evident that they put everything they had into their performance.

"It's interesting, we create something and what people (our fans) get out of it is a total surprise and unexpected," said Attonito in an interview after the show.

The band also played a handful of older songs, which earned a huge response from the crowd, who were obviously very appreciative that they band remained true to their roots. "The Gold Song" was a particular audience favorite as they sang along louder than ever, making it hard to hear Attonito over their voices.

At the end of the night, it was safe to say that everyone who attended that show emerged satisfied and content with the performances. All of the bands on the lineup put on an energetic and, overall, very entertaining show, leaving the audience wanting more.

J.K. Rowling outs Dumbledore

By Emma Libvergren
Collegian Staff

I ever pondered the sexual orientation of Albus Dumbledore?

"Harry Potter" author J.K. Rowling outed the headmaster of Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry to an audience of raptly attentive public school students at Carnegie Hall in New York City during the final event of her book tour this past Friday night.

During the appearance, Rowling read excerpts from the most recent and final installment of the series, "Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows." Among the numerous questions fired at Rowling from the eager crowd following the reading, one was whether Dumbledore had ever been in love.

"Dumbledore is gay, actually," Rowling said to the stunned listeners, according to one Newsweek reporter. Her announcement confirmed rumors that have been flying around for some time. Dumbledore's sexuality has been the center of heated debate and speculation among bloggers and fan site frequenters.

Following the uproarious response to the news, Rowling continued to explain that, in her mind, the Hogwarts headmaster had engaged in a love affair with Gellert Grindelwald, who appears in the final book as the Dark Wizard Lord Voldemort's forerunner. The book described the long-past battle of good and evil between Dumbledore and Grindelwald, but also hinted at a more tender relationship between the two. Now it seems that there was more to it than wand flicks and incantations.

The author went on to reveal to the audience that during the production of the sixth movie, "Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince," she had noticed a reference in the script to a girl who had interested Dumbledore in his past. Director David Yates was apparently one of the first to discover Dumbledore's secret after Rowling wrote him a note correcting the error.

The latter three books in the seven-part series focus heavily on Harry's relationship with Dumbledore, as well as Dumbledore's past. One particular observation on the part of fans is that in none of the books is there mention of influential women in his past, save for his mother and sister.

Critics can now add one more item to the "Reasons to Over-Analyze and Loathe the 'Harry Potter' Series" list.

The series, which has been under the scrutiny of parents and religious groups alike for its alleged support of witchcraft, may now be even further scrutinized after this surprising revelation. However, after selling a record 11 million copies within twenty-four hours of its release in July 2007, it is doubtful that those who censure the series will ever bolster enough support to stifle the craze.

Despite the possibility of backlash, Rowling laughingly joked that the fan fiction on "Harry Potter" Web sites will become even more explicit than it already is.

The U.S. tour, Rowling's first in seven years, kicked off on Monday, Oct. 15 at the Kodak Theatre in Los Angeles.

The tour continued to New Orleans on Thursday, culminating in two appearances in New York on Friday, one of which was the only opportunity for fans of all ages to attend. The other three events were, much to the dismay of adults, for schoolchildren only.

to martyr-like status. These people watch the movie as many watched "Passion of the Christ." Knowing the ending, they sit in the audience hoping the screen will effectively convey the emotions felt while reading the book, and Penn and company deliver.

Hirsch lost 40 pounds to play a starving McCandless. His emaciated frame floats down icy streams while nude, climbs mountains in waist-high snow and convulses with sickening verisimilitude while dying. His paradise betrays him; the limitless wonder of his beloved Alaska shrinks to the freezing cage of his weakened form.

McCandless' childhood ally and beloved sister (Jena Malone) provides much of the narration, and Pearl Jam's Eddie Vedder creates a soundtrack that seems to come straight from McCandless' journal.

"I've got my indignation but I'm pure in all my thoughts I'm alive," "Leave it to me as I find a way to breathe consider me a satellite forever orbiting…I know all the rules but the rules do not know me guaranteed."

His voice fills the spaces between shots of mountains and it bridges McCandless' conscious with yours. The simple but driving style of the short tracks make the movie a collective experience and heighten the empathy of an audience guilty to eat its popcorn while Hirsch creates new notches on his belt.

McCandless is considered a fool by many for his reckless decisions and courageous by others, who marvel in envy of his wandering spirit that seems to grow over the two hours and twenty-five minutes of the film. The side Penn takes is obvious, as Hirsch plays McCandless so closely that the audience members might forget they are in a movie theater in town (as I did).

The ending robs your breath, but his death didn't seem to serve as a warning, instead it made my return into civilization as difficult as McCandless' journey was. My freezing bus a 2-room on the 21st floor, the temporary space occupied is one of a thousand identical rooms that makes McCandless that much more admirable, Penn's film that much more realistic.

UM offense develops depth

10 different players account for all 10 Mass Attack goals

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

Shawn Saunders circled the Connecticut net and tipped a pass from senior forward P.J. Fenton past Connecticut goaltender, his goal lifted the Massachusetts hockey team over Connecticut, 4-3, Saturday.

The goal was the 10th scored by a UMass player through the first four games of the 2007-08 season.

It also ties Saunders for the team lead with nine of his teammates.

Through their first four games of the season, 10 different Minutemen have scored goals, but none of them have done it twice.

"It just shows that we have depth," sophomore winger Will Ortiz said. "We're a young team and no one is out just trying to get a goal. We're out there just trying to put points on the board as a team."

Coming into the season, UMass coach Don Cahoon knew what to expect form players like Ortiz, Fenton and Cory Quirk. All three ranked among UMass's top scorers last season prompting their pairing on UMass's top line since a season-opening loss to Clarkson on Oct. 12.

He also knew that over time his freshman class had the skills to be relied upon for consistent production; but it didn't take that long.

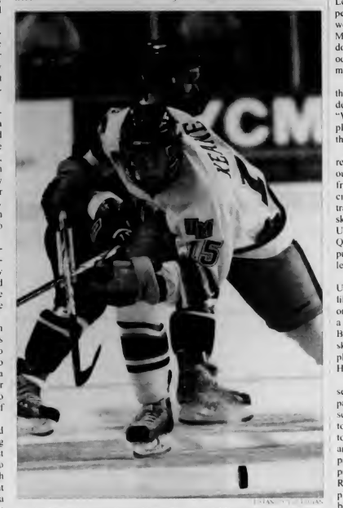
Brian Keane scored the game-winner in a win over Saint Lawrence on Oct. 13 and James Marcou leads the Minutemen with four points on one goal and three assists. Keane credited the simplicity of Cahoon's offense for the early success of so many players.

"Every game it seems like it gets a little easier to be in right spot at the right time. I'm getting more used to my line-mates now, it's been really good," Keane said after the win over UConn.

In their games over the weekend, the Minutemen did a terrific job of moving the puck in their own zone when they scored. They also exhibited the ability to beat defenders and opposing net minders in 1-on-1 situations.

With a 1-0 lead against UMass-Lowell, a game which ended in a 2-2 tie, Alex Berry intercepted a pass skated into the offensive zone. He moved toward the net, but two UML defenders sat in between him and their goal. Berry waited, moved toward the corner to draw the defensemen away from the net. Marcou trailed him and he backhanded the puck into the slot.

The shifty forward immediately broke to the net on the backhand. He drew the goaltender by moving the puck to his forehand before quickly going back to the backhand and sliding it into the net.



Early in the season, Cahoon plans to make changes to his lines to find the best competitions to move forward with. Possessing so many players capable scoring is a luxury the Minutemen have never really had. The depth will also give the Minutemen a cushion if any injuries occur.

UMass's fourth lines produced the final two goals including Saunders' game-winner against UConn. Senior Matt Burto accounted for another although it came on a power play. That power play has been the one area where the Minutemen haven't found their stride yet; the unit converted on two of its first 15 opportunities.

The absence of last season's point man Mark Matheson proved quite the task to replace. Fenton and senior captain Mike Kostka saw time in that role through the first four games, but failed to provide the puck advancing skills that Matheson developed while here.

Ortiz feels as though the UMass offense begins with superb defensive play to transition the puck into the offensive zone. So it seems like it's only a matter of time before a defenseman emerges as a the quarterback of the UMass man advantage.

Cahoon hoped would become part of the offensive identity.

However, that was all the scoring UMass could muster, and Lowell tied it up in the second period. As the ice conditions got worse in an inordinately warm Mullins Center, the game slowed down and got sloppy. A third period and overtime produced nothing more for either team.

"We didn't play good enough the first two periods," captain and defenseman Mike Kostka said. "We came out in the third and played pretty good, but other than that, we deserved what we got."

With just under seven minutes remaining in the first, Quirk dug out a goal on a misdirected shot from Fenton. At the left faceoff circle, Fenton fired a shot through traffic, but it deflected off Marcou's skate and trickled off to the left of UML goaltender Nevin Hamilton. Quirk was in perfect position to put the puck away for the early 1-0 lead.

Three and a half minutes later, UMass scored again, and it looked like they may run away with this one. Berry and Marcou broke into a brief 2-on-1 off a turnover, and Berry left the puck for his rookie skating mate, who finished the play by throwing the puck over Hamilton's blocker.

UMass-Lowell came out in the second period and responded with a pair of goals of their own. The first, scored by Barry Goers, was simply to fast for goaltender Paul Dainton to defend. Chris Auger wrapped around the net and centered the puck to Goers, who simply had to put it on net to beat Dainton. The River Hawks tied it with a power play goal when Maury Edwards beat Dainton through the 5-hole.

"The ice conditions were terrible," Kostka said, "but we knew it was terrible for both teams, so it's not to be used as an excuse. I think it got to us a bit, but at the same time I think we learned to push through something like that and do better."

The win over UConn was a lot different from the 8-1 drubbing UMass gave its regional rival last season. A younger, seemingly hungrier Huskies squad came to Amherst Saturday, and fought the Minutemen for 60 minutes, failing in the final two minutes to tie the game with the goalie pulled.

UConn struck first, scoring with the man-advantage midway through the first period. Justin Hernandez passed across the crease to Andrew Olson, who pushed the puck past a sliding Dainton.

The Minutemen tied the game less than two minutes into the second period. Matt Burto gathered the rebound in the crease off a shot by Marcou and stuffed it home to make the score 1-1.

Will Ortiz put UMass ahead eight minutes into the second frame. Nifty is a word used to describe a lot of goals, but it couldn't have been more appropriate than to describe the way Ortiz put the Minutemen up by a goal.

Carrying the puck across neutral ice, Ortiz deeked a UConn defenseman, pushing the puck up the ice and then skating right by the defender. He then laced a shot past goaltender Beau Erickson, beating him blocker side with a wrister from the high slot.

"It all began with a good defensive play by John Wessbecker," Ortiz said after the game. "I opened up for a breakout pass. I beat one defender in the neutral zone, and the D stepped back and gave me a chance to shoot. I just caught the goalie off guard with a quick release."

UConn tied the game again on a UMass defensive lapse, after a long rebound was left unattended. Jarrett Costello bounced a shot off Dainton's pads and the puck slid out to the left circle. Defenseman Justin Braun didn't make it to the puck in time, allowing Chris Ochoa to scoop it up, carry it left to right in front of the crease and beat Dainton glove side.

The Mass Attack scored two more early in the third (by Scott Crowder and Shawn Saunders) to jump out to a healthy, two-goal lead.

Coen leaves again with injury

line, Coen made a similar throw to a receiver he should trust by now, J.J. Moore. The senior captain caught seven passes for 97 yards. This was his first, and it put UMass up, 14-0.

He also became the second-leading receiver all-time in UMass history, passing former teammate Brandon London. Moore now has 149 receptions in his career.

Running the same post that Coen hit Omar on earlier in the drive, No. 12 found No. 1 as well, also in heavy traffic. Moore caught the ball at the three and ran around one defender before getting tangled up at the one; a third effort, and a long reach by the 6-foot-0 counterpart to Rancher, brought the ball across the goal line.

Despite losing a chunk of playing time to that nagging left knee injury, Coen has developed an incredible rapport with all of his receivers he threw just four incomplete passes in the first half. Coen and his many targets (eight players caught passes Saturday) are on the same page with their timing, the reading of defenses and what each player is able to do to get to the ball.

"It's not only a timing thing," Coen said after the game, "it's based on coverage. Mike's been great getting the ball in the air, as is J.J. I'm really proud of the way Mike played. He plays with great emotion and plays hurt. I'm really proud of that group of guys. We're getting better as the season moves on."

Northeastern drove to the UMass 22-yard line following the second Minuteman touchdown, but fumbled the snap on third-and-seven, and defensive tackle Brandon Collier fell on it at the 24 for the first of his two fumble recoveries on the day.

Coen then conducted a 76-yard march back down the field, capping it with a 1-yard plunge into the end zone by Matt Lawrence to put UMass ahead, 21-0. The big play on the drive was another long pass to Omar, this time for 29 yards over the middle. Coen split the safeties on the play, hitting Omar in triple coverage, with the cornerback tailing Omar and the two safeties.

Trio got revenge on the Minutemen by hitting the same post pass to Chris Plum. UMass safety Michael Meggett got caught with his eyes in the backfield, and Plum caught the ball wide open, going 29 yards to the 2-yard line. Two plays later, Orio scampered in for six to close the gap to 21-7. Koepplin's field goal on the next drive made it 24-7, the last score of the game.

Massachusetts football coach Don Brown and the Minutemen defeated his former employer, Northeastern, 24–7 on Saturday.

Minutemen execute best in red zone

Forcing turnovers, creating short fields and getting big plays (which UMass has gotten plenty of) will likely cut down on first downs and time of possession. Instead, if you want a good indicator on how a game goes for the Minutemen, look at third down conversions and red zone scoring percentage.

In each of the last six games involving the Minutemen, the side that converted a higher rate of third down opportunities won the game. Only the season-opening victory for UMass, 40-38 over Holy Cross, was an exception to that rule. Boston College's 24-14 victory over the Minutemen was due in large part to UMass converting 5-of-16 third downs, while the Eagles were 11-of-17.

Coen and the offense excel on third down, converting 42-of-97 opportunities good for 43 percent. Last season the Minutemen converted 39 percent of the time. Maintaining and keeping drives alive has allowed UMass to tack on much-needed insurance points.

The Minutemen converted on 8-of-15 third downs against Northeastern, including four times on the three touchdown drives in the first half. They were 5-of-6 in the first half total.

"When you're in manageable scenarios, good things can happen on third down," UMass coach Don Brown said. "I'm sure I am will tell you, you don't want to see those third and 10's. We've done a good job for most of the year.

"When we're on schedule, we're tough to beat," he added, referring to having manageable third downs. "When we end up with a penalty that derails us, it really comes back to stopping ourselves."

The penalties have haunted the Minutemen at times, but they've overcome many of those mistakes with clutch performances on third downs and in the red zone.

In 26 trips to the red zone this season, UMass has come away with 21 scores 181 percent of the time. Opponents have not capitalized on their opportunities as much, converting 17-of-26 times 165 percent. UMass ranks second in CAA in red zone defense. The Minutemen have forced key turnovers in the red zone all season, including three interceptions, one fumble and one turnover on downs.

Of those 21 red zone scores for UMass, 17 have gone for the touchdown. Getting those six points, as opposed to the three for the field goal, has proven big and put games away late this season.

Statistics can be misleading and things that decide football games don't always necessarily show up on the stat sheet.

Just ask UMass's opponents this season.

Playing under the lights in front of 1,651 fans, UMass limited the Billikens' offensive chances with strong defensive play. Saint Louis managed only eight shots, below its season average of 13. But the Billikens failed to convert on those eight strikes and their four corner kicks.

"Our players in the midfield were working very well together, making it very difficult to let people through," Koch said. "They covered for each other and marked the ball well. They made it very hard for [Saint Louis] to maintain the ball on our half of the field."

The Billikens entered the match ranked third in the conference in goals per game, averaging 1.88. The UMass defense also limited the team's top goal-scorer, midfielder Kyle Patterson, to a pair of shots.

Redshirt junior goalkeeper Zack Simmons converted two saves into his fifth shutout of the year for the Minutemen.

It was only the second time the defending A-10 regular season champions have been shutout this season.

Simmons received the only support necessary early in the second. Sophomore forward Mark DeSantis scored in the 50th minute off of a pass from sophomore forward Bryan Hogan.

DeSantis received the ball near the top of the 18-yard box on the right side and launched a shot toward the left side. Saint Louis goalkeeper Ross Kaufman got a hand on the ball, but it still found the back of the net.

DeSantis is now tied for the team lead in goals with three and is also tied with Hogan for most points (eight).

Sunday's game produced an identical score, but an entirely different result for UMass. Though playing a tight game with Charlotte, the Maroon and White failed to win its second road game in three days. Both teams play a similar style of soccer with an emphasis on defense, making for a low-scoring match.

"We had the opportunities to grab the win and unfortunately, we just didn't finish our chances," Koch said. "They scored one in the second half off of one of our mistakes. It was just a tough way to lose."

UMass out-shot the 49ers 9-7, but allowed a goal in the 67th minute.

Forward Chris Salvaggione capitalized on a pass from Luke Exley, deep in the offensive zone, for the game's only score. From the left side of the pitch, Salvaggione, the A-10's leading scorer, shot the ball over a diving Simmons into the right section of the net.

"We had a poor clearance and they were able to jump on it," Koch said. "One thing we talked about at half time was not giving up opportunities. Unfortunately, that was all they needed to create a chance."

The Minutemen's defensive strategy focused on preventing the 49ers from taking advantage of passing lanes in the middle of the field. Koch also stressed the importance of keeping his players in front of the ball on defense, especially among his center backs.

Despite having a demanding travel schedule over the weekend, Koch dismissed that fact as a reason for his team's loss against Charlotte.

"In the first half, we dominated the game a lot more than they did," Koch said. "I was surprised, since it was their home field and we were coming off tough travel. They seemed to be flatter than we were. In the second half, they came alive a little bit more."

Injuries won't stop for UM

BY STEVE GAMES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On a rainy Friday afternoon, the injured Massachusetts women's soccer team came up with a gutsy win over Fordham, 1-0.

If you looked at both teams on paper prior to the match, the Minutewomen didn't look to stand much of a chance. The month of October has been an up and down ride for this team with a long injury report full of starters and upperclassmen.

It all started last season when senior Tina Rodriguez went down with a torn ACL. UMass coach Jim Rudy hoped she would return to sure up his midfield, but she has not suited up this season.

Before this year, senior midfielder Christina Nunes went down with a sprained MCL. She returned a month later only to have another serious knee injury end her career. Last week sophomore forward Sydney Stoll broke her collarbone ending her breakout season and sophomore midfielder Meghan Gould suffered a concussion. Gould did not return to action over the weekend.

Fordham came into the game unbeaten in the Atlantic 10 and hoped to pick up another victory on the road against an ailing UMass team. UMass coach Jim Rudy had no choice but to use his entire bench and place one of his scorers – junior Vanessa Patry – in the midfield.

With key starters out Rudy looked to his young players to anchor the team. Sophomore forward Cristina Adams stepped in last week for Stoll and scored a goal and added an assist.

"They had to and they will have to, that's just the way it is," Rudy said about the younger players stepping up.

The rain continued to pour from the start to the end. Players were sliding everywhere and they had a hard time getting position to shoot.

About 27 minutes in, UMass came through with a goal from Adams. For Adams, it was her third goal of the season and a much needed boost to the offense. Adams had been solid replacing Stoll, unfortunately she has also made the all-injury team with a high ankle sprain on Sunday.

"Having younger players [on the team], they are going to make mistakes," Adams said. "It's fine; it's nothing because we have good players. If somebody messes up you have someone right behind them."

In the second half it looked like the Minutewomen were just trying to hold onto the lead. The ball seemed to be in the UMass zone the entire second half. But junior defender Melissa Toulouse made big play after big play. When the Rams offense was attacking, Toulouse closed in and broke up the play.

"She's big time, she's technical [and] she's smart," Rudy said.

Late in the second half, senior goalkeeper Kristin Walker left the game with a knee injury after a Fordham forward ran into her. Rudy thinks she might be done for the season, however she is still being evaluated.

While Walker was coming off the field, Rudy gathered the team and gave the young group a talk. He pointed at Rodriguez and reminded the team how she went down on the exact same day last season. After Rodriguez went down the team played poorly. Rudy did not want the team to fall again after losing a team captain.

Rudy addressed the team with the following.

"The question is who are you today? Who are you going to be? Are you going to allow this to happen? You guys eat together, you train together [and] you play together, so what's it about? The challenge was don't allow something like this to affect us like last year."

After the game, Rudy was upset about losing Walker, he has been with her for the past five seasons.

At this point in the game the team was holding on to 1-0 lead and sophomore goalkeeper Lauren Luckey entered the game. Luckey has seen action as Rudy has played her sparingly during the non-conference play.

Luckey made four saves to wrap up the win for the Minutewomen. When the game ended you couldn't really tell who won the game. The Minutewomen walked off the field fatigued and victorious.

It was the gutsiest win of the season. Unfortunately, they ran out of gas on Sunday against La Salle, losing 2-1. These injuries are not the normal bumps and bruises that are a part of the game, they are keeping players out for a month or longer.

According to Rudy, senior Britt Canfield is starting to feel fatigued. With all the injuries, she is being asked to do more than just scoring goals. Without Stoll and Adams the scoring load has fallen on Canfield. Early in the season, Canfield was passing well and making opportunities for other players, but now her primary targets are hurt.

If more players go down, Rudy could be forced to use his backup goalkeeper Melissa Jubinville as a field player.

meet her and Canfield knocked a shot by her. The ball dribbled into the penalty area toward the goal, but hit the left post and Sanger pounced on the rebound.

The game remained fairly quiet for the rest of the first half and much of the second until Hextall went back to work.

In the 79th minute, the Minutewomen found themselves in another fight for the ball in front of their goal. After the ball ricocheted off a handful of uniforms, Hextall managed to put a foot on it for her second goal of the game and 11th of the season.

The weather Friday was not as kind as yesterday, but UMass held on to a mud-drenched victory against Fordham.

"[The Rams are] a fairly direct team. They don't mess around with you too much," Rudy said. "They're going to be super hard to beat at home."

The game's lone goal was scored by UMass forward Cristina Adams. Just before the 27-minute mark, the ball received a number of headers from members of both teams near the goalie box. Canfield managed to head a pass to Adams. The sophomore took the ball into the right side of the box and launched a shot into the lower left corner of the net. It was her third goal of the season and her second goal in as many games. It was also her second game-winning goal.

Adams saw more playing time since Sydney Stoll broke her collarbone against URI, but suffered a high-ankle sprain yesterday and will likely be out of next weekend's games.

UMass ends play at Garber with win over UR

BY MIKE CONNORS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Richmond came into Amherst with one loss and a chance to elevate its team to the top of the Atlantic 10. When the game ended, the Spiders left the field frustrated and forced to watch the Massachusetts field hockey team celebrate its 1-0 victory.

"I really believe that this win is program-changing," UMass coach Justine Sowry said. "Richmond had given us a hammering for five straight years, and we've talked a lot this season about having belief.

"To hold strong throughout this game is absolutely program-changing. For it to happen on Senior Day, for the six seniors who put so much effort into their hockey career, I couldn't have asked for a better outcome."

The Minutewomen host Dartmouth on Wednesday at 6 p.m. Their final regular season game is Saturday at Rhode Island.

The Spiders (5-11, 4-2 A-10) defeated the Minutewomen (10-7, 5-1 A-10) eight consecutive times dating back to 2002 prior to Sunday's game, but are having an uncharacteristically poor season.

Midfielder Nicole Phelan picked up the lone goal of the game with eight minutes remaining in the first half. UMass earned a penalty stroke and Phelan's shot deflected off goalkeeper Becca Weaver into the upper left hand corner of the net; it was Phelan's second goal of the season.

No Spider player had such luck against Becky Letourneau. The senior goalkeeper was credited for two saves in the box score, but both were highlight-reel worthy. All six of Letourneau's wins are shutouts, and she has started every conference game over sophomore Sarah Williams.

One shot required Letourneau to dive across the goal to the lower right corner to fend off a shot. The other was a stick save late in the second half that helped preserve the win.

"My defense has been really good," Letourneau said. "We've had better communication and organization in the backfield. That's helped to reduce the amount of shots, and when they do get shots they're easily stoppable."

The defensive unit has locked down opponent's offenses thus far in A-10 play. Led by seniors Erin O'Brien, Kristina Do Rosario and Letourneau, the Minutewomen allowed two goals in their six conference games.

"These girls were so invested in the program," Sowry said. "They all came back in such great shape. They're really motivated to be the best they can be. Having three or four in the backfield, we've become one of the stingiest defenses in the country."

Mary Shea opened up the UMass scoring opportunities early in the first half. The junior brought the ball down the right side and crossed it in front of the net. Weaver was out of position, but no Minutewoman was in position to finish the pass.

They had another good chance with 17 minutes remaining. Cher King passed the ball to Kara Murphy, who sent a pass into the middle for Katie Kelly. Kelly was in position to score but was met by Weaver just as she was about to get a stick on the ball.

The only negative for the Minutewomen was injuries. Kaitlyn Orlando was on crutches, but Sowry expects her to return by the conference tournament at around 80 percent. Lauren Gillespie was not present but is expected to return this week.

Friday, the Minutewomen tallied a road win against Saint Louis (4-14, 2-4 A-10). Gillespie scored 2:54 into the game, and that was all UMass needed to hold on to a 1-0 victory. The goal was Gillespie's third game-winner of the year and her fourth overall.

Amy Wasserman made 14 saves to keep the Billikens in the game, but none of their five shots on goal eluded Letourneau. The 15 shots on goal represented a season high for the Minutewomen.

Though the game was low scoring, the early offensive production pleased Sowry.

"We had a very good first half with lots of great ball movement and opportunities," she said. "We had a 50 percent return in the circle, whether it be a goal, shot or win a penalty corner, and that's higher than we've ever had."

With the pair of wins, UMass qualified for the A-10 tournament. They are already joined by Temple. Both teams are 5-1 in conference play, and the Owls handed the Minutewomen their only conference loss on Oct. 12.

Seniors lead Minutewomen into A-10 Tourney

BY JUSTIN MCGRAIL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts field hockey team hosted the Richmond Spiders on Sunday at Garber Field. It was Senior Day for the Minutewomen and they came away with a 1-0 win because of the play of their veterans.

Richmond is a perennial Atlantic 10 powerhouse. Last week, it had a 44-game in-conference win streak snapped by West Chester. Coming off that loss, the Maroon and White knew the importance of the game.

"I think this is our biggest win because it's against Richmond and we haven't beaten them in five years. It's something that us as seniors have been looking forward to for three years," senior back Kristina Do Rosario mentioned after the game.

UMass struck in the first half when it was awarded a penalty stroke. Forward Nicole Phelan stepped into the circle to take the shot. She lined up in front of Richmond goalkeeper Becca Weaver. Phelan put the ball past Weaver in one fluid motion. The ball bounced off Weaver's blocker and found the back of the cage and gave UMass the early lead. In a scoreless game, taking a penalty stroke can be tense, but Phelan stayed composed.

"It's just walking up with a lot of confidence and knowing where you want to place the ball and just putting as much muscle as you can behind it," Phelan said.

On the defensive side of the ball, seniors Do Rosario and Erin O'Brien held strong and limited the Spiders to two shots on goal.

O'Brien made a key play midway through the second half. A Richmond forward broke away from the rest of the players and almost had a breakaway, but O'Brien charged up the field, stole the ball and cleared it down the field to prevent any further damage.

One of the keys to the success of the defense is the communication between the players. O'Brien said that they are friends off the field, which helps when they play together. The players know each other's tendencies so they spend less time worrying about what the other players are doing and focus on what's happening.

Goalkeeper Becky Letourneau made very important saves at crucial points in the game. The first came late in the first half when Richmond was awarded a penalty corner.

The ball was inserted at the top of the circle and a shot was rifled at Letourneau, who extended her body across the crease, then stopped the shot with her blocker and cleared the ball out from in front of the cage.

Late in the second half, Richmond was attacking and worked the ball into the circle. A Spider forward shot the ball to the far side of the net and Letourneau dove to her right and got her stick on the ball for the save. UMass coach Justine Sowry said that her save was one of the best that she had seen all season.

At the beginning of the year, Letourneau and sophomore Sarah Williams shared time in net for the Minutewomen. Williams suffered a minor injury before A-10 play started so Letourneau got the starting nod for those contests. Letourneau has led the Minutewomen to a 5-1 record in the A-10 and they are tied with Temple for the top spot in the conference. Over those six games, she has allowed two goals and improved her save percentage to .755. Sowry commented that Letourneau's improving play was due to her growing confidence, and that she has exceeded all expectations.

UMass came away with a win on Senior Day because of the veteran leadership and confidence under pressure.

Maroon and White drown Stony Brook

BY SAM EHRLICH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It seemed that everything went right for the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams Friday, as all four squads defeated Stony Brook in a dual match at Joseph R. Rogers Jr. Pool.

The Minutemen defeated Stony Brook 182-117 and the Minutewomen won 186-111.

Senior R.J. Rappe led the Minuteman divers with 208.90 performance; other UMass divers took third and fourth place out of six competitors.

Karen Upperco and Sarah Horstmann took first and second place as the only two competitors for the Minutewomen, who, together, outscored the three Stony Brook divers combined.

The Minutemen won 7-of-15 swimming events with sophomore Juan Moliere, freshman Brian Schmidt and junior Nate Bromage winning two events each.

"I thought the kids came [to play]," UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth said. "Moliere's a kid, but he really answered there, and did what we needed him to do."

The men actually had a scare as Stony Brook nearly erased the early lead. Lukasz Ochmanski – who won three events for the Seawolves – brought them within a point after destroying UMass competition in the 1000 and 200-yard freestyles, but behind Schmidt, Bromage and Moliere, the Minutemen got themselves back into the meet.

"We started out a little slow, so I had to gather them up to get them back into it," Yarworth said. "They were tired from training, and they weren't quite ready to go at the start, but then we kicked it in and did a nice job."

The Minutewomen didn't need any pep talks in their victory. They soundly defeated the Seawolves, taking 12-of-15 swimming events and both the one-meter and three-meter dives.

"We have a team that's pretty confident in what they're doing right now," UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb said. "We're just going to keep going, one week after another, but we have a big group that's going to go real fast at the end."

One thing that stood out for the Minutewomen was the fact that despite the huge victory, only three swimmers – sophomores Kathryne Chalkiss and Elizabeth Walsh along with junior Christa Narris – placed first twice. The win was a team effort, with eight different swimmers placing first throughout the afternoon.

"We've got a lot of diverse talent that can step up. There were different people this week than who stepped up last week," Newcomb said.

In particular, the men and women both dominated in the butterfly and breaststroke. UMass swimmers took the top finishes in all four butterfly events, and in 3-of-4 backstroke events.

Narris and Nate Bromage swept the butterfly contests and Brian Schmidt took both breaststrokes for the men while Tavis Potter and Jessica Staroselec split the breaststroke for the women.

"We have a great group of freshman breaststrokers that have blended in well with our upper class breaststrokers and I think they've done a good job of getting in and going," Newcomb said. "That's our largest group, and when we're working breaststroke, I've got two lanes of the pool devoted to our breaststrokers."

"I've kind of predicted the fly would be a dominating event for us, and the breaststroke has come through pretty well in intrasquad," Yarworth added.

Despite the win, neither side can claim to be ready for the ultra-competitive Atlantic 10 Championships.

"We've got a long way to go and one of the big things is that I'm looking at this season as 24 weeks, and where we are, six weeks into it, we have a long way to go," Newcomb said. "I know we have a lot of good competition out there and [the A-10 Championship] is going to be a great meet."

Yarworth agrees, and adds that the victory Friday was only secondary to their main goal of an A-10 Championship.

"You always want a 'W' – no one walks in trying to lose – but we have to keep the focus on the season," he said. "We might not always be as prepared for the dual meets, but we will be prepared at the certain checkpoints of the season and the A-10 [Championships]."

A checkpoint for both sides will come next week, as UMass travels to West Point to take on Army – a squad that beat the Minutemen last year.

"Right now we're just trying to get through one meet at a time, and we have a big one next week in Army," Newcomb said. "We were down to the last relay with them last year and I have a feeling that we will be down to the last relay with them again this year."

Redshirt senior running back Matt Lawrence ran for 111 yards on 25 carries in the Minutemen's 24-7 win over Northeastern on Homecoming Saturday. UMass is now 4-0 in CAA play and travels to William & Mary next Saturday for a showdown with Tribe.

Maroon and White beat NU, lose Coen

Collegian Staff

If the UMass faithful were fatigued after last week's quadruple-overtime victory over Villanova, it got plenty of rest after getting lulled to sleep by the Massachusetts football team's second straight win on Saturday, a 24-7 runaway over Northeastern.

Quarterback Liam Coen (13-of-17 passing, 191 yards, two touchdowns) injured his left knee for the third time this season in the second quarter and did not return to the game. Backup Scott Woodward finished the game, going 7-for-11 for 57 yards, but no scores.

All of the scoring took place in the first half. UMass (6-1, 4-0 Colonial Athletic Association) jumped out to a 21-0 lead before Northeastern finally responded with its only score, a 1-yard run by quarterback Anthony Orio (12-of-24, 162 yards, one interception). UMass scored on its first four possessions of the first half, with the fifth being a kneel-down to end the half.

Kicker Chris Koepplin capped off the scoring with a field goal late in the second quarter. Woodward did damage control in the second half, winning the time of possession battle. He held the ball for 18 minutes, 28 seconds, compared to the Huskies' 11:32, despite failing to reach the end zone.

Both squads moved the ball well, but Coen's accurate passing and a stingy red zone defense were the difference for UMass.

"It was a hard fought football game," UMass coach Don Brown said. "It was very physical, as it always is with Northeastern."

The Minutemen got on the board first with 9:36 remaining in the first quarter. On first-and-10 from 15 yards out, Coen found Rasheed Rancher over the middle on a crossing pattern.

The pass hit Rancher in stride, and the 6-foot-5 wide receiver beat everyone to the corner and crossed the goal line standing up.

On their next possession, the Minutemen found the end zone again, aided by a pair of tremendous efforts by wide receivers. Two Matt Lawrence rushes for no gain put the team in a third-and-10 immediately, but Coen put faith in third receiver Michael Omar.

With a heavy rush in his face, Coen looked to Omar, who was running a post pattern over the middle of the field. Tied up with his defender when Coen was about to be hit, the junior signal-caller threw it up anyway. With the ball in the air, Omar wrestled away from the defender and went up for the ball, coming down with it, along with a cornerback and safety on top of him.

Later in the drive on the Northeastern 25-yard

Statistics misleading for Lawrence, offense

By Eli Rosenwaike
Collegian Staff

Opponents of the Massachusetts football team gain more first downs, commit far fewer penalties and often lead in time of possession.

But when the final whistle blows and the fans head for the exits, they don't often have more points on the scoreboard.

That trend remained unchanged Saturday between the Minutemen (6-1, 4-0 Colonial Athletic Association) and Northeastern at McGuirk Stadium. When looking through the final statistics, one wouldn't expect such a one-sided affair.

But the Maroon and White dominated the scoreboard, winning the game 24-7, despite putting up similar offensive numbers to the Huskies. Northeastern had 22 first downs to UMass's 24 and were only outgained by 67 yards in total offense (315 to 382). The Minutemen also committed 10 penalties for 102 yards, but easily prevailed.

But the most important stat in Saturday's tilt was turnovers. Northeastern (1-6, 0-4 CAA) turned the ball over five times (three fumbles, two interceptions) despite entering the game with three turnovers all season.

But it's one thing to create a turnover, it's another to capitalize on it. The Minutemen won that game because they took full advantage of NU mistakes.

UMass scored its first touchdown of the afternoon following a poor snap that resulted in a 17-yard punt by the Huskies. Liam Coen led the offense 57 yards down the field in eight plays, giving them the 7-0 lead.

On the second drive for the Huskies, quarterback Anthony Orio fumbled on a 13-yard scramble and the UMass offense took over from its own 29-yard line.

Coen and the Minutemen capitalized again, driving 71 yards for their second touchdown of the first quarter, two Huskies mistakes, two UMass touchdowns and a 14-0 lead.

It happened again early in the second quarter, this time on a botched exchange from Orio and center Tyler Perkins. Again without good field position, the Minutemen marched 76 yards for a touchdown, giving them a commanding 21-0 lead.

Northeastern had three trips deep into UMass territory, and fumbled two of them away. The offensive numbers were quite similar between the teams, but the score was not.

This has happened all season for the Minutemen. They've continued to win games with inferior numbers to their opponents in first downs (trailing 145 to 130), penalties (78 penalties and 663 yards for UMass, 42 and 350 for opponents) and often in time of possession (ranked ninth in the CAA). Those numbers often don't tell the whole story.

UMass has won three games in which it lost the battle in time of possession, including twice when it trailed by over six full minutes (a 40-30 win over Holy Cross and the four-overtime win, 32-24, over Villanova). In last year's national championship runner-up season, the Minutemen only had the ball for 6th more seconds than the opposition

Mass Attack split pair at home

Soft ice slows UMass offense

The conditions were never perfect for the Massachusetts hockey team, but they were good enough for the Mass Attack to earn a winning record for the first time this season.

After beginning the 2007-08 season with a 1-1 road trip, the Minutemen returned to Amherst to open their home schedule inside the Mullins Center. UMass skated to a 2-2 tie with UMass-Lowell Friday night in the midst of some strangely muggy October weather.

Less than 24 hours later, the Minutemen Connecticut, 4-3, to complete the homestand.

UMass had no single hero in either game, as six different players scored goals, making a total of 10 different goal-scorers this season, with no one on the team netting a second yet.

"I don't know if it's by design but it speaks to the balance of the team," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "To have four lines that have chipped in and to have some choices in being able to put line-ups together, I think over time we might learn what lineups are going to be more effective against certain types of opponents in certain types of buildings."

Friday night against the River Hawks, the Minutemen started strong but could not close the deal on its sister university.

DeSantis, Hogan combine on game-winner against SLU

Though the school's membership in the Atlantic 10 conference is only in its third year, Saint Louis became a soccer power upon arrival. This weekend, the Massachusetts men's soccer team earned its first win over the Billikens in school history and solidified itself as a contender in the A-10. UMass emerged from a pair of road matches with three points and a share of first place in the conference standings.

The Minutemen (8-5-0, 3-1-0 A-10) gave No. 12 Saint Louis (6-2-3, 2-1-0 A-10) its first A-10 loss of the season with a 1-0 victory Friday. Yesterday, the team fell to Charlotte (7-5-1, 1-2-1 A-10), 1-0, snapping its-six game winning streak.

Minutewomen drop match at home

Explorers overcome early deficit at Rudd

A weekend of hosting produced a split decision for the Massachusetts women's soccer team as it lost 2-1 to La Salle yesterday after beating Fordham 1-0 Friday.

Two days after defeating the Rams (7-4-3, 1-1-2 Atlantic 10) on a Cristina Adams goal, the Minutewomen (8-4-1, 3-4-0 A-10) fell to the typical hard-nosed play of the Explorers (9-7-0, 3-4 A-10).

"It's a tough loss. They're a physical team ... they're big and strong," said UMass coach Jim Rudy. "There wasn't quite the anger that there was last year. But it was certainly physical."

The Maroon and White contributed the first goal after a scuffle for the ball in front of the net in the 30th minute. After it bounced off a handful of UMass and La Salle players, sophomore Katie Ruggles gave the ball a hit in an attempt at a cross. In trying to clear the ball, an Explorer knocked it into the La Salle net for an own goal. However, the tally was credited to Ruggles, the goal was the first of her career.

La Salle answered back less than seven minutes later. After a UMass foul, the Explorers' Melanie Gamble lined up for a free kick. The shot was blocked by the Minutewomen's wall and deflected off to the side. A La Salle player collected the ball and headed toward the net. A shot cross sailed into the penalty area where players from both teams began jockeying for position.

La Salle's Kristin Hextall leaped and headed the ball past a diving Lauren Luckey to tie it 1-1. Luckey, a sophomore, got her first collegiate start after starter Kristin Walker bails injured her knee against Fordham Friday.

Rudy said he would like some more evaluations on the injury to Walker, a redshirt senior, but mentioned she is likely out for good.

UMass forward Britt Cunfield missed a chance to give her team another goal minutes after the Explorers' tally.

In the 41st minute, the senior took a pass and broke down the right flank. La Salle goalkeeper Melissa Sanger came out to War reporter to speak on campus

By Jackie Hai
Collegian Staff

Dahr Jamail never intended to be a journalist, let alone a war correspondent whose reports from Iraq would become the basis for his recently released book. Yet that's exactly what this former mountain guide from Alaska — who will be speaking at the University of Massachusetts about his experiences tonight — ended up doing.

Jamail will appear in Bowker Auditorium at Stockbridge Hall at 7 p.m. as a part of his national book tour for "Beyond the Green Zone: Dispatches from an Unembedded Journalist in Occupied Iraq."

In November 2003, Jamail, fed up with what he saw as a misinformation campaign from the mainstream media to justify the invasion of Iraq, packed his bags and boarded a plane there in search of the truth.

"My intention was just to go for one trip," he said in an interview Thursday. "I was just going to go and send e-mails back home. I started out with 130 e-mail addresses of people that wanted it, and I would just go out on the streets and each day I'd send home an e-mail. I didn't even know what blogging was at the time. That's what it was: blogging without a blog."

After a couple weeks, Jamail started posting his dispatches to independent news portal electroniciraq.net, where he was picked up by BBC and the online newspaper The NewStandard News. Since then, Jamail's reports have been published in The Nation, The Sunday Herald, The Guardian, Foreign Policy in Focus and The Independent. He would end up spending eight months in Iraq over the course of several trips from 2003 to 2005.

Jamail's stories, often told in Iraqi civilians' own words, reflect a grim reality of what was happening on the ground in Iraq often glossed over by mainstream news. Among them are reports on the illegal use of white phosphorous weapons — incendiary weapons that burn on touch — by the U.S. military, the 2004 bombings of Fallujah, the plight of refugees, the rapidly deteriorating living conditions and the day-to-day bloodshed and violence.

Excerpts from the Collegian's interview with Jamail:

Jackie Hai: A lot of people describe you as an unembedded journalist. How do you define that?

Dahr Jamail: I actually describe myself that way as well, but more commonly just independent journalist. The unembedded comes from choosing to not embed with the U.S. military, but it's kind of become a more ubiquitous term. It basically has come to mean, at least to the alternative media in the U.S, to not being embedded with the corporate media. Meaning, you're not taking marching orders from a particular editor telling you what to write and how to write it. I think that's an important term. The other reason why I take such issue with the embedded reporters is that the program was set up by the Pentagon in the 1991 Gulf War as a means of controlling information.

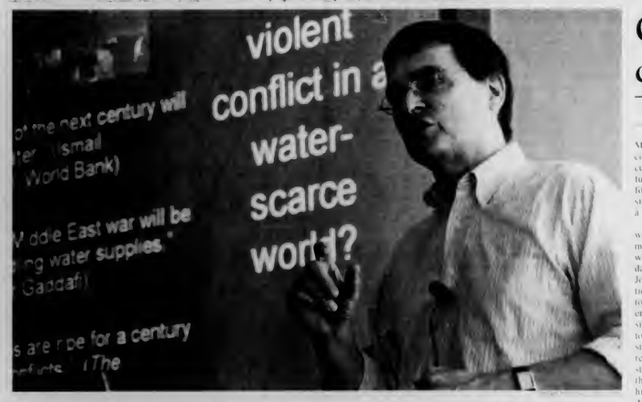
JH: The stories you sent back are those that often don't get told in the mainstream press. Why do you think that is?

DJ: Basically we have corporations controlling the major media outlets, i.e. the mainstream press. We have to look at the goals of these media corporations. And the classic example I like to cite is that NBC, for example, is owned by General Electric, one of the largest weapons manufacturers on the planet. It does not behoove GE to have a national television station showing what happens when bombs hit human beings, because it's bad for business. So that's a very direct influence over what that station is going to report and how they're going to report it.

JH: When you were out there doing reporting among Iraqi civilians, what was the response like to the fact that you were an American?

DJ: It was overall positive. Overall the Iraqi people were quick to differentiate between me as an American citizen and the policies of my government. Those people were very clear to make that delineation, so I didn't run into problems. There, of course, were a couple times where just because I was a Westerner, and it was clear that I was, that would raise tempers because people were suffering greatly and would see someone that maybe they could vent their anger on.

But people would meet me and see that I was there to take their comments and that I was going to report them, and that I wasn't just there to snap a photo or get a quick video bit and run back home into my guarded compound and upload it. That I was really there to tell their story and what was happening on the ground, and once that was established, I was treated well and people spoke with me very freely.



JH: What was your process for getting a story?

DJ: I would oftentimes have a story in mind and

Chancellor search continues at UMass

By Stella Cervasio
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts chancellor search committee met yesterday to discuss the vision they hold for the future of UMass and the necessity for a strong, dedicated and passionate leader to make this vision a reality.

Discussion of these goals, along with a look into current dilemmas the University faces, began with a presentation of campus data by non-committee members John Dubach, the chief information officer and special assistant to the chancellor, outlined current enrollment figures and emphasized the future chancellor's duty to help recruit and attract new students to the University while retaining the interest of current students. Dubach also emphasized the importance of aggressively hiring new faculty under the Amherst 250 Plan.

Vice chancellor for administration and finance Joyce Hatch discussed finances and facilities and charged the future chancellor with a responsibility to help complete the University's Capital Plan. The plan, more commonly known around campus as the "New Dirt" initiative, aims to spend $350 million on the renovation of campus facilities.

Vice Provost of Research Paul Kostek spoke of improvements to facilities as well, and said renovations are necessary to conduct high quality research and attract prestigious faculty to the University.

The next presentation, delivered by committee member and president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors Max Page, discussed six challenge points for the new chancellor from a faculty perspective. Page's presentation was hopeful and acknowledged that now is one of the best times for recruiting a new chancellor because of Governor Deval Patrick's stance on public education. Page said that Patrick is a "champion for public education" and that Massachusetts is already beginning to see the "fruits of his promise."

Other key points that Page pointed out were the need for stronger action on the Amherst 250 Plan, a stronger demand for state funding, the rebuilding of campus facilities, and greater student accessibility to the University regardless of race and class. Page also heavily emphasized the need for a strong leader, a topic which Chairman of the committee and Trustee Jennifer Braceras later called the theme of the meeting.

"It is key for the new chancellor to mobilize, mobilize, mobilize. We want an unstoppable force advocating for the good of UMass," said Page.

The presentations were formulated in hopes of familiarizing the newly elected search firm with the University's needs and goals. A seven-member panel reviewed six prospective firms after last month's meeting and presented their selection of the Isaacson, Miller firm to the board for the first time yesterday. The firm is being used to help the Board and UMass President Jack Wilson with the chancellor selection process.

Firm member John Isaacson, emphasized at the meeting that he and his team will act only in the best interest of the University by putting their personal interests aside.

"Search firms are always looked at suspiciously like pirates," said Isaacson. "Our job is to only operate with your blessing and your direction."

Isaacson gave the group a rough timeline of the selection process, which begins with a series of interested candidates in January leading to interviews in the spring. The group plans on presenting President Wilson with names of final candidates in April, from which he and the Board of Trustees will choose a chancellor.

Although Isaacson complimented the group for already being well organized and "admirably laundered" before his firm arrived, he still felt that the group needed to work quickly and efficiently to meet the timeline.

He said that the group's next step will be an input and listening session to hear the views of various constituencies, including athletic donors, staff and community leaders, alumni, students, state

Wood symposium

The first annual symposium on wood architecture engineering and construction will take place at the University of Massachusetts in early November.

The meeting will be focused on the newest innovations in wood architecture, engineering and construction. Speakers from the United States, Canada and parts of Europe plan to present. Both days of the conference also include lectures on the benefits of using wood and the new techniques developed to use it.

The lectures will touch upon contemporary wood architecture worldwide, wood and the environment, and technological advances in green buildings. For those who sign up for the symposium, a full-day workshop by the American Wood Council on the design of wood frame buildings is also offered. The new architecture is believed to demonstrate ingenuity and a new direction for the construction of buildings.

Natural resources conservation professor Peggi Clouston will organize the two-day lecture. She hopes that this lecture will "open the eyes of engineers to the idea of using wood." She also said, "We want to communicate to the people who decide what materials are used in building that wood is a great alternative. The things happening over in Europe are groundbreaking. We just want to get the word out."

Wood is quickly becoming the new material of choice in the days of global warming and greenhouse gases. This is because wood has a lot of environmental benefits. It is energy efficient to produce and use wood, it helps to absorb carbon monoxide, and it's renewable, recyclable and sustainable. All of these aspects are just additional to the beauty of most wood structures.

Slang shaped by youth, technology

By Cara Grandemann
Collegian Staff

Surely there are many people who are "multislackers" who just "marinate" their time away instead of going out and making some "Kraft singles," but one may know them as a time waster who just hangs out all the time and doesn't make any money.

The art of slang has been an ever-changing vessel of American communication. New words are annexed into the language daily, many of which are seen on Urbandictionary.com, a popular slang Web site that has more than one million entries and 2,000 more added daily, according to an article from the Boston Globe.

Some of the most recent entries include a "multislacker," who is someone who slacks on multiple things at the same time, "marinate," which is to hang out, and "Kraft singles," also known as dollar bills, as reported by CNN's Josh Levs.

"The term 'slang' is applied to words that are used in informal speech, but not formal speech or writing," said John J. McCarthy, a professor of linguistics at the University of Massachusetts.

Though current slang words are constantly changing, slang in the English language has been used throughout written history. According to a recent article from the Boston Globe, "The Canterbury Tales" by Geoffrey Chaucer incorporates slang into its pages.

"The slang word 'muck' meaning 'to verbally seduce,' first appears in English in 1426 in the word 'muckete,' meaning 'a pimp,'" said McCarthy.

Also, according to McCarthy, "Wicked, meaning very, and 'pucka,' meaning liquor store, are two slang words that date back to at least the 1960s, if not sooner."

Slang of the 21st century tends to be more abbreviated than slang of the past. According to McCarthy, this could be due to our generation's association with text messaging and the brevity involved when sending a short message.

Many slang words are also multisylgo out knowing "Okay, I need to interview some of these people, and then I want to go interview some doctors," depending on what the story was, and I would go out with my interpreter to start heading for that story. But then there was so much going on, and so much violence and turmoil, that six or seven times out of ten I would be just sideswiped by a totally different story and end up doing that.

Whether it was a bomb going off nearby and covering that, or meeting someone along the way who goes, "Well, yes, I can tell you about that story, but what's more important is this..." and I would agree and say, "Yeah, that is a more important story." More often than not, that's how it went. The stories kind of ran into me rather than me seeking them out.

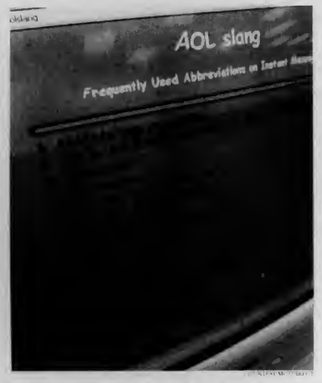
JH: Where were you staying during your time in Iraq?

DJ: It changed every trip, because the security situation was degrading so rapidly. For example, the first trip, I was with a lot of other foreign journalists in a totally unguarded hotel right in central Baghdad. My second trip, during the spring and summer of '04, I moved to a more off-the-beaten-path hotel and was one of the only people there, with a couple other Western journalists. And my third and fourth trip, the kidnappings and the bombings and such were so bad that I had to stay in a guarded hotel compound and just kind of sneak out of it every day with one of my interpreters to do my work.

JH: Was there ever a time that you felt that you were in danger?

DJ: Being in Iraq anywhere, especially during my last couple of trips there, that's just pervasive. That's every second. And that's not unique to me, that's the reality for every Iraqi person and every US soldier over there. There's literally no security. But on top of that, there were several instances of being near conflict, being near gunfire, having a car bomb detonate right near my hotel where it blew my door open and knocked down parts of my ceiling. So there were definitely several kinds of incidents like that as well.

JH: You mentioned in your blog that since returning to the US from Iraq, it feels like you're living in a bubble and Americans are disconnected from the realities of what's happening over there. Can you talk a little about that?



DJ: It's indicative of the fact that the mainstream media is only showing the Pentagon perspective and they're not showing consistently how bad the situation is on the ground for the Iraqi people, or how the ground troops – the guys actually having to go out on patrols – really feel about what's going on. Therefore, very few people here even pay attention to the war. Most of us can go about our daily lives and not even see one thing about it all day, if that's what we choose to do.

When you come back from a place like the Middle East where it's the opposite, where most people are very, very clear on what's happening in Iraq and they can't look away from it because it is shown – much more the realities of it – on Arab media, when you have millions of Iraqi refugees moving into refugee camps in or outside their cities, and everyone knows what's going on, you can see by the contrast why I made that comment.

JH: Ten years ago, did you ever see yourself doing this?

DJ: Absolutely not. Five years ago I didn't see myself doing this. It was not in the cards, not my plan. I had no intention of being a war correspondent and I certainly had no idea I would ever write a book. It's a very interesting time for me, but I'm really grateful that it's worked out so that I can do this and help get this information out to more people.

tural, spanning oceans and language barriers.

"It is very common for dialects and languages to borrow sounds, words or phrases from other dialects and languages," said UMass graduate student Kate Baldwin, who got her bachelor's degree in communication disorders.

"English got 'sushi' from Japanese, added 'bar,' and Japanese borrowed it back as 'sushibaa,'" said McCarthy. "Other aspects of language – pronunciation and grammar – are much more conservative over time."

However, there are preferred dialects from region to region. UMass sophomores Gerald Baldino and Casey Amster both like the word "sick," but Baldino, who is from Connecticut, prefers "mad" over Amster's preference, "wicked."

Also, Amster said, "My sister went to California and says 'hella' now. I don't like 'hella.' It doesn't work."

Within the English language, many dialects influence American slang, such as African American English (AAE).

"Sometimes languages borrow because they don't have a word for something, and other times it can be for slang," said Baldwin. "For example, in AAE, it is acceptable to drop the final consonant of a word. So, for AAE speakers, it is grammatically correct to say 'coo' instead of 'cool.' In Mainstream American English (MAE), if 'coo' is used, it would be considered slang because the final consonant deletion is ungrammatical in our dialect."

It is also important to consider which dialect the speaker is using.

"AAE is not slang, but some of its vocabulary we borrow is slang," said Baldwin. "Just because we use 'coo' as slang, it does not mean that it is slang when used by an AAE speaker."

In a recent National Public Radio broadcast, Mary Bucholtz, professor of linguistics at the University of California, Santa Barbara, researched the use of slang, particularly slang related to African American youth, among younger populations to identify who was a "nerd" and who was "cool."

"I was interested in the influence of African American youth culture on European American youth culture and it quickly became apparent to me that there was at least one group of kids at the high school where I was doing my research that was not engaging in African American youth culture at all," said Bucholtz. "And these were the kids that ultimately identified themselves to me and were identified by others as 'nerds.'"

According to Bucholtz, "nerds" tend to have anti-mainstream cultural views. "The [nerds] are kids who are deliberately constructing their identities against the 'cool kids' that they orient to in their social worlds," she said.

"It's kind of rebelling in a different kind of way," said student Amster, "I guess people sometimes think that they are above it."

According to Bucholtz, they do this by avoiding slang, as slang is "a big marker of youth culture."

According to the broadcast, Bucholtz concluded that "an easy way to divide the 'cool white kids' from the nerdy ones was to listen to words and phrases co-opted from black kids."

Slang also has many social codes that limit its use – for example, in front of parents.

"I don't [use slang] because I want them [my parents] to understand me. I'm not going to say 'Wow, Mom, this is some 'dank' macaroni," said Baldino.

So. Cali wildfire injures dozens

By Allison Hoffman and Gillian Flaccus
Associated Press

SAN DIEGO — More than a quarter-million people were urged to flee their homes across Southern California on Monday as wildfires blown by fierce desert winds raced over the landscape with terrifying speed, even leaping a 10-lane freeway in a matter of minutes.

At least one person was killed, and dozens were injured. Scores of homes and other buildings were feared burned, and thousands more were threatened as more than a dozen blazes formed a hellish, spidery pattern of luminous orange covering at least 310 square miles of the drought-stricken region.

"The sky was just red. Everywhere I looked was red, glowing. Law enforcement came barreling in with police cars with loudspeakers telling everyone to get out now," said Ronnie Leigh, 55, who fled her home at a mobile home park as flames darkened the sky over the nearby ridge line.

Firefighters who lost valuable time trying to persuade stubborn homeowners to leave — were almost completely overwhelmed as gale-force winds gusting to 70 mph scattered embers on the dry brush. California officials pleaded for help from fire departments in other states.

"A lot of people are going to lose their homes today," San Diego Fire Capt. Lisa Blake said.

More than 265,000 people from Malibu to San Diego were warned to leave their homes. More than 258,000 were told to flee in San Diego County alone, where hundreds of patients were moved by school bus and ambulance from a hospital and nursing homes, some in hospital gowns and wheelchairs. Some carried their medical records in large zip-lock plastic bags.

A 1,049-inmate jail in Orange County was evacuated because of heavy smoke. The prisoners were taken by bus to other lockups.

At San Diego's Qualcomm Stadium, home to the NFL's Chargers, thousands of people huddled in eerie silence on the bleachers, staring at muted TV news reports of the wildfires. A lone concession stand served coffee and doughnuts.

Many evacuees gathered in the parking lot with their pets, which were banned from the stadium.

The sprawling Del Mar Fairgrounds on the coast was also turned into an evacuation center, along with high schools and senior centers.

At least one of the fires, in Orange County, was believed to have been set. And a blaze threatening the homes of the rich and famous in Malibu might have been caused by downed power lines, authorities said. Another blaze was started by a car fire. Flying embers started new fires at every turn.

The blaze was burning so fast that authorities did not have an accurate count of how many homes had been destroyed.

"It was nuclear winter. It was like Armageddon. It looked like the end of the world," Mitch Mendler, a San Diego firefighter said as he and his crew stopped at a shopping center parking lot to refill their water truck from a hydrant near a restaurant. Asked how many homes had burned, he said, "I lost count."

Tom Sollie, 49, ignored evacuation orders in Rancho Bernardo to help his neighbors spray roofs on his street with water. His home was untouched, but he watched a neighbor's house reduced to nothing but the remnants of a brick chimney. "The house went up like a Roman candle," Sollie said.

He added: "If we weren't here, the whole neighborhood would go up. There just aren't enough fire trucks around."

The blazes in San Diego County and elsewhere erupted one after another over the weekend. Things got worse Monday, when several new fires erupted and other fires merged. Parts of seven Southern California counties were ablaze.

All San Diego police officers and detectives were ordered to return to work to help move people to safety and handle other fire-related emergencies.

Firefighters complained that their efforts to stop the flames were delayed when they were confronted by people who refused to leave their homes.

"They didn't evacuate at all, or delayed until it was too late," said Bill Metcalf, a fire boss. "And those folks who are making those decisions are actually stripping fire resources."

As flames, thick smoke and choking ash filled the air around San Diego County's Lake Hodges, Stan Smith ignored orders to evacuate and stayed behind to help rescue his neighbor Ken Morris' horses.

"It's hard to leave all your belongings and take off, and the bad thing is you can't get back in once you leave," Smith said.

Firm to select new chancellor legislators and Patrick's staff.

Isaacson also addressed the need to get the correct information and a good image out there to possible candidates. A couple members of the committee addressed their concerns in this area, as some educators outside of the UMass community have concerns about the departure of Chancellor John Lombardi. Committee member James Karam remarked on government and university disagreements and how the past conflict between the president and the chancellor has lowered prospects for the position.

In order to mitigate these hesitations, Isaacson has suggested an ad that depicts what the University stands for and what its members are looking for in a future chancellor. Isaacson set goals for the next meeting, where he wants members to come together to find themes for position qualities that they can all agree with. He also wants members to come up with some names of possible candidates that they want included in the chancellor search.

Yesterday's meeting came to a close with a final presentation on leadership, given by committee member and Chancellor Emeritus of UMass Medical School Dr. Aaron Lazare.

Lazare said it is important that the next chancellor is someone who is passionate, trustworthy and proud of the UMass mission. He felt that this a way the committee can make sure the candidate meets these qualifications is to look at what the candidate stands for and what they have done in their lives.

Braceras agreed, "Leadership, not a litmus test, should be determined to see if a candidate is right for UMass. We need a strong chancellor, and we can't really assess that until we get the candidates in the room."

"If we could walk away with one thought, it is that leadership itself is an important quality," Braceras said. "We want someone who is creative as well as bold in their leadership."

MA drug stats shooting up

Joshua H. Wilder

It comes as no surprise that every state in this fine country has its fair share of problems. Massachusetts, a state with great historical sites and landmarks, a liberal atmosphere and unbelievably crazy weather, is no exception.

Most individuals you ask would tell you that this state's major problems have to do with the black hole of money called the Big Dig. Some might say that inner city violence and a looming casino proposal are the largest problems. But perhaps the biggest and most pressing issue is being swept under the rug.

The Office of National Drug Control Policy's report recently found that Massachusetts has one of the highest rates of illegal drug use in the country, with heroin use reaching epidemic rates.

In fact, heroin-related deaths in the state rose 76 percent over the past three years, and more than half of those who reported to alcohol or drug treatment programs last year were addicted to heroin.

The report cited the drop in price of heroin on the streets as one of the key reasons for the increase in drug use. Massachusetts law enforcement officials have said that the street price of heroin has dropped to an average of just $4 per bag, down from $40 per bag in the 1990s.

It continued to mention how Columbian drug lords have set up distribution centers throughout the state in cities like Springfield, Fitchburg, Lawrence, Lowell, Haverhill and New Bedford. But what is truly disturbing is how these dealers have been targeting the youth in the state.

According to a Boston.com article, heroin dealers have been working to attract younger customers by giving them free samples of the drug in colorful packets decorated with cartoon characters such as Batman. This unbelievably twisted marketing campaign has worked – the article reports that New England, and Massachusetts specifically, has the highest rate of drug use among teenagers in the nation.

These statistics are truly shocking on many levels. For one, the fact that drug dealers would actually try to get young people addicted to the most dangerous drug on the market is frightening. Occasionally, it can be argued that drug dealing is a victimless crime, but when you are giving out an addictive opiate to children, you have certainly crossed the line.

It is difficult to believe, but Massachusetts is now the heroin capital of America.

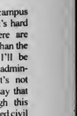
With just about every other commodity's price rising rapidly these days, the fact that heroin has become so cheap is only making this problem worse. When a bag is cheaper than a pack of cigarettes, it lends itself to abuse by many people. And in fact, that seems to be the trend in the Bay State.

The report stated that not only is the drug becoming cheaper, but also more pure. In New Bedford, street heroin has reached 90 percent purity, as compared with an average purity nationwide of 57 percent, according to the DEA. The price is dropping and the high is rising, this spells disaster.

What is truly shocking about these reports is that most students at UMass had no idea such an epidemic was taking place. When is the last time you overheard classmates recapping their weekend by saying, "I had a great time, we shot up a few bags of H?" Sure students here can drink their body weight in alcohol and riot, but it doesn't seem like we have a campus full of dope-sick addicts.

Unfortunately, it seems like the rest of the state is heading down that road. It is difficult to believe, but Massachusetts is now the heroin capital of America. Not an accomplishment to put up on the refrigerator by any means. But the next step is identifying a way to reverse the trend.

Northampton is one of the various cities that have a clean needle exchange program to prevent addicts from getting Hepatitis C. However, it is questionable if this helps curb heroin use in the state.



Any such program seems to be encouraging people to get high, but because heroin use is on the rise, it seems almost inevitable that people will be using dirty needles.

It seems as though the best way to turn things around is by educating young people about the dangers of injecting opiates. Letting them know about the extent of the risk they are taking would make them less likely to try heroin in the first place.

We, as a state, need to crack down on heroin dealers who are peddling products to our youth. They are remorseless, money-hungry people who have no problem destroying lives to make a few bucks on the side. Hopefully, our state government can invest funds into this cause to prevent things from getting worse.

China is worse

S.P. Sullivan

Particularly on a campus like ours, sometimes it's hard to remember that there are worse things out there than the Bush administration. I'll be glad when the current administration is gone – it's not even controversial to say that anymore. But although this administration has eroded civil liberties to a startling degree, it's only going to take an election – and not a coup – to set things straight.

Today's global scene, however, is packed with so many demagogues saying so many absurd things, one would think they had never heard of YouTube and the instant-replay capabilities of the internet age.

President Bush may be opposed to gay marriage, and many of us may find it ridiculous, unjust and backward. But at least he acknowledges the existence of homosexuals. At his notorious recent visit to Columbia University, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, when asked about his treatment of women and homosexuals in his country, denied the existence of the latter.

The crowd laughed, and Ahmadinejad grinned sheepishly. Americans must be pretty easily amused, he seemed to think. Wait 'til they hear the one about the Holocaust that never happened.

Our leaders lie, a lot of them cheat and even a few of them flat out steal. But they don't ignore the elephant in the middle of the room. Our electoral system and our free press – though not in the best of shapes – wouldn't allow it.

When President Bush recently hosted a visit from the 14th Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso, who was slated to receive a Congressional Gold Medal, the Chinese government was outraged. To the Chinese government, he isn't just a political exile; he's the worst kind of villain.

"We are furious," Zhang Qingli, a Tibetan Communist Party leader told the Chinese press. "If the Dalai Lama can receive such an award, there must be no justice or good people in the world."

Anyone who has heard a thing or two about what has happened to Tibetan exiles knows what the Chinese government considers "justice."

The Dalai Lama isn't some radical firebrand – he's a religious leader who advocates nothing but peace.

Regardless of what your political or religious sensibilities may be, I'd say it's relatively difficult to vilify the Dalai Lama. I could say Mr. Rogers was a traitor to the United States government and I could say it with conviction, it wouldn't make it true. The Dalai Lama isn't some radical firebrand – he's a religious leader who advocates nothing but peace.

On Sunday, Oct. 21, the Washington Post ran an opinion piece by the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader entitled, "My Vision of a Compassionate Future."

"I can feel that you cannot have much of an effect," he wrote, "the next person may also become discouraged, and a great opportunity will have been lost. On the other hand, each of us can inspire others simply by working to develop our own altruistic motivations – and engaging the world with a compassion-tempered heart and mind."

I know what you're thinking – he sure sounds like a threat to a nation's sovereignty to me, too.

Of course, our politicians do their fair share of obfuscation. The Bush administration sold the Iraq War on a still-unclear tie between the September 11 attacks and Saddam Hussein. But at least he blamed things on a bad guy. Presidential candidates do a good job of swift-boating each other's reputations, but that's an unfortunate, side effect of our tradition of political theater.

We also keep our exiling to a minimum.

The internet age was supposed to put an end to large-scale government propaganda. Surely no organization could get away with espousing untruths when their constituents have access to a wealth of information. But countless governments all over the world – including the Chinese – have censored and restricted internet access under the guise of blocking illicit materials from finding their way to the people.

Government-sponsored "news" has also had a hand in the pageantry. Until the advent of Al Jazeera, the grossly misunderstood independent news organization in the Middle East, the Arab world had to rely on manipulative government-endorsed news sources, or the often mismanaged Mid-East reporting of western organizations.

In a rare display of character, the Bush administration did right by the American people and the exiled people of Tibet by awarding the Dalai Lama – purveyor of little more than what Elvis Costello described as "Peace, Love and Understanding" – with a Congressional Gold Medal.

Although the United States hasn't been able to make similar displays of character by putting pressure on China to end the situation in Darfur, or on allies in Saudi Arabia to stop funding terrorists, we realized something that no legitimate government can ignore.

It's hard to make a villain out of someone whose only message is peace.

Pull out now, prolong the war

Greg Collins

The disgusting display of boots on the Student Union lawn last week in opposition to the Iraq War raises the question of whether particular political activists live up to the goals they profess to combat.

Frequently, they will describe their group's purpose as being anti-war, fighting poverty, helping the poor and promoting tolerance. These designations also reflect how the media perceives them. But often there is a difference between their self-proclaimed goals and the actual results engendered by the policies supported by this group.

Therefore, the authenticity and effectiveness of anti-war groups should be evaluated not based on their declared intention – which is to end war – but rather on whether the policies they champion actually would end wars. In the case of such groups, the policies they currently embrace will not end the Iraq War or the "war on terror," but prolong them.

For instance, the stated intention of anti-war groups such as United for Peace and the Campus Anti-War Network is to "end the war now," by immediately withdrawing American troops. The Radical Student Union (RSU) also supports this proposal. The question, then, is whether ending the American presence in Iraq will in fact stop the Iraq War.

If one defines ending a war as removing troops from a hostile area, then redeploying American forces out of Iraq would accomplish this stated intention. Of course, this description is far too simplistic to encompass the complex elements of permanently ending a war.

If the RSU defines ending a war as permanently defeating the specific enemy targeting American forces, then immediate troop withdrawal would not achieve this goal. Most scholars and military personnel with expertise in the Middle East acknowledge that doing so would allow Iraqi, Al Qaeda, Syrian, Hezbollah, and Iranian terrorists to overrun an already unstable country.

The ideas proposed by groups such as the RSU would encourage a consolidation of terrorist communications operations and training camps and would allow terrorists to expand their influence throughout a region already susceptible to attacks on Americans, Jews and innocent Muslims. American troops may not be in this area, but war will undoubtedly continue in Iraq.

Even though groups like the RSU claim they are anti-war, it would be more accurate to categorize them nowadays as being pro-war, for the policies they support would directly lead to a further prolonging of the Iraq conflict. This dichotomy exemplifies the stark difference between their stated intention – ending the war – and the actual consequence resulting from this intention – extending the war.

A more genuine anti-war group would embrace the position that American troops should not leave until Iraq is a functioning democracy able to defend itself against the very same Muslim terrorists who would exacerbate the war if left unchallenged.

Doing so would enhance the likelihood that Iraqi security will become permanent, thereby increasing the chances that American troops and civilians will be protected from possible terrorist attacks. A safe, stable and secure Iraq would do more to end the Iraq War than immediate troop withdrawal.

American troops may not be in this area, but war will undoubtedly continue in Iraq.

So how can groups claim to want to stop the war when the policies they support – bringing troops home immediately – would directly intensify that war and the war on terror in general? This is because anti-war groups focus solely on their immediate goals and not on the consequences of the policies they support.

The significance of labeling groups as anti-war or anti-poverty transcends semantics. Once we distinguish policy results from policy intentions, we can understand that the best ways to produce a desirable political result may differ from previously accepted paradigms.

For instance, Lyndon Johnson's War on Poverty initiatives were intended to reduce poverty by expanding social services to the poor. Yet real-world consequences show that there was no substantial connection between these programs and the alleviation of poverty. Economist Thomas Sowell has noted, for example, that the poverty rate for black families declined at a faster rate before the growth of these social welfare policies ever began.

Johnson's policy intentions did not only fail to match up with policy results in this case, there were also unintended consequences from the War on Poverty's government programs, such as the rapid increase of out-of-wedlock births and murder rates.

Efforts to carry out noble goals, like ending war and helping people rise out of poverty, will be beneficial only when policy intentions can be clearly distinguished from policy results. If we cannot identify this difference, then these policies will continue to intensify the problems they hope to conquer, such as prolonging war or promoting poverty.

In applying this reasoning to the Iraq War, if anti-war groups are truly committed to ending the conflict, then they should support a continued troop presence until the country is stable. This policy would accomplish their original intentions and legitimize the authenticity of the anti-war group.

After all, results, and not lofty proclamations, are what matters the most.

SGA thinks potential rioters should reconsider

Dear Editor,

Last night, as hundreds of students surrounded my building and began celebrating the Red Sox ALCS victory, I began to feel a great sense of foreboding. My name is Kevin Boldue, and as an SGA Student Senator representing the Southwest South living area, I feel a deep sense of commitment to my fellow residents. I am very concerned that the actions of a few members of the campus community could potentially affect all of our lives in the coming years.

Watching from my room on the eighth floor of the John Quincy Adams Tower, I watched as the students grouped below urged and chanted for others to "Come outside!" and yelled negative comments to those who chose to celebrate within their buildings. After a number of pro-Red Sox and anti-Yankees cheers, the large crowd below dispersed within about an hour, having caused nothing more than an annoyance.

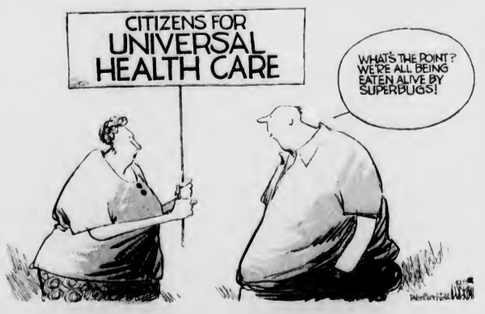
Contemplating the previous night's events over lunch today, I began to realize the potential disasters that could have occurred last night. I contacted a fellow student senator, Matt Giancola, and as we began to discuss the events of the previous night and the coming weeks, realized what an important and pressing issue this is for the university.

For this reason, we have written this letter to the community today. The University of Massachusetts has a history of rioting. While this past Sunday will not be remembered as a tragic night for our school, the coming weeks present opportunities for not only joyous celebration, but also for events that could potentially lead to destruction within our university community.

As University of Massachusetts students, we are part of a community larger than ourselves. Our actions directly influence this community, and every student can benefit from participation in campus life. During the coming weeks, our community will be going through a trying period. It is our responsibility as UMass students to make sure that we make it through this without further conflict.

The Boston Red Sox will be playing in the World Series. For many of us, this will be one of the most exciting weeks of our lives. However, we must remember that the outcome of the World Series has very little to do with how we function as a university. A victory is cause for great celebration, while a loss will be disappointing; however, there is no need for our school to suffer, whatever the outcome.

Last night, students gathered in Southwest began chanting, "Whose school? Our school!" This was presumably a response to the police presence in the area. I take these words in a very different way. This is our school, and many of us are proud to call it that. Why then do some seemingly wish to damage the very community they are so proud to be part of? The University of Massachusetts is made up of many different parts, students only being one. A Red Sox-inspired riot is not about defying police authority or campus administrators, despite what students chanted Sunday evening. Both are vital and necessary parts of a university community.



Instead of further separating parts of the UMass community, why not celebrate a Red Sox victory together? Celebrate with your friends and with your neighbors. Call friends from home, and all across Red Sox Nation I tell me I know I'll be pumped. Please, however, do not in any way let your actions damage this university.

Physical damages are only the beginning of the damages a riot will cause. The reputation of the university will suffer and relations within the campus community will become strained. Police officers will spend less time protecting students on campus, and more time preparing evidence for cases dealing with the senseless violence a riot could cause.

Administrators will have less time to work on innovating and improving campus life and academics because they will be delivering disciplinary sanctions to those involved in the riot. A Red Sox riot on the University of Massachusetts campus can in no way bring about anything positive for our community. In the coming weeks, I urge you to remember this.

"Whose school? Our school!" As students, we are all heavily invested in the university, and I know there are many who only wish the best for it. Remember your commitment to our community in the coming days. Thank you. Show some pride UMass. Go Red Sox!

Artists speak at "Found" display

Sue Katz and Rebecca Muller show off work at Gallery A3

BY ANDREA MURRAY
ASSISTANT ARTS EDITOR

Gallery A3 on Amity Street in downtown Amherst hosted an open forum with artists Sue Katz and Rebecca Muller last Thursday night. Katz and Muller's show "Found" is currently on display at the gallery. Friends and art lovers alike listened as Katz and Muller described their processes and how they felt about their own work.

Both Katz and Muller shared an attraction to timeworn materials. Their work is crafted from objects that are lost and eroded by weather and time. The objects come from a variety of places, including dumps and companies that are throwing out scraps of materials. They state that "found," describes the process of discovery and the embrace of fortunate accidents in art.

"I was a potter for 20-25 years and my hands gave out and I said well, I'll be a fine artist," said Katz, a graphic design teacher at Greenfield Community College.

Katz, who has no formal training, describes her work not as painting or sculpture but as "constructs." Some of her most unique materials include fabric from a flea market in Kyoto, Japan and a worn yellow-divider strip from the road. She said that she is always thinking about technique, media and materials.

"I think being an artist is narcissistic. So I'm always asking about what I'm doing, how I could make a difference, I might know ahead of time what I'm doing but usually I don't," she said.

A trip to Japan heavily influenced her work. Japanese tatami mats became a fixation and inspiration for her work. She made a series of tatami-mat drawings in which she combined wax and spices to create the picture.

"I went to Japan and the first day we were there we went to an architect who reassembled old homes," she continued, "I walked into this living room [constructed with tatami mats] and I was overcome. It was so beautiful; a sense of harmony just hit me over the head."

The first attendee to speak up told Katz," I don't agree that art is narcissistic. So much of what we call culture is art. It doesn't solve world hunger but it certainly has an important place in the world."

Another audience member said that he could see her graphic design experience coming through in her work because it was so precise and organized. At first, Katz was a little upset that her work didn't seem organic.

"That's just the way you are and you work," a friend assured her.

Muller told Katz that she also doesn't always know what she's doing and doesn't always see the meaning in her work until the final product.

Rebecca Muller then switched places with Katz and began to talk about her work. She uses lots of mesh, copper rust, grids, wire and even old materials like water bubbles and cars. She described the juxtaposition of their work as improvisational versus composed and jazz versus classical.

Muller recognized that although she and Katz use very similar materials, their work couldn't be more different. Muller also described her work as out of the ordinary, saying she thinks of it as "3D paintings." She, too, is a former potter turned fine artist. She says that her favorite material is mesh and it is definitely seen throughout her work.

"I use mesh and the grid as repetitive patterns that create structure and order against which to improvise," she said. "I think that it [the mesh] embodies our lives."

She stressed that she barely ever buys her materials they are almost always found. She likes to find materials on her own as opposed to others bringing them to her. She doesn't always find titles for her work until far after they're finished.

"After x and after y and after z, this is what is left. I don't think that's a negative thing," Muller said.

She went on to explain titles of specific works for those who asked, including "The Lesson of Sevens," "Has Beauty Been Enough" and "Slow, Clear, Voice."

Gallery A3 is located at 28 Amity Street 1D (around the corner from the Amherst Theatre) and is open from 1-7 p.m. Wednesday through Sunday. "Found" runs until Oct. 27.

Girl in a Coma proves talent to fans with new album

BY STEVEN STAFFORD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Attention all hipsters! This is the band that you've been waiting for. Girl in a Coma. First of all, they are named after the Smiths' classic, "Girlfriend in a Coma," which should give them automatic street credentials. Second of all, they're from San Antonio, Texas. That's right, the South. Who would've thought? I'm wondering how many indie kids have George W. Bush on their T-shirts, this irony can only add to their awesomeness.

In short, Girl in a Coma is everything that the Donnas should have been. Lead singer Nina Diaz has a perfect howl, the kind Karen O only wished she had. The songs are not melodic, but they don't have to be. Somehow, the band makes it work, with the energy of the Rondelles and the production style of the Pixies.

So why haven't you heard of them? Well, it's probably because none of them look like Beyoncee or J-Lo; this is an act that needs to be taken on the actual merit of their work. They don't have an army of songwriters, producers and makeup artists behind them; they get by on their passion and energy. It's too bad for them and all music listeners that this is a time when singers are mostly just models with bands. In this climate, Girl in a Coma is a kick in the backside. They are too cool for the charts and way too cool to be labeled a "chick band."

The opening song from their album "Both Before I'm Gone," entitled "Clumsy Sky," starts off pretty and ends up Mersey-beat rocking under great harmonies. It already begs to be a girl-punk classic and is sure to make you dance around in your room in your underwear, air-guitaring.

Just when you need a breather, they kick into "Say," a dance-beat punk track with outstanding guitar tone which turns into a weird, scary rip-off of "El Scorcho."

As if that wasn't enough, "Road to Home" follows up, bringing to mind the Cranberries at their finest, leading into "Syhil Vain Was Ill," a Franz Ferdinand-like dance romp, charged by a passionate, desperate Diaz vocal. But they haven't shown all of their cards yet.

"I'll Ask Him" breaks into a 1960s-ish tune, powered by another phenomenal vocal performance. "Their Cell" rocks out big time, but goes on too long and the effect becomes diluted. The band returns to its Mersey-beat awesomeness on "In the Background" and "Mr. Chivalry" with another dynamic performance from Diaz. Perhaps with another tip of the hat to the good-old days, she drenches her voice in some healthy slap-back echo.

"Race Car Driver" sounds like the Pixies if Joey Santiago could actually play the guitar, the listener should crank the bass on this one.

"Celibate Now" brings us yet another side to the band, in 3/4 waltz-time. One might say that waltzes are out of fashion, but the band's unusual passion makes it rock. And just when you're reeling from that, "The Photographer" comes on, a totally rocking piece featuring octave chords of the pop-punk style, but with Girl in a Coma's unique emotion and snarl.

Finally, you can cool off and have a cigarette the band closes with "Simple Man," with backward vocals at the beginning and end. The song is a mellow but very appropriate ending to a fast-paced disc.

They might just be better than Sleater-Kinney, Bikini Kill and Le Tigre; the Smiths' influence is not as obvious as one would assume from their name. Instead of Marr's jangle and Morrissey's whine, they have all the raw energy and guitar tone of The Like, Neil Young or Nirvana. Kurt Cobain would probably listen to this CD while mowing his lawn. Yes, that is a compliment this CD is so cool that not even hipsters or pretentious music listeners know that it exists. So now is your chance to be ahead of the curve for five minutes. If this band keeps it up, they might just be the chosen darlings of the sunglasses-wearing, Central-living, indie scenesters. At least, they should be.

In "The Awakening" Melissa Etheridge talks about life, love, God, sexuality and homophobia. Etheridge is a well-known lesbian singer songwriter who was recently diagnosed with cancer.

BY STEVEN STAFFORD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Melissa Etheridge is one of the most famous and popular female singers of the past few decades, making money not by her looks, a sex tape, a reality show or a feud, but on her own, raw talent. Her newest release, "The Awakening," is her first all-new CD since battling cancer. And it is an appropriate title every song on the CD either explicitly or implicitly is about God and love. Also, it refers to Kate Chopin's 1899 book of the same name, a widely-studied piece in the proto-feminist canon.

Her gritty voice sings about, in no particular order, God, organized religion, homophobia, love, reincarnation and sex, opening the album with "All There Is," a Revolver-influenced snippet of a song, with backwards guitar and Eastern timbre, leading into "An Unexpected Rain," an impressionistic, melancholy standout. The song feels dark, but the lyrics fail the music. Though passionate, it is not passionately sung. After all, this is pretty much just another song about bedding a groupie. This is a big missed opportunity it runs on too long without building to a climax.

Luckily, she redeems herself with the catchiest song on the disc, "Message to Myself," a Beatles-influenced pop track. One must complain, however, that she seems to have a very narrow vocal range.

Etheridge displays a loud and clear John Lennon influence, as displayed in "God is in the People," a very short, simple track against organized religion. She sings it with all the passion and intensity that would have made Lennon proud.

"Map of the Stars" is the best example on the CD of Etheridge's storytelling ability. The song is about someone trying to become a star and the hardships that come with it. This may be the best song on the whole album, featuring poignant and bitter commentary on the ideals of young women and Hollywood – "She wants to be a star so she eats a little less."

Curiously, she follows this with "Threesome," in which she sings, "I don't want to have a threesome/I don't want to sleep with nobody else/I don't wanna be a swinger I'd rather keep you all to myself." Though it may cause a few giggles, it is very catchy and easy to sing along to. However, it's pretty awkward when you find yourself singing "I don't want to have a threesome" in public. Thanks for letting us know, Melissa. Finally, she adds "...ever again." Now that's tabloid-worthy.

She brings it all back to peace and love again on "All We Can Really Do," another short snippet, then into "I've Loved You Before," a tender love song with a heavily reverbed vocal track. Despite the sweetness of it, it also scornfully refers to the persecution of homosexuals (Etheridge is a lesbian) and makes reference to reincarnation, both unconventional for love songs.

The next snippet just as unconventionally fades in, "A Simple Love," then into the howling vocals of "Heroes and Friends," in which Etheridge sings, "all we want are heroes and friends." Maybe she's right.

"The Kingdom of Heaven" is yet another commentary on religion, singing "my God is love, my God is peace, my God loves you." The song suggests a controlled rage against Islamic terrorism, and anti-homosexual preaching in Christian America. The song features a blistering, moving guitar solo, which speaks even louder than the lyrics. "Heaven is here," she sings, "my God is you and my God is me," she continues.

The next track, "Open Your Mind" is yet another sermon. "We don't start living 'til we almost die," she says, continuing the themes. And in "The Universe Listened," she proclaims, "I believe in love, please send me love...I found my angels, found my spirit, found my soul."

"Imagine That" is a sardonic response to President Bush and the Iraq War, but, like all of the previous songs, invokes spirituality again. "I have seen the Spirit and all its creations," she sings, bringing us to the theme of awakening.

Then, "What Happens Tomorrow" is a beautiful closer about uncertainty, hard work and failure. "There is no us and them," she announces in another great vocal performance. "The Awakening" closes with a gospel-influenced sing along, "The truth is of the people, by the people, for the people." Etheridge has one of the best gritty voices in music today, but it's a shame she cannot carry the softer songs as well. Etheridge has never had a CD this introspective, nor this anthemic. So, despite poor sales, this may go down as her most important work yet, even her best.

BY TERRY LAWSON
DETROIT FREE PRESS

Steve Carell and Peter Hedges have at least one thing in common.

When director Hedges started working on "Dan in Real Life," which opens Friday, he figured he'd be working on the approximate scale of his previous film "Pieces of April," an indie-comedy that won a lot of hearts and support at the Sundance Film Festival (the film went on to have some success on the art-house circuit).

He didn't expect it to star the hottest actor in comedy.

As for Carell, when he took the leading role in "Dan in Real Life," a widowed newspaper advice columnist who, by falling hard for his brother's girlfriend, finds himself discarding his own best advice, he didn't expect to be the hottest actor in comedy.

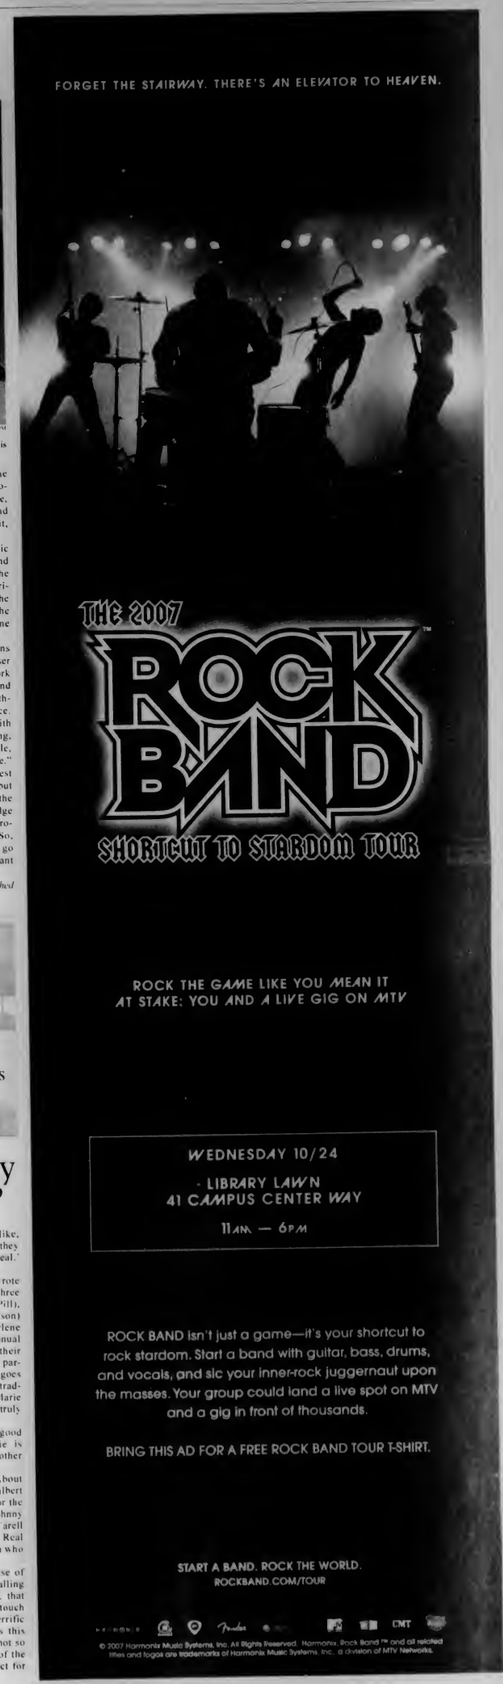
For most filmmakers, this would be cause for popping champagne corks and new car shopping.

But this isn't the case, it turns out, for both Hedges and Carell.

"I find myself trying to explain what this movie isn't, more than what it actually is," says Carell, who was a character actor and "The Daily Show" correspondent.

"It's not a high-concept thing or a side-splitter like 'The 40 Year-Old Virgin.' It's a lot, oh, I don't know, quieter, softer.

"It's funny, yeah, but it's sad, and sort of uncomfortable and truthful. I was interested in it the same way I was interested in 'Little Miss Sunshine.' It doesn't come with some kind of implied laugh track: you know, here's where you laugh, here's when you laugh harder.



"I'm not really that enamored of movies or TV where the characters try to be funny, or even know that they're funny. And that's really where Peter comes from, too," Carell says. "He was like, 'Just play Dan. Let the audience decide if they think he's funny. You just try to make him real.' He's not that into jokes. He's into people."

In "Dan in Real Life," which Hedges co-wrote with Pierce Gardner, Carell's columnist has three daughters: level-headed teen Jane (Alison Pill), hormonal horror-show Cara (Brittany Robertson) and sweet, vulnerable pre-teen Lilly (Marlene Lawston), whom he dutifully drags to their annual Thanksgiving vacation with his family at their Rhode Island cottage. Immediately offered a parenting break by his mom (Dianne Wiest), he goes off to the local bookstore, where he ends up trading reading tips and having breakfast with Marie (Juliette Binoche), the first woman he's been truly attracted to since his wife's death.

But when he returns to shyly share this good news with the family, he discovers Marie is already there as the guest of his younger brother Mitch (Dane Cook), who adores her.

Hedges, who wrote the script for "About A Boy" and the novel "What's Eating Gilbert Grape," which he turned into a screenplay for the 1993 film starring Leonardo DiCaprio and Johnny Depp, says that when he got the news that Carell was seriously interested in doing "Dan in Real Life," he asked him if he had any thoughts on who should play Marie.

"Somebody with a big heart and the sense of the absurdity of it all," Hedges says, recalling Carell's reply. "As far as I was concerned, that gave me the best excuse possible to get in touch with Juliette, who I think has all that and terrific comic skills. She tends to get cast here as this mature, exotic beauty, but in France, she's not so rarified. She can be funny, she can be one of the guys, and she's always sexy. She was perfect for this."

Santos' return sparks UNH win at Hofstra

BY MIKE CONNORS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

CAA Football

Coming off an injury, it didn't take New Hampshire quarterback Ricky Santos long to regain his form and put the Wildcats back with the elite teams of the Colonial Athletic Association.

The No. 9 Wildcats (5-2, 2-2 CAA) were on the road against the undefeated Hofstra team, but won 40-3 behind four passing touchdowns and one rushing touchdown from Santos.

"Obviously it was good to have Ricky back," UNH coach Sean McDonnell said in this week's CAA teleconference. "He was chomping at the bit and wanted to play. He went out and had a heck of a game for us."

His performance earned the senior quarterback his second CAA Conference Offensive Player of the Week award in 2007. He also is on the Walter Payton Watch List for the best offensive player in the football Championship Subdivision.

Santos missed last week's game against Iona, and a right shoulder injury forced him out of the game against Delaware two weeks ago. He showed few signs of fatigue this week, as he completed 19-of-23 passes for 262 yards against the No. 15 Pride (6-1, 3-1 CAA).

Richmond's Eric McBride made a career-high 16 tackles and also had an 8-yard sack.

"Eric McBride was just all over the field," Richmond coach Dave Clawson said. "He made some big plays saving a touchdown on a reverse for us."

McBride was not the only freshman Spider to be honored this week. Defensive lineman Adam Abramowitz was named CAA Rookie of the Week. He had a career-high 10 tackles and also recorded one of the team's six sacks.

TOWSON STRUGGLES

Since starting out the season 2-0, the Tigers have lost 5-of-6 games and sit in last place in the CAA South.

One problem for Towson (3-5, 1-4 CAA) has been the inconsistency of quarterback Sean Schaefer. Though he has the reputation of a player who can torture defensive backfields, Schaefer has almost twice as many interceptions as touchdowns this season.

This weekend's matchup with Colgate was one of Schaefer's poorest games of the season. He threw for 183 yards and made no touchdowns, while throwing three costly interceptions in the 27-17 loss.

"In the last two weeks we've had some tipped balls that have been intercepted that maybe should've been caught," Towson coach Gordy Combs said.

The Raiders (4-3, 1-1 Patriot League) used a balanced aerial and ground attack to help hand Towson its first non-conference loss in 14 games.

Quarterback Alex Relph threw for 252 yards, Erik Burke caught six passes for 105 yards and a touchdown, and Jordan Scott ran for 137 yards and two touchdowns to propel Colgate to its fourth win of the season.

FLUELLEN SHINES

Maine's season appears to be a lost cause since winning their first game, they have lost six in a row and are in a three-way tie at the bottom of the CAA North Division.

One bright spot for the Black Bears (1-6, 0-4 CAA) this season has been running back Jhamal Fluellen. The junior running back has rushed for 777 yards and three touchdowns this season.

"He's been really the spark plug for us as a running back, and certainly has provided a ton of our offensive productivity," Maine coach Jack Cosgrove said. "He also had a 49-yard touchdown on a screen pass, which was a brilliant run by him along the sideline."

Unfortunately for Maine, Fluellen left this weekend's game against Stony Brook midway through the fourth quarter with an injury he sustained along the sideline. He returned in overtime, but was not the same and gained no yards on three carries.

Maine's season has been tough, and this game made it no easier. It appeared that the Black Bears were going to come away with their second victory of the season before everything went awry.

Leading by 20-10 with 10 minutes left in the game, Maine allowed Stony Brook to drive 72 yards in less than three minutes to make it a three-point game.

After escaping a Stony Brook interception on the next drive, Maine was forced to punt on its next possession and gave the Seawolves one more chance. They converted a 40-yard field goal with two seconds left to tie the game, and went on to win 30-23 in double overtime.

CAA North top-heavy

With the re-emergence of UNH, the top three teams in the North Division comprise three of the top 15 FCS ranked teams, but the bottoms teams are struggling mightily.

Massachusetts and Hofstra lead the division with conference records of 4-0 and 3-1, respectively. With UNH's recent 40-3 thrashing of Hofstra, it sits at 2-2 in conference and has a legitimate chance of competing to win the division.

However, the bottom of the division is the complete opposite – Maine, Northeastern and URI all sit at 0-4 in CAA play, as well as 1-2 in non-conference games. They will also be looking to break four-game losing streaks this weekend.

Northeastern and Maine square off this weekend, so one of them will earn a conference win, while URI will be considerable underdogs when they travel to Durham, N.H., to face off with the Wildcats.

Towson is the only team in the South Division with a losing record. James Madison is the only undefeated division team in conference play, but Delaware is only a half game behind them. The teams will battle for division supremacy in two weeks in Virginia.

Richmond still sits in a good position with a 3-1 conference record.

games against UMass Lowell and Connecticut, the only line that remained the same on both nights was the top line of Fenton, Quirk and Ortiz.

"We're trying to mix and match players right now as best we can," Cahoon said. "And [Friday night's] game was even more mixing and matching because fatigue was a real issue."

Keane shifted from fourth line left wing to fourth line center to accommodate freshman Shawn Saunders, who dressed for the first time against UConn. Saunders replaced junior Jordan Virtue in the lineup and scored the game-winning goal for UMass.

In the second period of Friday's game, Virtue tried to initiate a break-up ice, but turned the puck over leading to a UMI breakaway. Freshman goaltender Paul Dainton bailed Virtue out, easily saving brushing the shot away with his right pad.

"I think [the freshmen] are good players and I think that developing them is critical," Cahoon said.

"If I don't give them a chance to develop now, when is it going to happen? We're going to need those guys as the year goes on. So we're trying to get a lot of people into those situations. They have good skills and can compliment the already proven players."

Langeraap didn't dress for Saturday's game after a mediocre showing in his first game at the Mullins Center. However, it is likely that he would not have dressed regardless as Cahoon wants to get a feel for all of his players before UMass begins playing exclusively Hockey East games ... Sophomore goaltender Dan Meyers did not dress for either game this weekend due to an undisclosed injury ... UMass served three bench minors for too many men on the ice over the weekend ... The Minutemen are 35-0-1 since 2003-04 when scoring at least four goals in a game ... The Minutemen are now No. 16 in the USCHO/CSTV top 20 as of yesterday and fell out of the USA Today/USA Hockey Magazine's top 15 after being tied at No. 15 in last week's poll ... With an assist on Quirk's first period goal, Fenton now has 10 points in 10 career games against UMass Lowell.

Strong showing for UMass in Boston

BY COLEY MICHALIK
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The event that floods the city of Boston every October has come and gone. The winners have been immortalized in the cold waters of the Charles River and the Massachusetts rowing team competed nobly in its two events.

"I felt it was real promising," said UMass coach Jim Dietz. "It was a very aggressive race. We had a lot of speed in the first mile and a half and then the conditioning really showed in the last third of the races."

The lightweight 8 boat started off in the 11th position and hit some rough spots during its race as it picked up a 20-second penalty.

This penalty turned costly as UMass dropped from 12th to 13th place in between the Trent and Penn State squads.

The penalty took the Minutewomen from 19 minutes, 3.758 seconds to a time of 19:23.758, just seconds behind Trent.

The London Training Center won the lightweight 8 at 16:15.442, dominating the race. The next closest crew was Princeton at 17:18.602 in second, followed by Wisconsin with 17:22.141 coming in third place.

The championship 8 boat started off in the 20th spot and ended up climbing up to 27th by the end of the race. Out of the 39 boats in this event, U.S. Rowing Princeton Training Center came out on top at 15:26.572, trailed by London Training Center (15:39.412) and Michigan (16:21.651).

The Minutewomen finished on the tail of defending national champion Yale (17:27.728) with a time of 17:37.897.

"It's like rolling through a carnival. You got 200,000 people screaming the whole three-mile course it makes it go real quick," said Dietz.

"It's something these young girls will get to learn from and have as an experience to look back at."

Over the last couple of weeks, there has been a mention of the stroke rating (the amount of strokes per minute) and this past weekend had the rating up to 30-31 strokes per minute.

"It was important, but not a main focus. Our conditioning is our priority," Dietz said.

"The first stage we were leading [Rhode Island] by six seconds, then the second stage by nine seconds, and then we ended up only up by two seconds. That is where our conditioning shows," Dietz said. "This early burst shows evident strength and power through the first mile and a half, but the conditioning cannot carry us through to the end of the races."

This upcoming weekend has the Minutewomen at the Head of the Fish Regatta in Saratoga, N.Y.

yards through 11 regular season games (not counting any possible postseason games, which count toward final season statistics). That regular season total would place him seventh in UMass history for a single season. Rene Ignolia's 1,285 yards in 1993 is currently the seventh-best rushing season for a UMass player, and Ignolia's 1,505 yards in 1994 are sixth.

Marcel Schipp's 2,542 yards in 1998 (UMass's only national championship season) is far and away the best single-season mark, and the only one to top 2,000 yards in a season.

MINUTEMEN RECLAIM FIRST

In the ever-present push toward the postseason, UMass got some help from one of its biggest rivals on Saturday. No. 11 New Hampshire knocked off unbeaten, 10th-ranked Hofstra, 40-3, in a lopsided game in Hempstead, N.Y.

The win pushed the Wildcats back to .500 in the Colonial Athletic Association and handed the Pride its first loss of the season, in the CAA or otherwise.

More importantly for the defending conference champion Minutemen, however, is it gave the Maroon and White sole possession of first place in the CAA North Division, at 4-0 – UMass is 6-1 overall.

Since its 24-14 loss to Boston College three weeks ago, UMass has been in second place behind Hofstra. Both teams were perfect in the CAA, but the non-conference loss for UMass gave Hofstra the temporary advantage in tiebreakers.

The Pride and Wildcats are really the only contenders to unseat UMass in the CAA North.

COEN LEAVES GAME AGAIN

Quarterback Liam Coen can't seem to stay on the field. The redshirt junior re-aggravated the left knee injury that has been nagging him all season for the second time since first hurting it on a sack against Towson.

Since that original injury on Sept. 15, Coen has exited a game after tweaking the knee every other game. He played a full 60 minutes in a 38-7 win over Maine, but then left in the fourth quarter a week later in the loss to IC.

Two weeks later, following the bye week, Coen seemed to be over the injury, playing 60 minutes-plus in the four-overtime win against Villanova. But the injury bug continues to bite the UMass signal-caller, and Coen did not play a single down in the second half against Northeastern Saturday.

Once again, he is to play at William & Mary this Saturday. Backup Scott Woodward is 13-of-24 passing (a 54.2 completion percentage) in relief of Coen this season. He's thrown for 143 yards with no touchdowns and no interceptions.

Moore records for UMass receiver

Senior climbs UM receiving ranks in win over Huskies

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The No. 4 Massachusetts football team's J.J. Moore can't seem to stay out of the school record books this season. Once again, the Minutemen's leading wide receiver pushed deeper into the all-time stat sheets on Saturday in the 24-7 victory over Northeastern.

The 6-foot, 201-pound senior caught seven passes for 97 yards and a touchdown against the Huskies. He led all receivers in the game in both receptions and yards.

UMass Football

His final catch of the game, a 10-yard reception on third and four at the UMass 33-yard line from backup quarterback Scott Woodward, jumped him to second all-time in career receptions at UMass.

Moore passed former teammate and 2006 graduate Brandon London, catching his 149th pass in a UMass uniform; London had 148 in his four-year career.

Moore has 44 receptions this season for 622 yards and three touchdowns, on pace for 69 receptions by the end of the regular season. That would give him 174 grabs in his career, which is 13 short of Adrian Zullo's career mark of 187. Any postseason games would give Moore a shot at the all-time receptions mark at his current pace.

CLOCK KILLING

Running back Matt Lawrence continues to play the role of workhorse for the Minutemen, notching another 100-yard game into the 2007 season – his fifth in seven games, in fact.

DANA TEPPER/COLLEGIAN

Redshirt senior wide receiver J.J. Moore is now second in Massachusetts football history with 149 receptions. He passed former UMass receiver Brandon London and trails Adrian Zullo, who caught 187 passes in his time with the Minutemen.

Lawrence finished with 110 yards on the ground, carrying the ball 25 times, once into the end zone from a yard out. He now has 837 yards on 153 carries this season, with eight touchdowns and a gaudy 5.2 yards per carry.

Most of his yardage on Saturday came in the second half, when the Minutemen were trying to hold onto a 17-point lead and control the clock. And with quarterback Liam Coen out with an injury, Lawrence was needed even more.

His first half numbers, 16 rushes for 53 yards (a 3.3-yard average), were not great. But after halftime, Lawrence carried the ball fewer times than in the first half (nine) for an average of 6.3 yards per carry. Lawrence was moving the chains and keeping the Northeastern offense off the field.

With the way the Huskies were moving the ball in the first half, that's exactly what UMass needed, as two drives deep into UMass territory were stopped by turnovers, so the score very well could have been 24-21 at the half.

Lawrence is on pace for 1,315

Freshmen add spark to Mass Attack lineup on both ends

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon stressed before this weekend's action that a true point man needs to emerge for UMass's power play to succeed. Through four games, UMass is 2-for-15 on the man advantage, converting just over 13 percent of the time. Last season, UMass converted more than 16 percent of its power plays into goals.

Senior defenseman Mike Kostka and sophomore defenseman Justin Braun both saw time at the point, but neither looked truly comfortable leading the unit. Braun displayed fluency in the offensive end last season, contributing four goals and 10 assists on his way to the Hockey East All-Rookie Team and a selection in the NHL draft. But the pressure of leading the man advantage and quickly advancing the puck beyond the neutral just doesn't seem like something he's truly comfortable doing at this point.

Senior forward P.J. Fenton also featured in the role at times, but he doesn't appear like the long term solution. He can certainly shoot the puck, but the role requires more than that.

In the past, players like Thomas Pock, Marvin Degon and Mark Matheson served in the role and excelled in running the man advantage. Aside from the ability to score consistently, the point man must also be strong and fluid enough to maintain possession to prevent against a turnover which almost always leads to shorthanded goals in these situations.

UMass Hockey

Freshman defenseman Doug Kublin made his collegiate debut in UMass's 4-3 win over Connecticut on Saturday.

Kublin suffered an injury during a preseason training incident and missed nearly a month of practice.

Against UConn, he lined up with junior John Wessbecker on UMass's third defensive pair. Sophomore winger Will Ortiz scored the Minutemen's second goal of the night and attributed it to the play of the defensive pair.

Kublin replaced junior Topher Bevis in the lineup alongside Wessbecker. Bevis struggled with injury problems last season and, despite his plus-1 rating, hasn't performed well recently. Against UML, forwards took advantage of his poor positioning and forced quality chances.

Kublin's play pleased Cahoon enough to earn the starting nod for Saturday's game. Both Kublin and Wessbecker finished the game with a plus-1 rating and Wessbecker is tied for the team lead with Cory Quirk at plus-3 for the season.

LINEUP NOT SET IN STONE

Freshman Brian Keane saw time at both left wing and center on the Minutemen's fourth line in the weekend's games.

He's not the only player to move around the UMass lineup this season. In fact, in the

Koch, Minutemen eye A-10 Championship

In case you haven't heard, the Massachusetts men's soccer team is having a pretty good season. Just four games into its conference schedule, there is no longer any doubt of the Minutemen's ability to compete with the Atlantic 10's best teams.

On Friday, UMass defeated No. 12 Saint Louis for the first time in program history. The victory is more than just three points in the conference standings. By defeating the class of the conference, the Minutemen validated their first two A-10 wins and proved that they are one of the league's top squads.

During Saint Louis's first two years in the A-10, the school won two regular season championships and played in both A-10 Tournament finals. The Billikens did not lose a conference game last season, and looked poised to match the feat this year before the Minutemen handed the team its first loss.

The A-10 coaches collectively dismissed the Minutemen's defense-first style of soccer by voting the team to finish 10th in the 14 team conference. UMass has already defeated three squads predicted to finish higher in the standings.

Entering the season, the Minutemen appeared poised for a marked improvement over last year. Returning the majority of its scoring and the important pieces of a defense that broke the school shutout record with 10 last season, the team looked poised to make a serious A-10 title run this season.

Early season losses to several regional rivals called into question the Minutemen's ability to compete in conference. But UMass played several very talented teams during non-conference play, including coming very close to tying No. 11 Harvard in Cambridge.

With five games left in its conference schedule, the team's work is by no means finished.

"To beat [Saint Louis] at [its] place is certainly a nice accomplishment," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "It was a good step in the direction of what we were trying to do. [Against Charlotte] we took a step back a little bit. And the guys were affected by it, and that's probably the best thing of all.

"We're not satisfied by just coming out and beating Saint Louis."

Michael King

A regular season win over a top conference team, though impressive, will not define the Minutemen's season. The team's goal of qualifying for the A-10 Tournament thereby finishing among the top six teams – is a feat that can only be accomplished by putting together a whole season of work.

In the mean time, Koch just wants what every other coach wants: his team to get better. Of course, he also has the tournament on his mind.

"We're concerned about continuing to improve and eliminating mistakes," Koch said before Friday's match. "We're far from being in the [Atlantic 10] Tournament. We have to win three or four more games. Can we get one this weekend? Odds aren't in our favor. But I'll tell you what – [qualifying for the tournament] will validate everything for us."

The weekend's showing seems even more impressive when you consider how long the team spent traveling. Since the A-10's membership no longer reflects its name, what used to be a pair of games against regional foes, now involves a cross-country tour.

"It's a huge test for us and it's going to be a good test of our determination and character," Koch said prior to this weekend's games.

Clearly, the Minutemen proved that they can succeed in a league dominated by high-scoring teams. And if the UMass defense plays as well as it did against Saint Louis, it simply will not matter if the team scores more than one goal per game for the rest of the season.

Entering the weekend, UMass ranked No. 4 in the Middle Atlantic version of the NSCAA adidas Regional Rankings.

"Polls don't mean anything until the end of the year," Koch said. "We're not concerned about that."

Of course, Koch is correct, but polls are still a reliable way to measure how much a team is respected.

The Maroon and White cracked the national poll last season, enjoying one week at No. 22 after a 6-0-1 start to the season. A 1-0 home loss to Vermont during that week sent the season spiraling out of control, culminating in a 12th place conference finish.

It's likely that Koch and his Minutemen will deservingly find themselves receiving consideration in this week's national top 25.

There's no time to admire the season: another challenge is right around the corner. The Minutemen host Rhode Island this Saturday, in a match that will have a big effect on the A-10 standings. URI was picked to win the conference and have not disappointed thus far in league play.

And it's also the two-time defending A-10 Tournament champions. By the way, the Rams had a player drafted by the MLS last summer – they're good.

Against Saint Louis, the Minutemen proved that they can completely shutdown a top offense – a feat they'll have to duplicate when the Rams come to town this weekend.

The Minutemen have nothing to prove to anyone besides themselves. They proved that they can beat a top team on the road, in front of a hostile crowd.

It remains to be seen if UMass can continue its A-10 run and maintain first place. But right now, the Minutemen want nothing more than to be one of the final six teams standing at the end of the regular season.

Governor backs Obama in race

By Katie Huston
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Massachusetts governor Deval Patrick endorsed Barack Obama's presidential bid at a Boston rally last night, calling him a man with "moral courage and a political backbone."

Patrick, who served in the Clinton administration as head of the Justice Department's civil rights division, praised the Illinois senator for being both "book smart and street smart" and stressed his broad appeal.

"I want a president who is not just about a resume but about character... not just about the right and the left but about right and wrong," Patrick said.

At least 7,000 people gathered on Boston Common, according to Michael Andrews of the Barack Obama campaign, to see the governor endorse the Democratic presidential candidate.

Patrick welcomed Obama to "Red Sox Nation" and said, "Around here, we know how to come from behind and win" – a reference to both Obama's poll standing and Patrick's own gubernatorial run.

Obama drew a laugh when he credited Patrick for New England's recent sports success, then launched into his stump speech, which was impassioned, optimistic and sprinkled with storytelling.

He said he was "honored" and "grateful" to have Patrick's endorsement, and called the Massachusetts governor "somebody who has constantly stood for the kinds of politics that I believe in," a "politics of common interest."

The two men have known each other for more than a decade and have close political ties. Obama visited Massachusetts last year to support Patrick's campaign for governor, and top Obama strategist David Axelrod was a media adviser to Patrick's campaign last year. The two politicians share Chicago roots and a Harvard law degree. Both are groundbreaking African American politicians – Patrick is the first black governor of Massachusetts and the second in the

UM to help Army families

By Ben Williams
Collegian Staff

Free support groups for families with parents serving in the military will be offered by the Psychological Service Center (PSC) at the University of Massachusetts starting in November.

Of the two groups, one is designed to support parents trying to maintain healthy relationships and co-parents with partners deployed away from home. The other is focused around children with parents serving in the armed forces.

"The content of the children's group depends somewhat on the age range of the children that end up attending the group," said Dr. Christopher Overtree, director of the PSC. "But the focus of this group will be dealing with the stress and anxiety about having a parent in a war zone."

According to the PSC, family members of troops serving abroad face numerous challenges that compound the difficulty of separation, such as fear for the active duty member, extended periods of deployment and multiple tours of duty.

Select Board to debate war

By Ashley Coulombe
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Select Board plans to deliberate a petition urging the town's congressmen to work to prevent the United States from pursuing a war with Iran.

19 Amherst residents signed the petition, which is attached to three letters sent to U.S. Sens. John F. Kerry, Edward M. Kennedy and U.S. Rep. John W. Olver, all Democrats. The group would like the board to send the letter to these congressmen.

The letter, written by Amherst resident Joanne Lind, begins: "We write to express our profound concern about the possibility of a U.S. attack on Iran."

Also attached is a copy of last year's resolution, called, "A resolution urging direct U.S. diplomacy with Iran and urging against any U.S. military action toward Iran," which was approved at a special town meeting Nov. 1, 2006.

Lind said she felt the number of issues surrounding Iran this year were enough to warrant the writing and presenting of a letter on the subject to the board.

"Recent news points to the imminence of an attack on Iran by nuclear or conventional weapons or both. While a year ago it was critics who were saying this, now both senior officials inside the Administration and high-level international sources are warning of imminent U.S. attack on Iran," the letter states.

Lind collected the signatures of local residents

Majors Fair held on campus today

Concourse to house most popular tracks

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Today's Majors Fair in the Campus Center Auditorium will include representatives from more than 100 majors, academic programs and University offices.

Approximately 950 students attended the fair last year, according to Tamatha Gaumnitz, the fair's organizing representative from Undergraduate Advising.

"The thing that's great about the fair is the energy that's there," said Gaumnitz. "People are really enthusiastic and there's a lot of information. I think that's what's really fun about it."

"Everything is in one convenient location," added Melissa Beesley of Commonwealth College. "So if you're a student who is studying biology, but is also interested in history, then you can go there and find information about both of those [majors]."

While the Campus Center Auditorium will again serve as the venue, some groups will be located on the Campus Center concourse.

"We're using the downstairs concourse better than we have in previous years," Beesley said. "We've expanded out to that point because it was crowded the past few years."

The event's planning committee made the adjustment after last year's student feedback indicated that the most popular majors were hard to access. Popular majors will now be spread out along the concourse basement.

"Even the really competitive majors that aren't necessarily looking to bring in new students are present and very friendly and helpful," Gaumnitz said.

One undeclared student, freshman Sara Linder, appreciates the value of the fair but may not attend.

"I have a lot of tests coming up, and there is a lot of material to study," she said.

The annual event is also a resource for students who have already chosen a field of study. Each major will have course requirements available, as well as related information such as how to attain departmental honors.

'iCrime' behind recent boost in rate of technological theft

iPod joins laptop computer as target of crime at UMass

By Eben Univer
Collegian Staff

It's difficult to walk around campus and not spot dozens of people listening to an Apple iPod on the way to class. But students should be wary as a recent study indicates iPod theft as being behind the rise in the national crime rate.

The Urban Institute credits increasing crime rates as being due, in part, to the portable MP3 player created by Apple known as the iPod in a study published in September 2007.

College students are a major target of this trend, known as "iCrime" because of the frequency with which U.S. youth own iPods. The co-author of the study told the independently published student newspaper of Pennsylvania State, The Daily Collegian, "college students match the largest age demographic of iPod users."

To explain how prevalent iPod theft and robberies are today the study states that in the first three months of 2005 "major felonies rose 18.3 percent on the New York City subway however it cell phone and iPod thefts are excluded, felonies actually declined by three percent."

University of Massachusetts Police Department Deputy Chief of Administration Patrick Archibald explained that the electronic device theft trend began at UMass with laptop computers, but has gradually come to include iPods as they have become more prevalent.

Archibald described iPods as being "easily left behind" in bags that are unattended at study carrels. The iPod's size and value are the main factors in its theft, he said.

"Because they can be easily stolen, like a wallet or laptop and then easily sold for quick cash, they are a target," Archbald said.

Because iPods are relatively new devices, any reported iPod theft is considered an increase in the rate of iPods stolen on campus, according to Archbald.

iPod theft, according to the Urban Institute study, can be compared to increased crime rates in the 1980s and 1990s when expensive basketball shoes and North Face jackets were popular. Unlike clothing, iPods are "one size fits all" and therefore, even more likely to be a sought-after item for theft, according to the Urban Institute.

Andrew Arguello, a sophomore at UMass, said when he was in high school one of his friends had his iPod stolen in the school cafeteria. He believes he should probably be keeping a closer eye on his own iPod as well.

"I keep mine in my bag all the time, which I guess isn't such a good idea because I have my bag unattended a lot," said Arguello. "If it were stolen I'd be pissed because that [iPod] is a lot of money."

The study also found a correlation between an increase in the number of people visibly wearing and being distracted by expensive electronic gear and the violent crime rate in the United States. It reported that violent crime had increased in 2005 for the first time in 12 years.

For some college students this is difficult to avoid due to the conveniently portable nature of the iPod.

While UMass students may find it difficult to avoid using mp3 players like the Apple iPod as they travel across campus, the Urban Institute has linked the device with an increase in nation-wide crime.

Pretty much everyone has one. They bring them everywhere," said Arguello. "And when you go somewhere.

Some students choose to listen to iPods while getting to class regardless of any safety issues it may pose.

Steven Lippert-Shea, a UMass freshman, listens to his iPod while walking or biking to class.

I realized that it was [safe] ... [Some people] attention] but it's enough to consider it a problem," Lippert-Shea said.

iPods, cost up to $300, according to the Apple Web site but with all the accessories that often accompany the player, the price can be even more. The list price does not take into consideration the amount of money spent purchasing songs, videos and books for the MP3 player.

Archibald recommends students be aware of their surroundings when walking on campus, especially at night, and that they also be aware of the locations of student help boxes and have their cell phones pre-programmed with 911 for quick dialing.

Obama draws cheers

nation – and voter appeal that transcends racial lines.

Obama drew cheers from the crowd as he called on Americans to rise above partisanship and emphasized the power of one voice.

"We can't be satisfied with a politics that says it is smart to divide a nation," he said. "We don't need someone who can say, 'I know how to play the game better.' We need someone who can put an end to the game playing."

He currently trails New York senator Hillary Clinton, the top Democratic contender, by 20 percentage points in a Gallup poll taken this month. Last night, he addressed several frequent criticisms, including that he relies on rhetoric rather than substance.

"When I start talking like this, there are a lot of people in Washington who start rolling their eyes: 'He's a hope peddler, he's a hope monger,'" Obama said. "That's all right – I stand guilty as charged. I am a hopeful man. I am optimistic about America."

The 46-year-old freshman senator also countered the charge that he does not have enough experience, pointing out that Vice President Dick Cheney and former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld had two of the longest resumes in Washington.

"A long resume doesn't guarantee good judgment. A long resume says nothing about your character," he said. He emphasized his experience as a grassroots organizer in Chicago and his engagement with everyday, hardworking Americans on the campaign trail.

Obama lambasted the Bush administration for a lack of progress on healthcare, education, poverty and energy policy.

"I know 65 degrees in late October is nice, but there are profound implications," he said of the warm evening. He called for an emissions cap and said that he will require all vehicles to get 40 miles per gallon.

He drew some of the loudest cheers when he addressed foreign policy, criticizing the war and calling Americans to work towards ending HIV/AIDS in sub-Saharan Africa, stopping the genocide in Darfur and closing Guantanamo Bay.

He closed by telling the story of his campaign mantra. "Fired up, ready to go," which was born in a small South Carolina town "an hour and a half from anywhere," and got the crowd chanting along.

Obama's reputation as a strong public speaker did not evade him last night.

"What I've heard about him so far is pretty good, but this really solidified that," said Courtney Siegert, a theater student at Emerson College. "He's a really good speaker. Instead of just saying, vote for me, he was like, we're gonna help you change." Annalee Mulhall, who also studies theater at Emerson, said she liked his use of storytelling.

"I think that he'd be the strongest general election candidate," said Michael Howe, an attorney who works in Boston. He believes Patrick's endorsement should help Obama's campaign. "[Patrick] is pretty close with the Clintons, too, and I think they really wanted his endorsement."

J.J. Saulino, a student at the Harvard Kennedy School of Government, believes Patrick's support may help Obama's cause in New Hampshire, where the nation's first primary will be held in early January.

"Voters in New Hampshire are somewhat familiar with Governor Patrick, and they might give some weight to his endorsement," Saulino said.

But Carl Danielson, a Boston playwright and file clerk, said the endorsement won't have a significant influence.

"It'll probably help a little, but I don't think endorsements matter much. I think people make up their own minds," he said.

Support group to aid local soldiers

The increased periods of deployment may also create additional stress for family members at home trying to maintain healthy relationships and parent effectively.

"[I] think it is important that we all think about ways that we can reach out to military families and returning military personnel," Overtree said. "It is almost impossible to predict what the needs will be, but they may require services, flexibility in adapting educational rules to accommodate people on active duty and respect for the stress and life disruption that military families have been experiencing over the course of this conflict."

The inspiration for the group came from two Ph.D students, Susan Balaban and Courtney Baker, and a member of the University clinical health department faculty, Rebecca Stowe.

"There have been many other groups of this nature, organized at both the national and local level," Overtree said. "We simply became interested in finding a way that we could provide support to our community members in the military knowing that it might lead to other services and help us understand other areas in which mental health centers like us could provide programming.

"These families have already mastered many of the challenges of existing in a military environment, but during times of conflict, can benefit from additional supports from their local communities," said Dr. Holly Parker, a clinical postdoctoral fellow at the Jamaica Plain Department of Veterans Affairs.

"There was not necessarily a 'demand' [for the program] per se," Overtree said. "Rather, it was clear that services were in need, and unclear whether military families would ask for these services. Since we have begun advertising this program ... we have gotten a very positive response, many people just thanking us for making this program available, and others suggesting different services we might be able to begin."

More information about the program and enrollment can be found on the center's Web site at www.umass.edu/psc.

UMass students have mixed opinions on resident's letter for her petition at the farmer's market in the center of Amherst during one Saturday afternoon.

One of the points included in the petition is Seymour Hersh's "New Yorker" article, which states that the CIA has increased the size and authority of the Iran Operations Group, paralleling the setting up of the White House Group prior to the Iraq War. Lind finds this to be "especially ominous."

Included in the petition is the information that Russian President Vladimir Putin and Saudi Arabian leaders sent personal messages to the Iranian government warning the "U.S. is going to bomb you," and that the United Nation's chief nuclear weapons inspector warned of an "out of control drift to war" in mid-September.

"The statements of the administration are ominous, and they are poorly grounded," said Lind. "They are intended to manipulate the public into allowing a preemptive strike on Iran."

Many UMass students agree with Lind's concerns about a possible U.S. attack on Iran.

"I think it's unfounded and not based on any threat to American security," said the UMass Democrats' President Matt Giancola. "I don't trust this administration to carry it out successfully; and when it comes to war, they have proven themselves to be incompetent."

There are, however, some who disagree with the premise of the petition and the select board possibly sending letters to Congress.

"The citizens of Amherst and the Amherst Select Board are far, far left. They are out of touch with reality and live in the 1960s," said UMass Republican Club President Brad Defluneri. "Any such petition would be ignored in favor of the national interests of the U.S. The select board sending this petition would be doing so at the expense of the safety and security of our country."

The Amherst Select Board will be discussing the petition on a date to be announced.

Student workshops held during fair

"Typically there's a faculty advisor from the department, and sometimes they'll bring students with them," Gaumnitz said.

In fact, that's one of the reasons why the fair receives positive responses from offices and academic departments. It allows advisors and faculty to talk to students in one place, which helps relieve the flow of student visitors to academic offices, especially during the weeks before preregistration.

Yair Schatz, a freshman Environmental Science major, plans to attend the fair despite being confident in his primary direction of study.

"I just want to find more about majors whether I want to add a major or a minor and get a feel for what the requirements are for different majors," he said.

The event will also feature workshops to allow students to learn more about the fair before they begin talking to representatives. The workshops will take place in the campus center basement throughout the fair.

"It's a prep-room where students can go and find out where specific majors are," Beesley said. "It's also designed to give them a better sense of what questions to ask."

Breaking rank with the GOP

Ben Duffy

Dr. James Dobson is mad as hell, and he's not going to take it anymore. As the head of the pro-family group Focus on the Family, Dobson recently penned an op-ed for the New York Times describing a meeting he and 50 other pro-family leaders attended.

"The purpose of the gathering was to discuss our response if both the Democratic and Republican Parties nominate standard-bearers who are supportive of abortion."

When he says "standard-bearers," he's talking about presidential candidates. Without mentioning a particular name, Dobson was singling-out Rudy Giuliani, the current Republican frontrunner.

Dobson's op-ed continued: "After two hours of deliberation, we voted on a resolution that can be summarized as follows: If neither of the two major political parties nominates an individual who pledges himself or herself to the sanctity of human life, we will join others in voting for a minor-party candidate ... The result was almost unanimous."

I know that Dr. Dobson is about as popular here in Amherst as Boy George is at a Klan rally, but I'll stick up for the guy. It takes guts to oppose the homosexual and infanticide lobbies. Don't believe the hype – he's not a bigot; he's just a man who follows his conscience. It's a testament to his character that he doesn't let the constant name-calling erode his will.

If I had been at that meeting, I would have been part of the "nearly unanimous" majority. Anyone who knows me will tell you that I'm a stubborn person and a stubborn voter by extension. I compromise on issues but not on principles. Consequently, I frequently find myself without a viable candidate. The Republican Party – the modern vehicle of conservatism – frequently disappoints me, especially here in Massachusetts.

The party seems to think that the only way to win voters is to be half as bad as the Democrats. The tactic hasn't worked. We have 10 congressmen and two senators, and every one of them is a Democrat. We have a Democratic governor, and two houses of Democrats on Beacon Hill. The rush to capture "the middle" has failed.

I won't vote for Giuliani. Maybe I'll take Dr. Dobson's advice and vote for a third party, or perhaps I'll write in "Benjamin A. Duffy." If you look at my 2006 ballot, you'll see that I wrote in "Benjamin A. Duffy" for nearly every office.

Yes, I've heard the argument from fellow Republicans that I need to be "pragmatic" and accept any Republican nominee because he will be "better" than the Democrat. Conservative Sean Hannity took Dr. Dobson to task on "Hannity and Colmes" over his anti-Rudy resolution.

"...[if] that becomes a landslide for Hillary, you get Ruth Bader Ginsburg or worse, you get somebody that is totally against you on issues of abortion and school choice and gay rights and definition of marriage. And the result would be far worse. Do you not see that that would be a worse-case scenario for the things you believe deeply in?"

Therein lies the conundrum of nominating a "moderate" candidate like Giuliani. Conventional wisdom says that a political moderate would be more electable because he would have more appeal with centrist voters. On the other hand, a significant portion of conservatives wouldn't vote for him, which is what got Sean Hannity so upset.

Hannity quoted a Rasmussen poll that said 27 percent of Republican voters would vote for a third-party candidate if Giuliani were the Republican nominee. If Giuliani drove away that much of the base, it would be a landslide for Hillary Clinton – 46 percent for Clinton, 30 percent for Giuliani, and 14 percent for a third-party candidate.

The party seems to think that the only way to win voters is to be half as bad as the Democrats.

Looking at those numbers, I wouldn't be surprised if Hillary won all 50 states. A butt-kicking like that hasn't been seen since Ronald Reagan took 49 states from Walter Mondale in 1984.

"But you have to vote for Rudy," says conventional wisdom. Why do I "have to" vote for someone who's half as bad as the Democratic alternative?

"Because if you don't, then Hillary Clinton will win," whines conventional wisdom again. If you're so worried that Rudy can't win without my vote, then he's obviously not very electable. If electability is the reason that we're nominating a "moderate" in the first place, then we conservatives have it all backwards.

Rudy Giuliani is probably the worst possible candidate the GOP could nominate. He'll abandon the principles of the party, and he'll still lose.

Voting for Giuliani may be "pragmatic" in the near future. I don't want another Clinton in the White House. On the other hand, the long term effects of this type of "pragmatism" are detrimental. If the only lesson that the Republican Party learns from the 2008 election is that it can nominate a pro-infanticide candidate and still win the presidency, then all is lost.

Dr. Dobson is right. If the Republican Party nominates Rudy Giuliani in 2008, they deserve to lose. If that means that a Democrat takes the White House, so be it. When the party goes back to the drawing board in 2012, they will take my ideas into consideration.

I'm not beholden to any party, and any candidate who takes my vote for granted does so at his own peril.

The 'truthiness' platform

Dan Nicastro

In the fight for 'truthiness,' there is no greater warrior than Stephen Colbert.

Through the right-wing, Bill O'Reilly persona he plays on "The Colbert Report," the 'real' Stephen Colbert has joined Jon Stewart in crusading against the utter ridiculousness of politicians, elections and the media. In his latest move, Colbert announced he would be entering the South Carolina presidential primary, a move which could possibly change politics forever.

Much has been written about Colbert's impact on the race, causing many to speculate that he has a very good chance to spoil the ballot and possibly take crucial votes away from candidates who need them, but he has little chance of affecting the way modern politics function. However, there is something that has been overlooked: this primary election has the chance to actually make the youth vote matter in a way it never has before.

Every time an election rolls around, pundits love to discuss the impact of the youth vote. MTV tries to stay relevant by insisting eligible young voters "Rock the Vote." P Diddy/Puffy/Puff Daddy/Diddy/"Too Many Names to Ever Seem Credible" threatens that younger citizens can either "vote or die."

However, none of these threats seem to scare 18-year-olds into voting, as each election shows consistently low youth turnout rates.

As an election approaches, pundits wonder which, if any, candidates posses the tenacity, enthusiasm and support needed to capture this elusive voting bloc. After the votes have been counted, it becomes clear that it is nearly impossible for candidates to court these younger voters.

Because of this lack of turnout, candidates have generally glossed over the youth vote, choosing to woo those who they know will actually show up to the polls. Colbert's campaign may change all this.

There is no doubt that this election is going to be an uphill battle for Stephen Colbert. The candidates on the ballot have been campaigning for months in an effort to reach voters. They have much more experience in public leadership roles and in conducting campaigns. Finally, most of the candidates (with notable exceptions) are taken seriously by the voting public. However, many fail to realize the incredible power possessed by Stephen Colbert.

With carefully placed suggestions, Colbert has been able to overload Wikipedia, to convince a Junior League Hockey team to name their mascot after him and to persuade the San Diego Zoo to name an eaglet in his honor.

There is no doubt that this election is going to be an uphill battle for Stephen Colbert.

While not particularly politically meaningful, the Facebook group "1,000,000 Strong For Stephen T. Colbert" is the fastest growing group in the history of the social networking site.

These examples may seem trivial, but they are evidence of the incredible influence of Stephen Colbert. If he is able to mobilize the same kind of support in convincing South Carolinians to vote for him, there's no guessing as to how well he will do in South Carolina.

Low voter turnout numbers are staggering among 18-24 year-olds. Roughly 52 percent of this group are registered voters in South Carolina. However, only 11 percent of registered voters participated in the 2006 election. That means only five percent of all 18-24-year-old South Carolinians (registered or not) voted in an election, which generally sees much higher turnout rates than that of a primary.

Colbert's show seems to resonate most with 18-29-year-olds, a demographic, which makes up almost 14 percent of the eligible voting population of South Carolina. In a presidential primary, votes are split between numerous candidates, meaning there are a huge number of largely untapped votes for Colbert to seize. If Colbert can effectively mobilize his viewers to go out and vote for him, the country may see Stephen Colbert as a legitimate political presence in South Carolina.

Most fringe candidates, especially those who enter politics from other vocations, are generally hurt by their outsider status. In short, no one takes them seriously. However, the most amazing thing about this election is that it does not seem as if 18-29-year-olds will feel as if voting for a comedian would constitute throwing away their votes. This probably has something to do with Colbert's intelligence and his deep understanding of politics. It's impossible to play his character as well as he does without understanding the nature of political discourse.

Also, Colbert and Jon Stewart have emerged as powerful elements of youth culture. "The Daily Show" has become a regular primary source of news for high school and college students, a trend which is somewhat unsettling but speaks to the power these two have in influencing possible younger voters.

Stephen Colbert has the chance to change modern politics. While he will not win the nomination in South Carolina, Colbert may be able to show politicians how important and powerful the youth vote can be and he may be able to show younger voters the profound effect their voices can have on the political process. Politics is no longer a game for those who have become jaded by life. It's now a game for those who are merely frustrated by it.

And that's tonight's word.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

ASSEMBLE RESPONSIBLY

Dear Editor:

It has occurred to us in the Student Attorney General's Office in the Student Government Association that Sunday night's events need to be addressed – not by the administration but by fellow students interested in the issue of student discipline on campus.

As students of this University, we feel disheartened that such a large number of people would be willing to participate in this sort of activity in the wake of last year's events. The 2006 incident resulted in five expulsions, twenty-eight suspensions, twenty-two deferred suspensions, at least fifty-five more citations and two lawsuits filed against the administration for violations of due process rights.

These numbers should encourage you to remain in your buildings and far out of pictures that might place you at the scene of any riotous activity, for example. Please do not put yourself in a position in which legal consequences are far beyond your capability to face.

If an unfortunate event should result in your needing legal consultation, resources are available on campus with people willing to assist you. The Student Legal Services Office is located in 922 Student Union and it provides legal services by professional attorneys to any students seeking assistance in legal matters.

Also, for assistance from fellow students, the Judicial Advisors Program is located in the Student Government Association office in 420 Student Union from 1:00 - 6:00 p.m. Monday through Thursday and 1:00 -3:00 p.m. on Fridays. Students trained on the Code of Student Conduct and the University's judicial process are available for assistance in preparing evidence, questions and statements.

These are readily available resources that we are privileged to have on campus. Please do not be hesitant to seek their services. As fellow students, we steadfastly support you in exercising your First Amendment rights.

Concurrently, as the Attorney General's Office, we fervently encourage you to participate in activities that are safe and responsible for yourself and others and that your celebrations are respectful to the entire UMass Amherst community.

A bold call to arms

Students walking by the Campus Center this semester have been able to observe, each week, myriad protests, demonstrations and vigils against the Iraq war by such anti-war groups as Women Against War.

Eli Gottlieb

Strangely, despite the best efforts of the aging hippies and their student supporters, the same students who lay witness to the protests week after week can clearly also see the continuation of the Iraq war.

It almost seems as though the "peaceful activism" and "passive resistance" accomplish nothing at all.

Albert Einstein said that doing the same thing repeatedly in the face of repeated failure is the definition of insanity. Given this definition, any competent psychiatrist would feel compelled to diagnose the well-meaning matriarchs and maidens of Women Against War, as while as their compatriots in other similar organizations, mentally unfit. After all, if they were of sound mind and solid resolve, they would by now have sat and at least attempted to invent some new tactics for ending the war.

Unfortunately, not only does the Iraq war continue, but the government continues to rape the Constitution and pillage the sacred civil liberties of our nation.

The National Security Agency will probably pay Comcast $1,000 in bribe money (as recently revealed, Comcast charges $1,000 for each illegal wiretap) to read this article as it passes through campus Ethernet cables on the way to Collegian editors. American citizens and foreign nationals continue to rot in the Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo Bay prisons while their interrogators devise new ways to avoid calling torture "torture."

It must be said that the Founding Fathers did not suffer tyranny as we do. When Thomas Paine saw a government that oppressed the citizenry rather than serving it, he called for "Common Sense." The men who created our great nation understood that when a government abridges the rights of the people and ceases to care for its will the people must use force against it.

Jefferson told us, "The tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots and tyrants." After seven years we lack any possible remaining excuse. Peaceful protest has proven ineffective, and those who seek to restore the greatness of this proud nation must now take up arms.

Yet citizens continue their vain, stupid efforts at "passive resistance." They continue candlelight vigils and song sessions and the laying out of boots to symbolize dead men. They cry for every soldier who arrives home in a coffin, all the while refusing to take the unhappy but necessary course of action that will save the rest of our soldiers: force the government to withdraw from Iraq.

A forceful resistance to tyranny does not even require that every citizen join a fighting force.

Either they carry an innate, fearful passivity that fuels their eternal love of pointless emotional symbolism, or perhaps the government has actually cowed them. During only one previous era has America ever witnessed such ineffective, self-righteous behavior: the Vietnam War.

Because the American body politic found itself largely unconvinced by an anti-war movement that rejected the bedrock of American society, Vietnam ended in a shamed withdrawal driven more by the high body count than any notion of morality or principle.

How can America allow this? It cannot. When Osama bin Laden decided to convince men to hijack American airplanes, he hoped for nothing less than to terrify the American people into submitting to Islamic rule and Sharia law. He failed only in his more ideological aim, as it appears the American people have indeed gone through the past seven years living in fear. Perhaps the terrorists have indeed won.

Remaining brave men and women of America, you now face the challenge to your nation's spirit and laws that requires only the greatest moral fortitude: You must expel tyrants from your own house.

They have shown themselves resilient against protest and against public opinion, but no cabal can withstand a nation that understands the meaning and necessity of the Second Amendment. Anyone who hopes for a better future should understand that they must fight for it, that some divine miracle will not elect a president who will restore proper law or make Congress actually do its job.

A forceful resistance to tyranny does not even require that every citizen join a fighting force. Besides, nobody should wish for a repeat of the Russian Revolution that merely replaced one tyranny with another. If each honorable member of the police force, the Army, the Marines, the Navy, the Air Force and the American intelligence forces simply refuses to honor orders or uphold laws that violated the letter and spirit of constitutional law, they together can restore the American republic within as little as one day.

Tyranny does not rule but by fear, and fascists cannot enforce their will upon the brave, principled and righteous. Let us hope that Americans can count themselves among those, lest we find our war on terrorism has made us hypocrites.

Story of success, chasing dreams post-UMass

Gazette reporter discusses life after UM, how ambitions have evolved and were realized

By Olga Deshchenko
Collegian Staff

When a ruthless Nor'easter dumped rain, sleet and snow on Northampton for over 24 hours last April, the startled community turned to newsgathering agencies for prompt and accurate information.

While the fire department fought against the storm's rage, a group of reporters stepped into the situation where they were needed most. A young journalist was among them, who, fueled by the rush of covering breaking news, sought the latest updates on flooded roads, closings and safety points.

"I was soaking wet, running around, talking to people, rushing back to the newsroom, filing stuff for our blog," recalled 23-year-old Daily Hampshire Gazette reporter Kristina Tedeschi. "My adrenaline was going; it was my absolute favorite thing I've done so far."

Tedeschi was introduced to covering breaking news as an undergraduate journalism and legal studies double major at the University of Massachusetts. She graduated in May 2006 and was hired by the Gazette immediately after a summer internship at the Amherst Bulletin. Tedeschi covered news and education and is now an arts and feature writer.

Sitting in a coffee shop dressed in a pair of jeans and a lemon-yellow sweater, Tedeschi never expected to be where she is today. Growing up in Charlton and Framingham, she idolized supermodel Niki Taylor and dreamed of stardom as a fashion model or an actress. Instead, with a firm push by her parents, Tedeschi became the first person in her family to earn a college degree.

"I couldn't have gotten through all four years without my parents. There were so many times I wanted to quit going, but both my parents wouldn't hear of it," Tedeschi said in between sips of tea. "It's scary to think what I might or might not be doing now."

The tall and slender reporter is not leaving her childhood dreams behind just yet. Tedeschi not only wrote the lead story on winter wear, but modeled the coats, scarves and hats for the Gazette's fall fashion supplement.

"I never had the guts or confidence to do it, but the opportunity presented itself, so I just did it," said Tedeschi, her smooth complexion glistening in the sunlight.

Tedeschi plans to go beyond the pages of the Gazette. The aspiring model's professional portfolio is in the works and will be ready in November.

On top of photo shoots and a 40-hour workweek, she is "totally preoccupied" with planning her wedding. Tedeschi's warm, sky-blue eyes brighten instantly as she talks about the big day in early December. The ceremony will be held at the original 1886 Wesson Estate, an enchanting Victorian mansion in Northborough.

"I picked the place even before we had a date," she confessed with a smile. "I love old things. I wonder who lived there or spent time there before I did, and what they were like. Rumor has it that the place where I'm getting married is haunted by the widow of Mr. Wesson, Cynthia. I love stuff like that."

Tedeschi met her fiancé, Jake Wayne, a registered nurse and volunteer firefighter in the Amherst Fire Department, when she was 15 years-old. Mutual friends take credit for introducing her to Wayne, who lived in the neighboring town of Southbridge.

"I love that we've had a long past together," she said shyly, as if admiting a school girl's crush. "He knew me when I was still literally a kid and I find that comforting, because I don't feel much different than I did back then."

Mr. and Mrs. Wayne will spend their honeymoon at the Château Frontenac, a historic hotel in Quebec, Canada. Even though Tedeschi is eager to get married, she is in no rush to have children. Aspen, her part-Siamese white and grey cat, will continue to be the only "baby" in the house for some time. Whenever the couple does step into the world of parenthood, Tedeschi plans to stay loyal to her craft.

"Journalism is one of the jobs that lends itself better to being a mom. You really just need a phone and a computer," she said. "This profession gives you so much more freedom than others. It's not 'a nine-to-five job' at all."

It may be a flexible career, but it demands precision and diligence in return. Journalism requires excellent time management skills and a dedication to a vigorous editing process, Tedeschi explained. Both challenges are regular contributors to her "pretty crazy coffee habit." Nevertheless, enticed by the variety and spontaneity of reporting, Tedeschi's byline never fails to make an appearance at the Gazette.

"This profession expands your horizons and forces you to do things you would never do otherwise. To me, that's a good thing," she said.

Tedeschi's walk does not say much about her love for foreign film, literature, travel and Led Zeppelin. And yet, the poised steps she takes in a pair of black high heels reveal the self-assurance of a journalist, who moves forward with no reservations in her life or career.

"I've always just kind of let things happen," she said brushing a blonde, unruly curl out of her face. "I like to take my life as it comes."

It isn't often that a show starts on time, even at The Roxy. A popular Boston nightclub that goes nights as a Chippendales on certain Friday nights At 8 p.m. Thursday, the Yonder Mountain String Band walked onstage and the crowd that had gathered early to catch the baseball game gladly turned its attention to the music.

The newgrass Yonder Mountain String Band, based out of Nederland, Colo., was showing its support for the Red Sox during Game 5 against the Cleveland Indians. Well, maybe only Ben Kaufmann, the bass player, was supporting the team openly at first. As a Massachusetts native, he was sporting a Sox jersey along with his ball cap. It's nice when rock stars can forego the posturing, the hair gel and the glitter and put all their effort into their music, but the band didn't seem to like the venue.

Yonder played two sets that were musically solid, but they could've used some livening up. Adam Aijala, Yonder's longtime guitarist, UMass alumnus and native to Sterling, Mass., looked bored to death. He was wearing an expression of such muted indifference that he could have been listening to the Polish electoral debates. He only perked up when cheering swelled through the crowd or when he saw his mother dancing.

Not only was Adam's mother right up front and center with his aunt, but his father and his uncle were hanging out in the back. The band dedicated "Rag Mamma" to his aunt. She got a kick out of it and continued grooving right along.

"I liked it when they covered John Hartford's tune, 'Up On the Hill Where They Do the Boogie,'" said Jake Margulies, a veteran of forty-one YMSB shows and an EMT in Northampton who studies at UMass. "As soon as you hear 'Some say the hippies won't steal,' you're ready to sing along. 'I caught three in my cornfield,'" said Margulies. "And I really liked that they played 'Traffic Jam' during the second set."

Dave Johnston, who played banjo, was admirably motionless throughout, which makes for a good photo opportunity, but it left the audience curious to see whether or not he can dance. He seemed to pay more attention during their debut of "Casualty," a song from their recent album.

The Roxy had Game 5 of American League Championship Series on two screens diagonally facing the stage, so it was easy for fans to both watch the show and keep up with the game. Jeff Austin, the mandolin player, yelled, "Go Manny. Go Manny. Go!" as Ramirez rounded the bases. Then he sighed. "Spikes up, Manny," as Cleveland threw Manny out at home. "Now let's cheer you up with a song about sorrow," he told the crowd before the band launched into "Sorrow is a Highway."

"The crowd was cheering the baseball more than the band, but that's Boston," said Margulies. "It was a tight show, musically, but it wasn't electric. I didn't turn around when everyone was yelling. It was Yonder, and they're more important than the Red Sox."

Beckett pitched a gem, throwing 11 strikeouts in eight innings, while Ben Kaufmann cheered the team from onstage. If he had stayed in film school New York, dissecting clips of women in fountains, the audiences would have lost out on a crazy-haired, superb show presence and an even more amusing baseball commentator. But he left New York for Boulder, Colo., and the upright bass where he met the other members of the band. And the rest, as they say, is history.

Colorado fans were showing their support, holding up their state's flag and waving around bottles of beer. They were at the center of a group calling for the band to play "Forty Miles from Denver" and cheering "Ole, ole ole ole," to get an encore. Yonder came back out to play 'The Bolton Stretch,' but as Margulies said, "They only did one song for their encore. It seemed like the show went by really [quickly] which was unusual. I've seen Yonder string out a show until 2 a.m., but they finished before midnight."

The members of Yonder Mountain had said in interviews they were considering not returning to Boston if the turnout didn't improve. All the nooks and crannies in the back of The Roxy were taken by Boston couples who were too cool to make out publicly, but the Yonder scene next to Fenway is a better draw. The dance floor is better even though "it's always been packed," said Margulies, surprised at this news, "but if they're not gonna come back, I may just move back out West."

During the show people were standing so close that they wound up wearing drinks, but a certain camaraderie had developed by the end. Aijala's mom waved some audience members back and trotted off with Lauren Modisette's fall tour poster saying, "I'll have the boys sign this for you." It turned out that sharpie markers are worth more than their own weight as they scratched high and low for, first the marker, then the straggling members of the band to scrawl their names.

It would be tragic if Yonder stopped coming back to the Northeast, but Thursday's show and audience participation may have convinced them to keep their next concert date at Pearl Street.

Pint-sized fashionistas launch new designs

The Olsen twins have decided to venture into a new fashion arena and unlike their tween

at Wal-Mart, there's not a plaid, ruffle or sparkle in sight.

The infant line, which the twins have dubbed "The Row," after the infamous Savile Row in London, is a far cry from the fashions that are mass produced for the preteen set. It is sophisticated and understatedly sexy... not exactly your little sister's clothing.

"When we were growing up it was always about being appropriate," said Ashley Olsen to the New York Times. Obviously, with this comment, the twins are moving away from what was considered appropriate for them as youngsters.

The collection is definitely about pointing through, especially since it's the collaboration of [illegible] women the fashion industry is very obsessed with for their understated boho chic attire.

It "was my sister [illegible] course I wanted to do something [illegible] to help her," said Mary-Kate [illegible] Times. She suggested not getting [illegible] the address of her sister's [illegible] loved pants to the collection.

The line is much more [illegible] scraps and understated flair one would expect of the twins. The color palette is muted with tones of black, white, cream gray, and the occasional shock of red. Silhouettes are simple with V-neck shirts, jackets, skinny pants that look as if they have to be painted on and banded tube dresses and miniskirts reminiscent of Herve Leger and Azzedine Alaïa's skintight numbers of the 1990s.

But simplicity does not always mean low-priced or cheaply made, and this is definitely the case with "The Row." According to "Women's Wear Daily," the line contains pants that will run buyers $360, three-quarter sleeve length cashmere jackets at $1700, and huge lambs fur coats that are over three grand apiece. The modest T-shirts have French seams, and of course they must! Savile Row, the line's namesake, is famous for its impeccable men's tailoring.

Mary-Kate and Ashley Olsen have been in the limelight since they were eighteen months old. Hence, they weren't ever strangers to the paparazzi's eyes. At the tender age of seven they established Dualstar Entertainment where they have pumped out book, movie and beauty products since 1993. They now make everything [illegible] a year. Dark style of McDonagh to show at Amherst

Senior project ends in twisted crime comedy

By Kevin Kocwara
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

After much hard work and dedication, Brian Lewis's senior acting project will finally have its first performance Oct. 25 at the Holden Theatre at Amherst College.

The show, Martin McDonagh's "The Pillowman," has been recently recognized with a number of nominations, including one for a Tony Award. Lewis stars as a horror story author, Katurian, whose short stories involving acts of violence and murder are becoming real in the town in which he lives. Katurian becomes the focus of an investigation and is eventually interrogated by two detectives.

Lewis has taken on the role of Katurian because it suits his acting talents, he said. The play was a choice of his and with the help of director Peter Lobdell he hopes it to be a success.

The senior projects in the theatre department at Amherst College are a way for the actors to show their talents in roles or any part of a play they feel suits their talents.

The play is character-based and would fall into a genre of dark humor. It involves life-size puppets who act out the scenes of violence in the play. The humor comes from the characters in a world of totalitarian rule, something like that of George Orwell's "1984." The play itself has its routes in comedy from the dark inner workings of the characters but not something of a slapstick style.

The truly bizarre world of innocence and the grotesque nature of crime are the main themes of the play. These are shown through the over-the-top scenarios and scenes and are evident in the humor that resonates from the characters and the actors portraying them.

There are four characters in the play, which may not seem like a lot, but the play does involve the puppets that make up four more characters. Most of the action takes place in an interrogation room. Along with Katurian, the two detectives who do the interrogating are Ariel, played by Lisa Smith, and Tupolski, played by Justin Redfearn. Finally there is Michael, who is the deranged brother of Katurian, played by John Timothy.

Michael's derangement comes from his experimental upbringing. While Katurian was on one end of the spectrum of upbringing where he was always loved, Michael was on the other, receiving nothing but torture for seven years of his childhood. It left him mentally unstable and deranged. He is truly innocent in the world but is seen as a criminal because of the sadistic acts he performs. Michael's torture is also what leads Katurian to become a horror writer. As a child, he would overhear the torture and he puts those elements into his stories.

The play takes place in a world with no time or setting. The actors argued about the significance of this before rehearsal Monday. The world can be timeless and represent any time, according to Lewis, to which Redfearn responded "after guns were invented," because the play does involve guns at certain points. Lewis was trying to show that the playwright, Martin McDonagh, intended the play to be timeless and placeless for a larger effect – the idea that this can happen anywhere.

The play itself is about the power of men, the evils of men and the nature of the man. The play focuses on the experimental upbringing of the two brothers and the effect it had on their lives. Michael was driven to psychosis, while Katurian used what he saw and heard as a child into brilliant literature. In this literature, however, he unknowingly creates a world in which his brother seems to live, carrying out the crimes detailed in the novels.

Katurian's world is turned upside-down when he is questioned by the detectives, especially when he realizes who has been committing the murders in his small town.

Life-sized puppets are used when the play hits its high note in the way of on-stage violence. These puppets are in the form of two life-size six-year-old children, a boy and a girl. The children's parents are represented by actors in over-sized masks that, paired with the puppets, gives the scene a deranged feeling. The violence is over the top and not for young children.

The play has an air of the absurd but is a dark comedy with a sadistic nature. The humor revolves around the characters and how they are represented in their own words and actions. There are no pie gags or anything like that. The violence may also seem very humorous due to the fact that there are puppets acting the scenes out rather than human beings.

Holden Theatre is located next to the Amherst College gym behind the Kirby Theatre. The tickets are free. Interested parties can call the box office at 542-2277. The play will be performed Thursday through Saturday at 8 p.m. each night and will last around two hours with two 10-minute intermissions.

Clapton autobiography offers no spark

By Terry Lawson
Detroit Free Press

So who knew Eric Clapton was such a bore? OK, maybe everybody who bought his last few albums or saw him on his last world tour, which had all the fire and spontaneity of a Fred Thompson interview.

But even that couldn't prepare us for the snooze that is "Clapton: The Autobiography" (Broadway, $26), which hit bookstores two weeks ago.

The best thing that could be said about "Clapton" is that it's tasteful, which one might expect from a chap who claims Giorgio Armani as one of his best friends.

Clapton apparently wrote the book himself. However it has the unmistakable cadence of dictation, the sort of repetition one often finds in anecdotes recalled on the private jet between gigs.

It has the same distant feel of Miles Davis' as-told-to autobiography, which turned out to be primarily a rehash of stories well known from another biography, sometimes word for word.

As a rule, I don't read show-biz autobiographies. Where once they were saturated beyond recognition in the style of Billie Holiday's "Lady Sings the Blues," they now have been smitted up and strutted out like rap videos. How many groupies, how many drugs, how many rehabs before one finds inner light?

Ironically, Clapton's life could make that of any Motley Crue member look like a Unitarian minister.

For starters, his supposed mother was really his grandmother, and his older brother was really his uncle. He lived in relative poverty before acquiring a cheap guitar and learning to play blues by listening to old Muddy Waters records.

By 14, he was earning and spending money in a band; and while still in his teens joined the Yardbirds, then quit after one album because the group released a single, "For Your Love," that he thought wasn't authentic enough.

Months later he was holding down the lead chair in John Mayall's Bluesbreakers and was called into the studio to record with Bob Dylan, a session he barely remembers and that yielded no music.

Then Cream, Blind Faith, superstardom and a crush on his friend George Harrison's wife, Pattie Boyd, that produced the love song "Layla." At that time he was an unrepentant junkie, but he won her away (he and George had a friendly chat, the substance of which is not revealed here) and he wrote her the beautiful (if slightly nauseating) "Wonderful Tonight."

The lyric was not written because, as the song says, she looked stunning at a party they attended, but because she would try on dozens of outfits before they went out, making him so crazy he told her she looked wonderful in all of them.

We haven't gotten to the crazed two-bottle-a-day alcoholism and the death of the son he barely knew, Conor, whom he immortalized in a song first given to a movie about junkies. By the end of the book, he can barely be bothered to recall the last names of all the supermodels he squired before settling down with a wonderful wife and three daughters.

The last chapter is given to a year on the road, which sounds even less interesting than the junkie year spent watching TV and waiting for the man.

It could be that the only passion Clapton ever had was expended in a handful of live shows and recordings the Bluesbreakers record, Derek and the Dominos' "Layla."

He notes with some pride that his all-time best-seller was the "Unplugged" CD, which he didn't feel was worth putting out. Then why did he? To prove the point that passion is overrated? That a public that would dig "For Your Love" isn't worthy of him?

At one point in "Clapton," he does sidestep into his immense talent briefly to explain to us what a blue note is, that bending sound that takes us somewhere deep and true.

Maybe in the second edition he'll catch that and take it.

Eric Clapton, world famous musician, recently released his autobiography, which details his life from early bands to song inspirations.

Senior midfielder Kara Murphy has played in all 17 games this season for the Minutewomen, making nine starts. UMass takes on Dartmouth today at Garber Field for a non-conference matchup.

has started the previous seven games for the Minutewomen, compiling a 5-2 record in that span. However, Sowry has not decided whether she will get Sarah Williams some time or stick with Letourneau's recent success. "Whichever way we go I have complete and utter confidence in who takes the net," Sowry said.

For the second straight game, UMass will likely be without their second leading scorer, Lauren Gillespie. Sowry lists the junior forward as doubtful for today's game, but hopes she will return for Saturday's game. Gillespie scored two goals in last year's 5-4 loss to Dartmouth.

Cher King, Jaime Bourazeris and Katie Kelly will look to make up for the absence of Gillespie and lead the offensive charge for the Minutewomen. King has seven goals and a variety of moves that routinely confuse defenses. Bourazeris has the most powerful shot on the team and has been getting a lot of chances off penalty corners. Kelly has started seven games as a freshman, scoring three goals and picking up an assist.

The Big Green's defense cannot boast the same stats as the Minutewomen's. They are are allowing 2.94 goals per game, and although goalkeeper Jordan Sedlacek's save percentage stands at .736, opponents are scoring 2.60 goals per game against her. Backup Ashley Heist has struggled this year with a .478 save percentage, so UMass will likely see Sedlacek.

Sowry worries that a non-conference game sandwiched between seven conference games can be a trap if the team overlooks it.

"My biggest fear would be coming off a Richmond game that was the biggest high of our hockey career, to playing a mid-week game at the end of the day," Sowry said. "Come tomorrow, we really need to have our heads screwed on right and focus on Dartmouth. Then we'll worry about Rhode Island."

The teams have three common opponents on the season. UMass lost to Syracuse, New Hampshire and Vermont, while Dartmouth lost to Syracuse and UVM but defeated UNH Oct. 11. The Minutewomen played all these games early in the season with the most recent one being against UNH Sept. 9.

UMass leads the all-time series over Dartmouth, 19-8-1, but the Big Green has won the last two meetings. Bildner recorded a hat trick, including the game-winner in overtime to secure the Dartmouth victory.

for his first-career shutout. It was the freshman's fifth victory of the season.

With the victory, MU increased its overall record to 5-4-1 (2-1 A-10) while the Dukes fell to a 3-7-3 overall record with a 1-2 mark in conference play. Both teams hit the road for matches Friday, as the Hoonies travel to take on Fordham while Duquesne will face La Salle.

Wisniewski leads No. 12 Bills

No. 12 Saint Louis once again proved how complete a team it is Sunday, adding another player to its forceful offense while defeating Rhode Island, 3-1.

Sophomore forward Scott Wisniewski had a career-high three points for the 7-2-3 Billikens as he helped SLU bounce back from a rare loss at Massachusetts.

Wisniewski put the Bills on top early, picking up a loose ball in Rhode Island territory and shooting it past goalkeeper MJ Britt in the 25th minute. He later assisted on two more goals by fellow sophomore Jimmy Holmes and freshman Beau Bellomy, adding to the lead.

The two-goal lead stood up in the second half, as the strong wind that helped the Bills in the first half hurt them after halftime. Sophomore goalkeeper Ross Kaufmann held the lead, making a career-high seven saves on eight attempts.

Rhode Island attained its lone goal in the 65th minute when junior Kedan Crosby scored to move the Rams to within one. The goal came after a great save by Kaufmann, who had to work to stop one of senior Lukasz Tumicz's career-high seven shots.

The rebound fell right in front of Crosby, who shot it into Kaufmann's undefended side for his second goal of the season.

Notes

The Billikens are second in the A-10 with a 3-1 record. It faces Richmond on the road Saturday while Rhode Island travels to UMass. Dayton won on the road Friday, beating La Salle, 2-1, behind goals by sophomores Jeff Popella and Alex Torda in the final five minutes of regulation. The Flyers (2-7-2 road record last year) helped place them into 10th place, keeping them out of the A-10 championships. Dayton couldn't continue the momentum Sunday, however, as it was shutout by Fordham goalkeeper Dan Hajdocky, 1-0. Team captain Umar Oddoson scored the game-winner in the 81st minute for the Rams. Richmond freshman Justin Grove's second collegiate game was a big one Friday, as he scored the game-winner in a 1-0 win over Temple. Schoeberl had three saves to give him his fourth shutout of the season, moving him into a tie for fifth on the school's all-time shutout list with 13.

The Warriors have not surrendered a first-period goal this season and have not trailed yet in a game.

Youth doing the trick

Maine (2-2-0) used seven rookies in two of its games this season. Over a quarter of the Black Bears' goals this season have been scored by rookies. The loss of key veterans from last year to graduation hasn't been a major cause for concern for this year's team.

Senior defenseman Bret Tyler is providing great leadership by example this year for his younger teammates. Tyler leads the team with three goals and two assists for five points. He is also tied for first in the league in points scored (1.25 per game) and goals scored (three). Tyler is also the highest-scoring defenseman in the league.

Junior goaltender Ben Bishop is also showing the consistent effort expected of a veteran. With a win against Mercyhurst Saturday night, Bishop (2-2-0) moved into a tie for sixth place on Maine's all-time wins list. Bishop is tied with Matt Yeats with 40-career wins.

Bishop ranks fourth in the league in save percentage (.933) and win percentage (.500).

Maine ranks third in the league in scoring, tallying the second-highest scoring total (five goals) in the second period.

Kicking old habits

Vermont was 0-11-0 last season when trailing after two periods. The Catamounts snapped that losing streak this season when they overcame a two-goal deficit in the third period against No. 4 Boston College to force a 3-3 tie.

In its last three games against the Eagles, UVM is 2-0-1, dating back to January of last season. Prior to this good fortune, the Catamounts had not won against BC since 1994.

Vermont is 28-6-4 when junior forward Dean Strong records at least one point in a game. However, Strong is off to a slow start this season. Through three games played, the Ontario native has one goal to his credit. Junior Forward Peter Lenes leads the Catamounts with two goals and 1.00 points per game (two goals, one assist).

One of the only major areas to work on for the Catamounts is earning an overtime victory. Vermont is 6-3-1-15 in its last 24 overtime games.

Another problem is its number of penalties. The Catamounts lead the league in penalties, with 72.

Providence snapped its scoreless drought on power plays by scoring three times on man advantages against Holy Cross Saturday. New Hampshire snapped a five-game losing streak against BU Saturday, beating the Terriers 4-1. UMass-Lowell is 5-0-1 in its last six games when allowing two or fewer goals.

Dukes dominating

Duquesne stepping up play against conference opponents

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Duquesne's last three games in Pennsylvania shot it up in the Atlantic 10 conference standings to second place. Last week the Dukes improved from a 3-2 conference record after blanking Xavier, Saint Joseph's and Temple.

After the Oct. 12 loss to Dayton, the Dukes (9-5, 6-2 A-10) have scored 10 straight, unanswered goals against last week's opponents. Seven Duquesne players scored at least one goal.

The defense played a crucial role this week, giving the team three straight shutouts. The Dukes had not shut out opponents in two consecutive games since early September when they blanked Mount St. Mary's and Army.

Duquesne is already seeing improvement from last season's 3-5-1 record, despite losing four starters and playing under a new coach, Tim Zundel.

The team will finish the season playing two of three games at home over a span of two weeks. Both home games are against teams with losing records (Fordham and La Salle).

HAWKS SNAP 11-GAME SKID

Saint Joseph's broke its 11-game losing streak and winless conference record after beating St. Bonaventure 2-0 on Friday.

Sophomore goalkeeper Megan Bastianelli recorded her third shutout of the season, notching five saves on several open opportunities for SJU (3-13, 1-7 A-10). She stopped two offensive runs when the Bonnies shot within close range of the goal but failed to score.

SJU tallied its first goal right after the five-minute mark on a long ball by Hawks midfielder Ashley Bugnar that went to the middle.

The second goal came from junior Laura Adams after she received a pass from senior Kristie-Anne Hoban and put the game away for SJU.

CHARLOTTE STAYS PERFECT

Charlotte came out of this weekend as the only undefeated team left in the A-10 after beating Dayton 2-1 on Sunday.

Charlotte junior Nikki Dumencich contributed both goals. Her first goal came within the first six minutes when she placed a shot past the goalkeeper from five yards out.

It was still not enough for the 49ers (12-3-1, 7-0-1 A-10) as UD senior Mandi Hack booted a shot to the upper right corner to tie it.

The 49ers scored the game-winner after Dumencich received a pass from freshman Whitney Weinraub and put one in. This is Dumencich's first time scoring more than one goal in a game this season.

Her last game earned her A-10 Player of the Week honors. The A-10 has bestowed the honor upon a 49er three the last four weeks.

The 49ers come to Amherst Friday to play Massachusetts.

ROOKIE OF THE WEEK

Fordham midfielder Katie McDermott is the A-10 Rookie of the Week after she scored two goals against Rhode Island on Sunday.

The freshman scored her second goal of the game after URI goalkeeper Jackie Fede blocked a shot from Fordham forward Katie Sanchez. Fede could not keep the ball under possession; however, as McDermott picked up the rebound and scored her third goal of the season.

Temple senior midfielder Alli Lokey has helped lead the Owls to a 14–5 record this season, including a 4-1 record in the Atlantic 10. Lokey leads the team in nearly every statistical category.

Owls, Lokey leading the way

Temple topples West Chester, receives coaches poll votes

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Temple beat West Chester on Sunday for its fifth straight conference game.

The Owls (14-5, 4-1 Atlantic 10) had a clutch performance by senior midfielder Alli Lokey who scored with less than a minute remaining in regulation.

Lokey, the A-10 leader in shots (115), points (42) and goals (17) has been a major reason the Cherry and White have received 54 votes for the STX NFHCA Division I Coaches Poll, finishing just outside of the top 20.

A-10 Field Hockey

Temple also scored in the 23rd minute off an unassisted shot from junior defender Mary Catherine Kinneman, who dribbled past three Rams (5-11, 2-4 A-10) defenders and put a shot past freshmen goalkeeper Joelle Zarefoss (14 saves).

West Chester junior forward Sara Conrad tied the score in the 65th minute off an assist from sophomore midfielder Marisa Holtman with five minutes left in the game. With 42 seconds remaining, Lokey got the ball in front of the cage and scored the game-winner.

The Owls also recorded a victory Friday, beating La Salle, 4-1. The Explorers (8-11, 1-5 A-10) gave up three second-half goals in the loss.

Sophomore midfielder Dannah Brhem tipped-in a penalty corner by Lokey nine minutes into the first half.

Two minutes through the second half, the Explorers tied the game when sophomore forward Kara Harpel scored off a deflected shot.

Senior midfielder Leanne Vogelsong sent a shot toward senior goalkeeper Ellen Axelsen, which was deflected and one-timed by sophomore forward Kasey Ruth.

Brhem scored four minutes later, recording her second goal of the game while Lokey also had a goal with four minutes to go.

Temple dominated the Explorers in shots (20-9) and penalty corners (12-4). It also secured a postseason spot for the Atlantic 10 Conference Tournament. The two victories gave the Owls momentum going into their final regular-season game against cross-town rival Saint Joseph's on Saturday, Oct. 27.

RICHMOND BLANKS RAMS

Richmond defeated Rhode Island, 4-0, Friday as four players scored for the visiting Spiders (5-11, 4-2 A-10).

Thirteen minutes into the game, junior midfielder Sarah Schrott scored the first goal of the contest.

The score came off an assist by senior back Erin Arthur. The Spiders' next goal came off another penalty corner by redshirt freshman Dani Pycroft, who had the assist for sophomore forward Sarah Blythe-Wood.

Blythe-Wood leads the team in goals (six), points (14) and shots (33). Junior forward Alex Maltesa and sophomore forward Annie Edwards also had goals for the Spiders.

Massachusetts defeated Richmond, 1-0, Sunday. With eight minutes left in the first half, UMass (10-7, 5-1 A-10) was awarded a penalty stroke, and senior midfielder Nicole Phelan put it past junior goalkeeper Becca Weaver for the game's only goal.

The Spiders were awarded a penalty corner with two minutes left in the game, but Blythe-Wood was unable to put the shot past senior goalkeeper Becky Letourneau.

The loss puts Richmond into second place in the A-10, the first time since the 2001 season. The Spiders earned a spot in the Atlantic 10 Conference Tournament.

UM welcomes Dartmouth

Minutewomen host Big Green in non-conference matchup

BY MIKE CONNORS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While the Massachusetts field hockey team's most important game left in the regular season will come Saturday at Rhode Island, it still has to play its final non-conference game tonight against Dartmouth at Garber Field.

The Minutewomen (10-5, 5-1 Atlantic 10) sit a game below .500 against non-conference opponents but have hit their stride in conference play. Coming into tonight they've won three in a row and five of their last six.

Dartmouth (4-9, 1-4 Ivy League) has struggled in 2007, especially on the road. Away from Hanover, N.H., the Big Green are 1-4, with its sole win coming against Brown Sept. 8. That was their first road game of the season.

Home-field advantage has elevated the Minutewomen to a different level this season. They have won 6-of-7 home games, including their last four.

UMass coach Justine Sowry held a light practice yesterday and worked with the team on finding ways to break the Dartmouth defensive press on penalty corners. She also told her team to be aware of the Big Green's ability to make "deceptive passes" and spread the field.

Leading the offense for Dartmouth are Lizzie Bildner and Ashley Hines. Bildner joins UMass defender Erin O'Brien in the NFHCA Senior All-Star Game. The senior forward has six goals in her 13 starts this season. Hines joins Bildner with 12 points to top the team. She has five goals and two assists. The two players comprise nearly two-thirds of Dartmouth's 19 goals.

In order to win, the Big Green needs to find ways to penetrate a UMass defense that is allowing an average of one goal per game. The Minutewomen have allowed two goals in their past six games, and Dartmouth is yet to score in their last two games. Seniors O'Brien, Kristina DoRosario and Nicole Phelan anchor the defense.

"All year our defense has been really tight and organized, so we're just looking for exactly the same and denying them many shots," Sowry said.

Umile reaches mark

Long tenured UNH coach reaches 400-win plateau

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

New Hampshire coach Dick Umile earned his 400th career victory Friday when the Wildcats defeated Boston University, 4-1.

Umile has developed tremendous credentials as a collegiate men's hockey coach. His .653 winning percentage ranks third among all active coaches in the NCAA. In his 17-year tenure as coach of the Wildcats, the 1972 UNH alumnus has led the team to 13 NCAA tournament appearances.

Hockey East

With Umile at the helm, the Wildcats have taken the Hockey East Conference by storm, earning a berth in the conference championship tournament every year and winning the title six times. UNH has made four Frozen Four appearances, as well.

Umile is the winningest coach in UNH history. He boasts 15 20-win seasons, including a current streak of 11. He has been named Hockey East Coach of the Year five times, an all-time league best.

Umile has been masterful at recruiting. He has coached 19 All-Americans, as well as seven Hobey Baker Memorial Award finalists. The award given to the nation's top performer on the off-day of the Frozen Four. In the 1997-98 season UNH produced two Hobey Baker Award finalists. In 1999, Jason Krog became the first Wildcat to ever earn the award.

Umile has helped many of his players reach professional status, including Krog, Derek Bekar, Eric Hoguinecki, Ty Conklin, Darren Haydar, Bryan Muir, Erick Nicknlas and Mark Mowers.

As a player, Umile captained the 1971-72 Wildcats to a third-place finish at the Eastern College Athletic Conference Championships. As a sophomore, Umile tallied a career-high 56 points. In his four years at UNH, Umile recorded 60 goals and 84 assists for 144 points in 87 career games.

New Hampshire hockey coach Dick Umile recently won his 400th-career game, defeating Boston University, 4-1, Friday. In 17 years at UNH, Umile has led his team to 13 NCAA appearances.

CONFERENCE PLAY BEGINS

With the first week of this year's Hockey East season in the books, eight of 10 Hockey East teams participated in conference play. New Hampshire (1-0-0) and Northeastern (1-1-0) sit atop the standings, as they are the only teams in the conference to earn a victory against a conference opponent this season.

Boston College (1-1-2), Massachusetts (2-1-1), UMass-Lowell (0-0-1) and Vermont (0-2-1) are on the higher end of the conference because all four teams played to a tie in their respective contests.

BU (0-2-1) and Providence (0-4-0) both suffered losses. BU lost at home while Providence lost on the road.

WARRIOR PRIDE

With a weekend sweep of Bemidji State, the Merrimack Warriors are 3-0 on the young season, their best start in 14 years.

The last time the Warriors were undefeated after the first three games of the season was 1993-94.

The Warriors last won three consecutive games in the 2003-04 season. Merrimack finished the year under .500, with a final record of 10-20-6.

Both games the Warriors won this weekend were decided by one goal. Without a set starter at goaltender, the platoon of junior Patrick Watson and sophomore Andrew Brathwaite has proven to be an effective strategy for the Warriors. The two net minders have a combined 1.67 goals-against average and a .947 save percentage through three games this season.

Brathwaite is tied with New Hampshire's Kevin Regan for the league lead in goals-against average, allowing 1.00 goals-against in 60 minutes of play.

Merrimack has scored 24 per-

Hawks riding hot streak in A-10 play

BY SAM EHRICH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A little hot streak can take a team a long way.

For Saint Joseph's, its recent streak has vaulted it from the bottom of the pack in conference play to the top of the Atlantic 10 Conference standings.

A-10 Soccer

With their two wins this weekend and Massachusetts men's soccer team's loss Sunday against Charlotte, the Hawks are now alone at the top of the A-10 with a 3-0-0 conference record.

This comes after a 1-7-1 start in non-conference play.

On its way to the top of the standings, SJU had to overcome teams that had haunted them in its past. The Hawks had never beaten Sunday's opponent Richmond in program history.

This time the Hawks beat the Spiders, 1-0, on a game-winning goal by freshman Colin Baker in the 85th minute.

Baker, despite his rookie status, has been the main catalyst behind the Saint Joseph offense. His header past Richmond star goalkeeper Eric Sciocchetti was his team-leading fourth goal of the season.

Sciocchetti had a solid game in net for Richmond, but his seven saves were one too few as the Spider offense did nothing against goalkeeper Bryan Benedict and the Hawk defense.

Benedict's efforts were crucial, as the Hawks also had to fight their way to a victory Friday, beating George Washington, 2-1, in double overtime.

BONNIES BRAWL PAST DUKES

St. Bonaventure's 1-0 victory over Duquesne got a little too heated Saturday, as a scuffle broke out during a contest that saw 10 cards in a five-minute span.

The 10 cards included three red cards handed in a five-minute period that concluded with a fight between SBU's John Darrah and Duquesne's Kevin Foglesong at the 77:51 mark.

Overall, 30 fouls were handed out – 15 for each side.

For their part, the Dukes had a reason to be frustrated by the end of the match, outshooting the Bonnies 13-8. But they were turned away by the St. Bonaventure defense and goalkeeper David Flynn.

Flynn finished with three saves

COLLEGIAN SPORTS ATHLETE OF WEEK

JUAN MOLIERE, MEN'S SWIMMING AND DIVING

Massachusetts men's swimming and diving star Juan Moliere was named the Atlantic 10 Swimming Performer of the Week for helping lead his team past Stony Brook on Friday.

Moliere, a sophomore freestyle sprinter from San Juan, Puerto Rico, placed first in two events. He won both the 50-yard and 100-yard freestyle, both of which he is undefeated in so far this season.

He also helped the Minutemen to first place finishes in relay events, acting as the anchor leg in the 200-yard medley relay and the lead leg in the 200-yard freestyle relay.

His performance as the lead leg of the 400-yard free relay team in UMass's first meet, a loss to Boston University, netted his team a second-place finish.

With Moliere's help, the Maroon and White beat the Seawolves by 65 points, despite taking 2nd 7-of-15 events. They will face Army on Saturday, a team that was one of the foes to beat them in last year's Atlantic 10 Championship run.

Combining this year's performances with last year's, Moliere has a shot of becoming one of the most accomplished swimmers in school history.

Juan was a First-Team and Second-Team All-Atlantic 10 swimmer as a freshman, winning the 100-meter freestyle title at the A-10 Championships. He was also a member of the 200-meter and 400-meter medley relay teams that also placed first at the championships, helping the Minutemen to their ninth conference title.

Moliere's 45.80 in the 100-yard freestyle last season ranks eighth in school history. His 21.04 50-yard freestyle time also ranks ninth, and he is a member of the A-10 record-holding 200-yard medley relay team with a time of 1:31.00.

Moliere is also the record holder in the 50-meter and 100-meter freestyle at Collegio San Ignacio, his high school back in San Juan.

RUNNER-UP: JAMES MARCOU, FORWARD, HOCKEY

Freshman James Marcou scored his first career goal and added two assists in a pair of games last weekend. He scored the goal against UMass-Lowell on Friday in a 2-2 tie, also adding an assist. His other assist came in the 4-3 victory over Connecticut.

Through the first four games of his collegiate career, Marcou has recorded four points on a goal and three assists; the four points leads the team.

The dynamic winger saw time on both the third and fourth line for the Minutemen along with playing on the primary power play unit.

One of his assists came on Cory Quirk's power play goal Friday. Senior forward PJ Fenton wound-up a slap shot from the left point. The puck deflected off Marcou's skate to Quirk who slid the puck into an open net. Minutes later Marcou dazzled the home crowd with some nifty stick work to make the score 2-0.

Marcou leads a talented freshmen class that has boosted the UMass offense so far in the 2007-08 season.

Jamail speaks on media, war

BY PETER RIZZO
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Well before the scheduled start time of 7 p.m., students were already lining the steps of Stockbridge Hall to see the self-styled unembedded journalist Dahr Jamail. The event promised an up-close and personal perspective for any and all the lingering questions on Iraq by a man who has witnessed it firsthand.

Jamail, who is out on tour with his new book, "Beyond the Green Zone: Dispatches from an Unembedded Journalist in Occupied Iraq," got up to the microphone and promised to give the audience 45 minutes of discourse about his new book. This was to be followed by a question and answer session of the same length.

Onstage he stood atop the podium shuffling his papers, alone, as he had been in Iraq.

Jamail's speech began with his description of the unorthodox journey that led him to darkest corners of the Iraq without military protection. His trips had left him with many stories to tell and a healthy contempt for what he termed the "corporate media echo chamber."

This conflict was the topic of much discussion, as he accused modern journalists of sacrificing their professional integrity in order to avoid conflicts with their editors and the government.

He also commented on the role of individual American citizens, saying that "it's easy in our country not to pay attention."

Though he seemed overwhelmed by the audience, he remained steady in his talking points, even though they were not clearly outlined to the audience.

At times, his stories themselves needed long introductions in order to explain their context. If sometimes during his speech he lost direction, he made up for it by injecting energy into the emotionally charged

SGA votes on fee increase in 2008

Drained funds inspire action

BY DERRICK PERKINS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Student senators voted to increase the student activity fee by $3.25 per semester starting next fall in [illegible] two rounds of debate last night.

"There needs to be a fee increase or else all [Registered Student Organizations] will have to get a dramatic cut to their budget," said Yannick Brookes, chair of the Ways and Means Committee. "If the fee increase does not happen, we will not be in debt next year but in [fiscal year] 2010."

According to Student Trustee Ruth Thompson, it was a choice between cutting budgets and increasing the cost of fees, which allow RSOs to achieve their semester and school year goals.

"Student activities fees is [illegible]," Thompson said. "If you're in a RSO or in the SGA and you have money in your budget, it enables you to do whatever it is your RSO wants to do."

Thompson cosponsored the motion along with a number of other members of the SGA, including Speaker Carla Dominguez, Associate Speaker Kerry Shields and President Aaron Buford.

"This is important," Buford told 30 assembled senators. "As of right now, this is the biggest issue that we have to get through at this point."

The $3.25 per semester fee increase, which is just below the 7.5 percent raise allowed by section 4 of article 5 of the SGA constitution, is still below what the governing body needs financially in the long-term, according to Thompson. A future referendum, Thompson said, would eventually be necessary to raise the fees above the 7.5 percent cap to ensure that the SGA would not have to repeat the move every year.

Conca focuses on water wars

BY SARA EGLITIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Dr. Ken Conca presented "Understanding the Global Water Crisis" at the University of Massachusetts Monday as the second lecture in The Environmental Institute's Water Sustainability Lecture Series.

"I see if [you don't think of it] in wet Western Massachusetts, the reliability of clean, usable water is an issue in many, particularly poorer, parts of the world and everyone should learn about it," said Conca.

"Half to two-thirds of the world's people will live in conditions of 'water insecurity' within a few decades under business as usual," said Conca.

While he added this is not going to happen tomorrow and is "not necessarily a crisis," he added that lack of water is an issue the global community is continually going to face.

"We have been told water is the oil of the 21st century," said Conca, adding that he assumes that there will be violent battles to obtain it.

As Americans continue to stress over water quality, the real issue is obtaining it, he said.

Once there is a good source of water, whether a natural lake or manmade basin, governing bodies decide to control access. The political interest in water access is on both the global and local scale, according to Conca.

One example is the upstream-downstream issue. The upstream region is possibly a separate country I wishes to keep the water and use as much of it as possible, he said. The downstream region is at the

Challah for a Dolla resumes at UMass

BY ELIZABETH HAWLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In September 2006, Mara Seidel, the Jewish Campus Service Corps Fellow at Hillel House, decided to sell extra loaves of Challah bread that were left over from a Jewish Women's Collective night.

Seidel said she read about a group in California selling Challah for Hunger and decided to edit that idea for the University of Massachusetts campus. Selling the Challah for $1 in the Campus Center, Hillel sold all 24 of their extra loaves in one day.

This was the start of Challah for a Dolla, now a regular fundraiser at the Hillel House. All money raised goes to the American Jewish World Services (AJWS) and specifically to their Sudan Relief and Advocacy Fund. According to Seidel, Bill Clinton praised Hillel's Challah for a Dolla program in a speech he gave at the AJWS "Partners in Global Justice" conference on June 13.

For the first time this semester, the University's MassPIRG chapter will be collaborating with Hillel on this program. Beginning this week, the MassPIRG Darfur Campaign will be volunteering alongside Hillel House volunteers to bake the challah and to sell it in the Campus Center.

"We're both working to end the genocide in Darfur," said MassPIRG Darfur Campaign coordinator and UMass sophomore Yasmin Abbajad about the collaborative efforts of MassPIRG and Hillel. "This is one way that we can work together for a good cause. Two groups are better than one."

The first joint bake-off occurred Oct. 21. For seven hours, volunteers working in shifts made the dough, braided it and baked, working on other Darfur projects such as posters for visibility, while they waited for the dough to rise and bake. Volunteers then sold the challah in the Campus Center and in Bartlett Monday and Tuesday of this week, raising an estimated $60 or more. In addition to selling the challah, the volunteers hope to spread awareness about the situation in Darfur.

"In high school, I never knew exactly what [the situation in Darfur] was," said Yasmin. "And then I came here and learned what it was through MassPIRG."

According to a MassPIRG information pamphlet from last year, "Darfur has been embroiled in a deadly conflict for over three years. At least 400,000 people have been killed; more than 2 million innocent civilians have been forced to flee their homes – more than 3.5 million men, women and children are completely reliant on international aid for survival."

Sites offer illegitimate degrees for a price

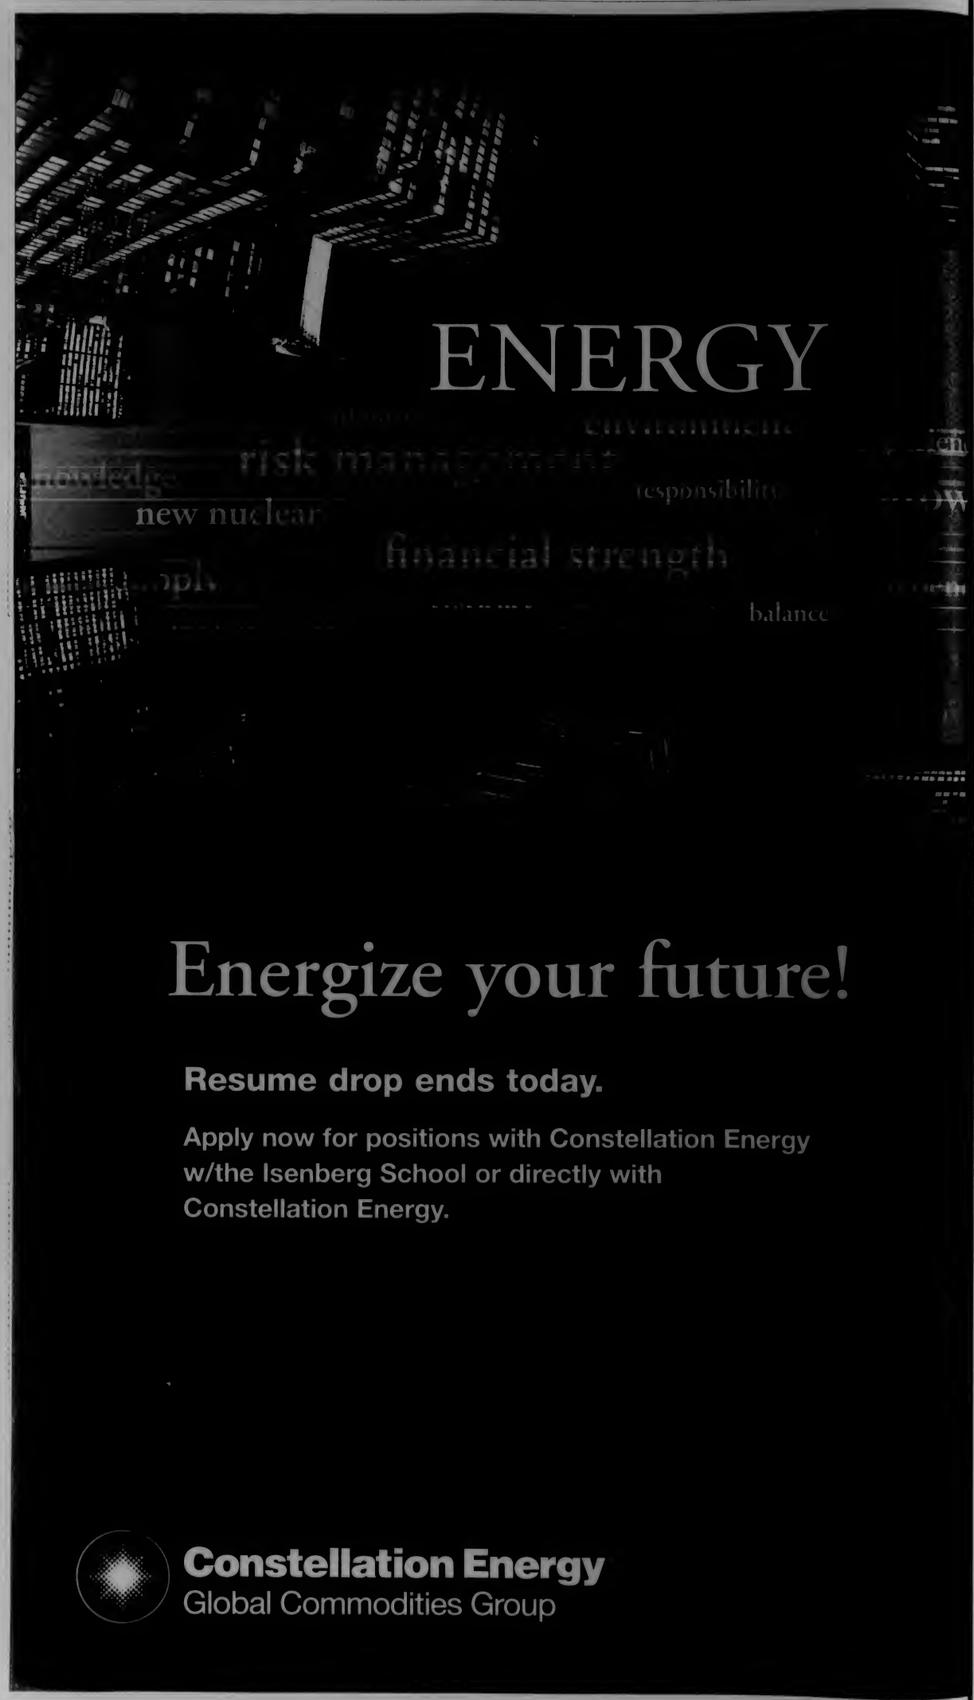
BY FRANK VITALE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With the University of Massachusetts currently in the middle of midterms, students are working harder than ever. They spend countless hours listening to professors reading and re-reading textbooks and typing page after page for that report due in four hours, all the while telling themselves it will pay off when they get that thing they've been slaving so hard for a diploma.

Unfortunately, not everyone plays by these rules.

Diploma mills are substandard or fraudulent "colleges" that offer diplomas for little or no actual work, far below the degree requirements for an accredited program. Programs may require a small amount of work, but nothing near the amount required for a degree from an accredited program. Some of these programs, such as Belford University (www.belforduniversity.org), offer what they call "life-experience degrees," where you can be awarded a diploma "for what you already know."

Belford University's Web site says its degree programs are "designed for professionals and working adults."



"These programs provide a unique, once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to earn a cheap degree on the basis of life experience or online equivalency test," reads the site.

The site adds that the diplomas are based on past accomplishments, religious or military training, volunteer activities, etc., or by passing an online equivalency test. Students can earn accredited degrees, like an online accounting degree or any other major within seven days without taking admission or attending classes.

All you have to do is to select your program and your major, for example an associate degree or an online MBA degree and then place your order. If you do not find the major you are looking for on our lists just submit the name and we will instantly introduce that particular major, allowing you get the university degrees you desire within the shortest time possible," the Web site reads.

Matt Giancola, chair of the Academic Affairs Committee, criticized the fee hike for adding even more of a financial burden on students at the University of Massachusetts. As the largest and most important body that comprises and advocates for students, the SGA would be better off advocating for fee decreases from the Board of Trustees and supporting the MassPIRG campaign to lower textbook prices, Giancola said in an address to the senate during the first round of debate.

"Raising our fees also sends a terrible message to the student body," Giancola said. "Most of us campaigned on the promise to work to lower student fees, not use our power to raise them."

The motion passed with six "no" votes; Giancola's was among them.

According to Buford, the successful passage of the motion through the senate was very important to sustaining the organization and allowing for the expansion of some services.

Educating students as to why the organization needed the increased funds would play an important role in making the SGA comparable to other universities in the future, Buford said.

"We need to be educating these students feeling uncomfortable about making this increase without educating the students which is a sentiment that is expressed throughout the organization," Buford said. "This particular issue is for the moment. It's for sustainability."

Increasing RSO budgets, agency budgets and expanding the services offered to the campus by the SGA would require a referendum to raise the fees even higher in the future, according to Buford.

"We absolutely have to [hold a referendum]," he said. "If we want to expand and grow as an organization we certainly have to do more than $3.50 a semester."

Buford expected the referendum to happen soon, but not before educating the student body and evaluating how UMass students would feel about giving more money to the student activities trust fund. The SGA needed to be as ambitious as possible in educating students, Buford said, before a decision would be reached on whether the referendum would be on the president and trustee election.

Students currently pay the $43.50 student activity fee every semester for a total cost of $87. When the new fee goes into effect next year, students will be paying $93 over the course of the entire school year.

The senate also passed a motion granting the UMass Ski and Board Club $4,000 from the SGA finance reserves for their Annual Ski Sale to cover the cost of police, parking and advertising for the event.

Two programs aim for Amherst change of them go unreported.

"We've got a lot of support services for people to come forward so women feel safer," Gundersen said.

Gunderson hopes the class will encourage women to not only defend themselves but also to be more active in going to the police if they are a victim of assault. Women often open up in classes like this and mention something that they kept from the police, Gunderson said that police look for it to happen and find a way to help victims emotionally.

"Women may be concerned with commenting on offenses where police may be standoffish," Gundersen said. "Police work to get rid of their existing fears."

RAD is open to women of all ages and anyone from the surrounding community. The inclusion for younger females is due to studies that show that assault is becoming a problem for a younger age group of girls.

"We've recently been involved in a mentoring program for domestic violence at the high school age," Gundersen said. "We're finding that younger dating couples are involved in domestic violence."

The class starts Nov. 12 and goes until Nov. 16 and will run from 5 to 7 p.m. at the Amherst Police Department Community Room. The police department encourages any female to preregister by calling 413-259-3355 or e-mailing the Amherst police at police@amherstma.gov.

Any Amherst resident can register for the next car seat inspection for Nov. 17 with the police department at the same phone number and e-mail.

parts of the readings.

Recounting his journeys, he highlighted the extreme differences between what he deemed to be happening in Iraq and what is being reported by the mainstream media. The stories ranged from the lighthearted story of the gas shortage in Iraq to his dark retellings of his times both in Fallujah and in Iraq's poorly maintained hospitals. The journalist did not deem any subject taboo, throwing his barbs at everyone from Dick Cheney to the Blackwater Corporation.

During the question and answer portion, lines quickly formed in front of each of the microphones as people queued up to pick his brain or to simply thank him for his presence.

During this part of the lecture, he talked most vehemently about the cold shoulder he has been given by the mainstream media and joked about how he had been blacklisted by the military. Jamail even went so far as to make his most startling claim that torture had been present in Iraq from the beginning and finished the statement by saying, "I have the proof."

The question about U.S. withdrawal from Iraq was one of the most frequently asked questions and, unlike most of today's politicians, Dahr was quick give his opinion. He said that in talking with the Iraqis, most favored an "immediate and full withdrawal" of U.S. forces.

Despite this, he added that this situation is sadly far from over, as even the democratic candidates have "put off leaving until at least their second term," putting the withdrawal time as far back as 2012.

The event was free of drama that often characterizes speeches. There were no protests on scene and there were few, if any, disruptions. There were no questions aimed at disproving his theories, and most would offer only praise for his work. One of the introductory speakers said that Jamail "represents what's lacking in our lives today."

After the lecture, the people exited and gave Jamail further applause. He seemed all too aware of the depressing realities that he spoke about to the audience, but audience members did not leave in the manner that he had joked about earlier, saying he feared the audience would be "slitting their wrists on the way out."

Roth speaks at AC on torture

Yale grad on human rights

BY LAURA ODENTHAL
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Kenneth Roth, executive director of Human Rights Watch, discussed the United States' counter-terrorism efforts, specifically aspects of torture, during his talk, titled "Why the Current Approach to Fighting Terrorism is Making us Less Safe" in the Prusne Lecture Hall of Amherst College.

Roth, a graduate of Yale Law School and Brown University, conducts explorations probing into abuses of human rights in over 70 countries.

In his lecture, Roth broke down the Bush administration's loopholes in his policies regarding torture and terrorism. Roth explained that the Bush administration has the ability to purposely misconstrue the definition of torture and treaties regarding torture such as the Cruel Inhumane Degrading (CID) treaty when it involves terrorists.

The Bush administration considers that the only way an act can be constituted as torture is if it causes "pain to the equivalent of death or loss of a vital organ occurs." He said this definition has allowed the United States to inflict pain upon possible terrorists and suspend Habeas Corpus, the right to a fair trial.

These ambiguous, murky policies have allowed inhumane treatment to occur in detention facilities across the world such as Guantanamo Bay, he said. These policies dealing with torture warp the law beyond recognition, Roth said.

He believes that not only is the law being twisted, but these policies instated to "protect us" are actually making us more vulnerable for future attacks. Roth disagrees with Bush's notion that there are a definite amount of terrorists and that if we eliminate them by torturing them to speak out and placing them in detention centers, the world will be a safer place.

Roth said the United States is "building up a pool of terrorists faster than we are emptying them out."

He believes performing these subterranean acts of torture results in the ruining of our credibility.

Roth explained that answering to violence with violence is not an adequate way to battle this geographically limitless war.

'RUOK' aims to help elderly

By Marjorie Connolly
Collegian Staff

This summer, police arrived at the door of an Amherst resident. They entered the house and found a senior citizen who had fallen and was immobile, but alive.

The police had arrived without a distress call to a dispatcher. The citizen had missed a call from the Amherst Police Department's RUOK Program.

RUOK is a computerized telephone reassurance program. Senior citizens or disabled people who live alone are encouraged to subscribe. Subscribers receive a daily call; if they don't pick up the phone after three times, an alert report is issued and police check on the situation.

The Amherst police issued a recent press release to draw attention to the program. They want to make it clear to seniors that the service isn't too much to ask of the department.

"The police could be on fire and seniors will call the business line because they don't want to overburden services," said Lt. Jennifer Gundersen of the APD.

The program was initiated because automated calling technology became an easy, viable alternative to live calls.

"Technology said, 'We can make this job easy for you,'" said Gundersen.

Visiting the houses of seniors who miss calls is the only function the force plays in the system. These visits are rare, Gundersen said.

"Seniors know when we're going to call," he said. "They remember when they're going to be away."

He said the system is only activated when an absence is unexplained.

Amherst has used the RUOK system for about 10 years. Subscription fluctuates between 15 and 20 people. The program developed as a response to a trend, not a specific event. When the system isn't in place, "paramedics go where seniors have been down for more than a day," according to Gundersen.

The Amherst Seniors and Law Enforcement Together Council (SALT) and the Amherst Police Department team up to offer the program. SALT members identify seniors who are in need of the service.

A call-in program is especially valuable to Amherst.

"We think of Amherst as a well-to-do town. We don't realize that there are many older adults who don't have family and financial resources," said Susan Krauss Whitbourne, a psychology professor at the University of Massachusetts who specializes in gerontology.

She emphasizes that the winter is especially dangerous for seniors, who will venture outside less frequently due to the oncoming cold.

Amherst isn't the only town that uses this kind of system. According to Gundersen, programs like this developed "with the onset of community policing about 15 years ago" when police began looking for "different ways to keep communities safe."

However, town programs aren't ubiquitous. Professor Whitbourne said that "it sounds like Amherst is at the vanguard" of a move to public telephone reassurance programs.

As some national agencies have been forced to privatize, that movement could be threatened by a move to the private sector. Professor Whitbourne argues that these programs are best executed within the public sphere. She said that "private programs have the potential to charge for products they don't deliver."

The Amherst police agree. Private companies "have limitations, because the people who respond might not have CPR and first responder training," said Gundersen.

Talk of water wars

Conca predicts conflict as world's supply slowly vanishes

mercy of the upstream's "damming, diverting, draining, dumping, [and] developing," according to Conca.

Another factor hindering global accord is varying cultural perspectives of water. Conca highlighted three, as he said water is a "scarce commodity with market value," a "critical ecosystem," and it also functions as an "anchor of local livelihoods and culture."

For example, the businessman wishing to hold and sell the water to the public would view distribution practices differently than a fresh-water fisher needing access to the water and its fish to make a living.

To combat this growing water access problem, ingenuity is needed, he said.

Conca pointed out that "hydro-geography is not destiny." According to him, there is no correlation between water endowment and access. An arid region does not have to lack water, nor does a wet one have to utilize its presence.

He used an example from the Worldwatch Institute's "State of the World 2005" as he measured the progress of different regions of the world in their ability to provide "access to safe drinking water and sanitation." The Arab States are not applicable in either category because they already meet or surpass standards. Places such as East Asia Pacific are "lagging" in both, he said.

Worldwide commercial water use is split between agricultural, municipal and industrial sectors. Each sector is requiring increasing amounts of water to sustain itself and will continue doing so for the foreseeable future. But Conca said there "is not reasonably enough water for that to be the case."

Current technical water control mechanisms have not been fully efficient, he said. Conca uses a metaphor shown on a sculpture at Three Gorges Dam in China. Three large muscular figures try to block the water that flows in from the top left of the scene. Despite all their force and effort, the water is still able to flow out at the bottom right, as if the figures were not there at all.

More efficient methods have to be found to provide the global population with adequate water daily. These methods should address these and other issues, he said.

Conca is from the University of Maryland, where he is a professor of government and politics and director of the Harrison Program on the Future Global Agenda. His research and teaching interests include global environmental politics, environmental policies, transnationalism and social movements in world politics.

Interest in this issue has been growing. I Mass is the "fourth or fifth campus" Conca has visited to lecture about water management in the past year, he said.

More information about water sustainability and the lecture series can be found on The Environmental Institute's Web site at www.umass.edu/tei. Charles Vorosmarty will be presenting the next lecture, "Lessons from the U.S. Northeast Corridor," on Tuesday Nov. 6 at 3:30 p.m. in the Student Union Cape Cod Lounge.

Cheap degrees said to cheapen degrees department defended this decision, it pales in comparison to similar cases. New York City, for example, publicly reprimanded 14 firefighters, as well as fining them a collective $135,000.

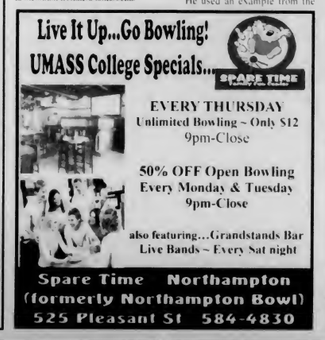
This spells trouble for students striving to earn real degrees, including those at UMass.

"It's the first time I've really ever heard of this," said Colby Kuzontkoski, a grad student in music performance. "It definitely seems unfair."

Though he says it's unlikely someone would be able to fake a music degree convincingly, Kuzontkoski admitted that diploma mills could indirectly affect him in the future.

"If it affects the people hiring music teachers, then, yeah, that'd be a problem," he said.

Matt Giancola, a senior political science major, agrees.



"It kind of cheapens our degrees," he said. "If employers can't be sure of the genuineness it makes us have to work harder to find a job."

He also pointed out that not everyone who deals with diploma mills may know what they're getting into.

"Some people may think that they're getting a real education out of those things when they're really not," he said.

Papers altered by White House

By H. Josef Hebert
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Two chairmen of key committees in the House and Senate on Wednesday criticized the White House for editing testimony from a government expert about the health impacts of global warming and demanded documents involving the testimony be provided to Congress.

"I am deeply concerned that important scientific and health information was removed from the ... testimony at the last minute," Sen. Barbara Boxer, chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, wrote President Bush.

Rep. Bart Gordon, D-Tenn., chairman of the House Science and Technology Committee, demanded an explanation from the White House's chief science adviser, John Marburger, about the handing of the testimony earlier this week by Dr. Julie Gerberding, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. She appeared Tuesday before Boxer's committee, which is crafting global warming legislation.

"We expect our government researchers and scientists to provide both Congress and the public the full results of their taxpayer-supported work without the filter that those of opposing views might like to impose," Gordon wrote Marburger.

The White House denied that the testimony by Gerberding was "watered down" and noted that she has said she does not believe she was censored.

When a draft of Gerberding's testimony went to the White House for review, two sections — "Climate Change is a Public Health Concern" and "Climate Change Vulnerability" — and a number of other phrases were removed, cutting the 12-page document in half.

A copy of the draft given to the White House was obtained by The Associated Press.

Earlier, a CDC official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the review process, told the AP that the original draft "was eviscerated" by "heavy-handed" changes in Washington.

Boxer asked that the White House provide her committee, by next week, copies of all drafts of Gerberding's testimony and any records of comments made on the draft testimony. "The public has a right to know all of the facts about global warming and the threat it poses to their families and communities," Boxer wrote.

Gordon and Rep. Brad Miller, D-N.C., chairman of the House Science subcommittee on investigations and oversight, made a similar request.

White House press secretary Dana Perino said Gerberding's testimony went through an interagency review "and a number of agencies had some concerns."

She said some reviewers did not believe the draft matched the science as presented in a report on global warming and public health effects by a U.N. panel that has assessed climate change for decades.

The CDC testimony "was not watered down in terms of its science [or] ... in terms of the concerns that climate change raises for public health," Perino said.

Gerberding played down the changes to her prepared text and said she was comfortable with her presentation Tuesday to the Senate committee.

"I was absolutely happy with my testimony in Congress. We finally had a chance to go and say what we thought was important," she said at a luncheon appearance in Atlanta.

"I don't let people put words in my mouth, and I stand for science," said Gerberding. She said she was free to depart from the six pages of prepared testimony given the committee and did so.

1.6 percent of Facebook sold

By Michael Liedtke
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Rapidly rising Internet star Facebook Inc. has sold a 1.6 percent stake to Microsoft Corp. for $240 million, spurning a competing offer from online search leader Google Inc.

Culminating weeks of negotiations, the investment announced Wednesday values Palo Alto-based Facebook at $15 billion — a stunning figure for an online hangout started in a Harvard University dorm room less than four years ago.

Microsoft also will sell Internet ads for Facebook as the site expands outside the United States, broadening a marketing relationship that began last year.

"This is a strong statement of confidence in this partnership and in Facebook," Kevin Johnson, president of Microsoft's platforms and services division, said during a Wednesday conference call with reporters and analysts.

Besides validating founder Mark Zuckerberg's decision to rebuff a $1 billion takeover offer from Yahoo Inc. last year, Microsoft's money should be more than enough to pay for Facebook's ambitious expansion plans until the privately held company goes public.

Zuckerberg, 23, has indicated he would like to hold off on an initial public offering for at least two more years. In the meantime, Facebook hopes to become an advertising magnet by substantially increasing its current worldwide audience of nearly 50 million active users, who connect with friends on the site through messaging, photo-sharing and other tools it offers.

Although News Corp.'s MySpace.com remains the largest social network, Facebook has been growing much faster the past year.

Facebook attracted 30.6 million U.S. visitors during September compared with 68.4 million at MySpace. Microsoft's entry in the social networking arena "Windows Live Spaces" attracted 9.8 million U.S. visitors, according to comScore Inc.

To support its growth, Facebook is gearing up to more than double its payroll during the next year to about 700 employees. The company currently employs about 300 workers with annual revenue believed to fall between $100 million and $150 million.

The Facebook investment represents a coup for Microsoft because it strengthened for several years as it watched Google deepen its dominance of the space.

During its fiscal year, ending in June, Microsoft's online ad revenue rose 21 percent to $1.84 billion. Over the same period, Google's ad revenue soared 64 percent to $13.3 billion.

Microsoft also appears interested in Facebook's success with "widgets" — the interactive capsules that offer applications available on other Web sites. Outside developers have created about 8,000 widgets since Facebook began soliciting the contributions in May.

Johnson said Microsoft plans to work with Facebook in areas besides advertising but declined to elaborate.

With the Facebook investment, Microsoft dealt a rare setback to Google, which trumped its rival in earlier bidding battles involving a stake in AOL and ownership of online video sharing pioneer YouTube and Internet ad service DoubleClick Inc.

Microsoft couldn't afford to lose the tug-of-war for the Facebook investment and advertising alliance, said Gartner analyst Allen Weiner.

Dumped treasure worth $3 million

By Jennifer Ahlan
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The treasure that a New York City woman saved from the trash — a stolen masterpiece by Mexican artist Rufino Tamayo — is expected to go for as much as $1 million at auction next month.

Elizabeth Gibson will get a $15,000 reward for returning "Tres Personajes" ("Three People") to its rightful owners, as well as an undisclosed percentage of the auction price.

Nearly four years ago Gibson was on her way to coffee when she spotted the painting among garbage bags set out for morning collection in her Upper West Side neighborhood.

She walked by it at first but said she "immediately knew I had to go back. I knew I had to take it!"

"It was a huge, powerful and beautiful painting and I said to myself, 'It is wrong to be in the garbage,'" Gibson told Reuters on Tuesday.

Gibson, who had hung up the painting after her discovery, said she learned of its worth when research led her to the Web site of "Antiques Roadshow FYI," a companion program to the PBS show "Antiques Roadshow."

Sotheby's expert August Uribe had featured the painting on "Antiques Roadshow FYI" after it was stolen more than 20 years ago.

"Tres Personajes" was returned to its owners, who wish to remain anonymous, and is expected to fetch between $750,000 and $1 million when Sotheby's auctions it on November 20.

If Gibson had not acted so quickly after spying the painting, it might have been lost forever. A doorman nearby later told her that garbage collectors had come along just 20 minutes after she had left with her new finding.

"Tres personajes" was rescued by Elizabeth Gibson.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 25, 2007

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself." – Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Assemble peacefully

The University set forth an impressive advertising campaign this fall. Posters, flyers and pamphlets were distributed. Mass e-mails were sent out and full-page ads taken in our own Daily Collegian. The purpose of this campaign, however, wasn't to encourage student volunteerism, or tolerance, or activism. It was set forth to encourage students to refrain from rioting.

Does anyone else think that this should go without saying?

The administration is making strides, sometimes misguidedly, sometimes not, in quelling the University's national image as "The Zoo."

The administration overhauled the alcohol policy and allowed larger police presence in response to ABC News Primetime's claim that we were America's most violent large school. We've also recently fallen from party grace with the release of this year's Princeton Review, in which we fell right off the list of the "Top 20 Party Schools," having placed ninth the previous year.

We haven't, however, been able to shake our reputation for rioting.

The events that transpired last December left a sour taste in everyone's mouth. The University and UMPD were not prepared to handle such a large-scale incident, and the subsequent prosecution relied heavily on anecdotal evidence and grainy photographs. Many students faced suspension, expulsion and criminal prosecution for their actions.

• Fingers have been pointed in every direction, and very few of the parties involved are entirely innocent. But the overarching message of the University's ubiquitous campaign is worth repeating.

Just don't riot.

It sounds redundant and contrived – it should go without saying. As the University chides the students who participated in late year's riot and warns the current student body against a repeat, we collectively nod our heads in agreement. But there is still a relative likelihood that if our beloved Red Sox win yet another World Series – or even if they lose – that we'll have ourselves a repeat of 2004's riot and that of just last December.

Only this time, the UMPD will be ready, and will probably be operating under a zero-tolerance policy. And rightfully so.

We're all excited about the Sox finding themselves in yet another World Series after having breaking the Curse of the Bambino not so long ago. However, It just isn't worth the detriment to the University's reputation or our own academic careers to let our celebrations – or our anguish – get out of hand.

Now is the time for fan fervor. Red Sox Nation is well represented on campus, and should feel free to make itself heard. Yell at the TV, high-five your buddies and scream all sorts of obscenities; take off your Coco Crisp jersey and wave it over your head, because that's what good fans do.

Just don't riot.

Grappling the nature of love

Brad Leibowitz

Regardless of who you are, you've thought about it. Whether it came to you in a late night thought, or whether it hit you on some idle Tuesday afternoon while smoking grass, it's crossed your mind. That simple and inevitable human thought: What is love?

To answer this instead of inspecting the applications that love lives in, our time will be better spent by doing the exact opposite. To learn what love is, if that is indeed possible they say you must first know its antithesis: hate.

They say this of everything, not just love. To truly know something, you must know the opposite. Yet that statement isn't true. I know I'm alive, and I don't need to die to know that. I know a lever zero on the pH scale will scald my arm and possibly burn straight through it. I know this. I don't need to know what a level 14 on the pH scale will do – remove skin and burn through it. Ouch.

This might seem like a tangent, but it isn't. When it comes to physical things, you don't need to know an object's opposite to know the object itself. This is not always true unlike love, a physical object is tangible, yet more importantly, it causes a visceral reaction.

When broken down on paper, it seems love makes no sense … hate, when broken down, makes too much sense.

Hate is much like the instant reaction you get from a car barreling down upon you at "5 miles-per-hour. Your reaction would come from your gut, not from your mind. If it came from your mind, and you proceeded to go through the thought process of, "There's a car coming. Should I run away or walk away? How fast?" by the time you decided, your body would be flatter than a flap jack (flap jacks are flatter than pancakes – don't ask me how I know).

However, much to the opposite, if you found yourself in the aforementioned situation, your natural ingrained fear of death would stir an instinctive reaction in you to move without thinking. This is the antithesis of love: hate, simply put, is an emotion which occurs in the absence of a thought-out thought.

Due to this, if I asked you to think of three things you hate after the end of this sentence, you should have no problem doing it.

Now that you have those three things in mind, I will bet you anything they are all concrete solid objects. People tend to hate the sight of death, or the taste of a rotten apple, or that girl guy who wouldn't sleep with you because he or she thinks you look like Screech or Jessie from "Saved by the Bell."

We hate things we know. We hate things we can physically feel, and yes, we do hate ideas. Nonetheless, instead of simply hating a thought, people tend to hate the person or being who represents the embodiment of that thought, i.e. Hitler.

The sight of Hitler provokes a visceral gut reaction that immediately leads to the thought, "I hate the goofy-mustached jerk." You hear some variation of that much more than you would hear, "I hate Nazi propaganda." It's minimally easier to put a face on an idea because it simplifies the idea to something tangible, which in effect makes it easier to hate.

Love though, is different. Love isn't visceral – it's unCerebral.

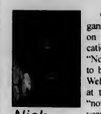
By this I don't mean that love is a gut feeling, much to the contrary, it is a feeling which doesn't appeal to the gut or the mind. It's the sole reason for the saying "suffering from a broken heart."

In all its glory, love is much like faith. Although true believers like to say that religion appeals to their intellect, at the end of the day, they know it appeals to their heart. Love is the same way. It comforts us without reasons. It doesn't ask why or how or if. It just is. Love, above all other emotions, appeals to nothing with the exception of a distinct set of human emotions.

In its purest form it is designed to overwhelm logic and supply us with the irrational thoughts which let us, as a people, carry on. It is based upon a belief which turns into a personal truth, and thus – for the individual – love doesn't stem from reality, it defines it.

Oddly enough, although when broken down on paper, it seems love makes no sense, which is why, for lack of a better term, we love it.

Hate, when broken down, makes too much sense. It can be deconstructed, dismantled, scattered apart and then put back together again. Love though, once taken apart, dies.



This is most certainly why when asked to look back at the defining moments of your life, they are almost always moments of pain. They just hurt more and because of their instinctive feeling, we carry them with a level of hate. Hate is felt by defining moments. Love has no moments. As said it defines.

It appeals to nothing reasonable, yet makes perfect sense.

So, what is love? I have no idea, but I know that I hate the idea of not knowing it. So I guess in a way, that in and of itself, is love.

The real goal of education

Nick Milano

One of the slogans often found on UMass publications claims that "Now's the time to be at UMass." Well, take a look at this period of "now." In the last year or so, UMass Amherst has seen its chancellor basically forced out of his job, various reports have appeared detailing the school's struggles at raising money and the president of the UMass system suffered a no-confidence vote. Clearly, "now" is the best time to be at UMass.

Last week, The Boston Globe and The Daily Collegian ran articles that detailed how the UMass Alumni Association is not adequately performing its job. This flurry of activity continues to demonstrate how UMass is abandoning its current and past students in the hope of creating a bigger, better UMass for the future. It's too bad – they are failing at this dream.

Low participation rates by alumni signal that the University is not seeking their input and is disregarding their importance to sustaining a cohesive center of education. For many years, public colleges in Massachusetts were dependent on government funding to provide a vast amount of resources, but schools across the nation have suffered as government has cut the amount of money going to colleges.

From 2001 to 2004, for example, the liberal bastion of Massachusetts led the nation in the percentage of funding cuts by slashing the monies it gave the state's higher education institutions by one-third. Now, more than ever, UMass will need to reap the benefits of alumni giving and one of the obvious ways to accomplish this is through a strong and organized alumni association.

The latest reports on the state of alumni associations around the nation, however, indicate that UMass has failed to keep up with schools like Iowa State University, one college the administration claims is at the same level as UMass. Don't even ask about potential comparisons to the likes of Penn State University or the University of Texas.

The UMass Alumni Association boasts a membership of just over 6,000 graduates. That is 6,000 people out of an estimated 210,000 living alumni for a pitiful 3 percent participation rate. Since the association launched a new program to boost alumni participation, there has been an 8 percent decrease in membership numbers. As published in The Daily Collegian last Friday, the Association claims to have seen increases in other forms of participation, but how has the Alumni Association failed to capitalize and stand pat as membership rolls continue to shrink?

Change is good – we should welcome change. But whatever happened to just giving hungry students a college education?

In addition to seeing its alumni membership numbers lagging, UMass has also failed to maintain the percentage of alumni who give every year. The school is 33 of 50 in private fundraising. In fact, three of the top fundraising schools averaged spending $23 million just to attract donors. This nearly tops the total that UMass brought in.

That tiny amount of donations will fail to cover the growing costs of schedule construction and repair projects. Now the school will again be dependent on the state for a major portion of the school's funds. Many top universities, like the University of Virginia, only need their state governments to augment their revenues, not subsidize them.

The problems in UMass's alumni organizations are very real, but they do take time to fix and perhaps three years is rather soon to start unloading criticism. But even if one limits his expectations to incremental improvements, much is left to be desired. Despite revamping its approach three years ago, the alumni association cannot even say it has one more member now than it did then – surely, their message is not catching on. In regards to fundraising, one has to establish a core of supporters before reaching out beyond that small group, but a UMass Amherst internal review discovered that the pool of donors has not grown for 10 years and that "donations only increased at the rate of inflation." Again, incremental improvement would be good to see, but nothing of that kind exists.

The Amherst campus – indeed, the whole UMass system – is in transition-mode. Chancellor Jack Wilson envisions consolidating all five UMass campuses as Amherst strives to become a world-class university. But there is plenty of evidence that it will not happen smoothly. For UMass to ever achieve this status, fundraising will have to take off. Alumni participation will have to shoot through the roof. In essence, the entire culture of UMass will have to change.

Change is good – we should welcome change. But whatever happened to just giving hungry students a college education? Lost in the lust for national recognition is the student body, especially those of us here now.

In no way should the school give up on trying to raise more money and increase alumni participation, but perhaps the administration should realize it is trying to make UMass into something it is not. Reaching for the stars is a worthy occupation, but since when is it a crime to be a middle of the pack educational institution?

Sure, educating the next president or the next Nobel Prize winner or the next Poet Laureate would be great, but there is nothing wrong with a reputation based on turning out responsible citizens who work good jobs and lead good lives. That is not mediocrity– that is shaping the next generation of Americans.

FIELD NOTES

The first of a three-part series chronicling the thoughts, perspectives and opinions of United States Army Public Affairs specialist and UMass senior Felicia Whatley. She is currently deployed in Bahgdad, Iraq.

Weekend warrior no more

Students transition from soldier to student and student to soldier, balancing a life of a college kid freedom verses a life of discipline. At UMass, one can do both in the Army ROTC programs, or if they are like me, they will continue to enjoy a career as an enlisted. Going against the grain in a very leftist campus, why would you want to join while America is at war?

This is an introspective look at what it is like to put the blue jeans and tank tops aside and put on combat boots and fatigues instead.

Carrying a backpack, text book and a rifle, this daddy's girl is ready to fight for freedom here and abroad – whether I agree with whatever conflict the world is in at the moment doesn't matter. It is my job, my duty, my life.

As a senior at UMass Amherst I am doing my best to juggle my military career and my goals of finishing school.

We used to be called "Weekend Warriors," but six years after 9/11 about 70 percent of National Guard and Reserves have been activated – some for their second or third tour. This will be my third interruption of college in my seven years as a veteran. As a senior at UMass, I am doing my best to juggle my military career and my goals of finishing school.

I am lucky in that my military job coincides with my degree. My major is journalism and my minor is military science. I serve as a public affairs specialist, a print journalist, which is only available as an enlisted. There is such a thing as a public affairs officer, but they are editors and commander administrators.

I love my job as a reporter. I am preparing to work in the capacity of embedding and escorting of civilian media into military units in Baghdad and continue to cover events in and around post.

Last summer I volunteered to get deployed with an infantry unit – the first to have females attached. The 3-144th Infantry of Kilgore, Texas, should be returning from their year-and-a-half tour as I lay boots on ground for the 65th Public Affairs Operation Center out of Lexington, Mass. Though I didn't end up deploying with the infantry company, the training I received with them will last me a lifetime. Marching with field men required running for me.

This summer I was back to Fort Dix, N.J. The training here was more in-depth and rigorous than boot camp, everything done with several hundred dollars worth of 40-pound body armor. The most unpleasant part was spending about a month living in a tent at the Forward Operating Base mini Camp Victory.

Summers in Dix are not only hot but humid and like many other soldiers, after spending most of the day sweating in the body armor, I slept sweating in my tent ending up with a terrible skin infection. Two thousand milligrams of antibiotics each day for 10 days was not a lot of fun, but I got through it like anything else in the military. My hair was down to the middle of my back; reluctantly, I cut it short because putting it up in a bun wet was contributing to the skin problems.

As I wait for paperwork to pan out and a ticket to Kuwait to materialize, I try to get ahead with my schoolwork, e-mailing in my assignments and corresponding with my professors I regularly pull CQ – a type of guard duty – and work out constantly trying to make a two-mile run under a certain time.

My guidance councilor asked me what I wanted to do when I graduated. I said, "Combat Journalist." If everything works out I am going to be in that capacity in Iraq before I graduate.

POINT-COUNTER-POINT

"Freedom rings where opinions clash." - Adlai E. Stevenson

Birth control in America

Facilitating safe sex

Melissa Garber

Whether schools decide to preach abstinence only or hand out condoms between classes, kids will have sex. Sexual activity is obviously scarcer among the younger set of 11- to 14-year-olds, but it is still prevalent. The health care clinic at Kings Middle School in Portland, Maine recently made the landmark decision to combat pregnancy and offer birth control to students. The decision has raised controversy amongst students and parents alike, as birth control distribution amongst middle schools is not a common practice.

According to ABC News, in the past four years there have been 17 reported pregnancies at the three middle schools in Portland. It is comforting to hear that Kings health center has taken a proactive approach to teenage and preteen pregnancies. Some students – no matter how small in numbers – are engaging in sexual activities and they will be benefited by the school's easy access to birth control.

Kings health center has helped five more students avoid pregnancies, abortions or miscarriages.

Students need parental permission to use the school's clinic, but upon receiving that permission, their treatment is confidential and protected by state laws. Students as young as 11 can go to the clinic and have an adult to confide in who is bound by law not to reveal any information to the student's parents.

They can discuss their sex lives, their substance abuse or any of the other taboos pervading their lives.

Although it might not curb any student's sexual activities, it will provide them with the necessary information to make responsible decisions, like wearing condoms and using birth control. I am not advocating that middle-schoolers should engage in sex, but I think it is an unavoidable consequence of puberty.

Although only five of the 134 students who frequented Kings health center during the 2006-2007 school years reported having sexual intercourse, I think the clinic is acting unbelievably responsibly. For those five students, the clinic has made a world of difference, offering them the resources they would have typically been denied. And the clinic will continue to make a difference for the next five students who seek assistance.

Kings health center has helped five more students avoid pregnancies, abortions or miscarriages. This is a significant fact. In a perfect world, every student's parents would be open to discussing sex with their kids. A sexually active student would not be too scared to talk to their parents about their concerns. But this is not the case since most kids are ill-informed about how to practice safe sex.

The federal government has been making a push for years to teach abstinence-only programs in schools across the country, despite the long-term scientific study Congress mandated that proved the ineffectiveness of it. According to MSNBC over 2,000 kids in the study were just as likely to have sex as their peers who had not participated. Abstinence only education does not work. Denying students – no matter how young they may be – access to birth control is a dangerous decision. It doesn't matter if you think a middle-schooler is too young to have sex. Neither you nor I can physically stop them from making those life decisions, but we can offer them the resources they need to protect themselves and their futures.

It is not enough to condemn premarital sex, or to argue that an 11-year-old is just too young. Access to birth control methods and information on the consequences of unprotected sex will not encourage students to have sex. Students who seek this information from the health care clinics will most likely already be sexually active.

If they are not, the information can only help. Increased availability of birth control and other contraceptives does not mean an increase in sex. When RAs tape envelopes full of condoms to their doors, or student organizations hand out condoms in the Campus Center, this does not drastically increase the likelihood of anyone on the receiving end having sex, no matter how much they wish it would.

Kids will have sex whether or not they have the proper tools to practice it safely. According to the Maine Youth Risk Behavior survey, 13 percent of middle school students in Maine are sexually active. I understand that parents should take a larger role in controlling their children's sex lives, but for some kids, there are no responsible adult figures in their home lives.

Kings health clinic provides a useful outlet for students who are sexually active. The benefits of providing sexually active students with birth control far outweigh the alternative: pregnant middle-schoolers.

Promoting promiscuity

Brad

The latest salvo in the war against traditional American values has been launched by an activist school district in Portland, Maine. In case you missed it, this is where school officials, in response to an "outbreak of pregnancies," have decided to issue contraceptives such as pills, patches and implants to girls as young as 11 years old.

The purported "outbreak" of pregnancies, according to CNN, is actually only 17 over the course of the last four school years spread among three different middle schools in this city of over 68,000. This statistically breaks down to little more than one pregnancy per year at each of Portland's three public middle schools. Is this what we would characterize as an outbreak? Of course not.

Even more distressingly, according to the Atlanta Constitution Journal,

"As the Portland, Maine education gurus are pushing condoms, pills, skin patches and implants onto middle school kids, more than half of its eighth graders – some 57 percent to be precise – either do not meet or only partially meet state standards for reading. Those same middle-schoolers fare even worse in math and science – with 71 percent of eighth graders failing to meet, or only meeting in part, math standards, a figure that rises to 85 percent for science subjects. You get the picture.

It is abundantly clear from the school district's own statistics that they do not have an outbreak of pregnancies.

"Portland's middle school students may not be able to read or do math real well, but they'll be able to tell you all about condoms and birth control pills."

So, what do we actually have? It is abundantly clear from the school district's own statistics that they do not have an outbreak of pregnancies with which they must contend. On the contrary, it is disheartningly obvious that Portland has a school board far more concerned with asserting its own anti-abstinence political agenda than it is with effectively educating the students under its supervision.

CNN further reported, "Five of the 134 students who visited King's Health Center during the 2006-07 school year reported having sexual intercourse, said Amanda Rowe, lead nurse in Portland's school health centers."

King's Health Center is a school-operated facility and will be the distribution point for the contraceptives assuming that the school district doesn't first capitulate in the face of mounting political pressure from conservative members of the media and Congress. And if so few of the sexually active middle-schoolers in Portland are actually consciously going into these health centers in the first place, why must the school district further waste taxpayer dollars by stocking elaborate forms of contraceptives when their own students don't even feel comfortable visiting these centers?

Is it not bad enough that they are doing a pretty ineffective job – and wasting disproportionate amounts of taxpayer money in the process – of educating their students, why would one believe that they can be any more effective at administering sexual education and prescribing contraception?

And, again, this entire school board scheme does not address the fundamental question of why a sexually active middle school girl would ever risk running afoul of her parents by asking for permission to be seen in one of these health-center-turned-Studio-54 dance rooms?

A middle school student in Portland must first receive written parental permission before they can enter the health centers. However, any treatment received once in the center is confidential under state law. Therefore, the Portland school district is content to give 11-year-olds the power to determine whether or not they receive birth control in various forms and, following that, whether or not to inform their parents.

Furthermore, this entire notion of a government-run school even possessing the right or obligation to manage or guide the sex lives of its students is so far-fetched and corrosive to American culture as to render it laughable. To wit, where are the parents of these students engaging in sex at such a perversely young age?

Nevertheless, that is a larger issue far too important to be illuminated in a column about incompetent school officials, clueless parents and horny teenagers. What is important for us – and Portland's school district – to remember is that Portland quite obviously does not have middle schools full of little Ron Jeremys and Jenna Jamesons.

On the contrary, it possesses a group of at-risk youth, who are being criminally underserved by an inept school system whose lenders are more concerned with penning attention-grabbing resolutions than with demanding excellence and raising test scores.

It is here – at the nexus of parental involvement and an emphasis on academics – that the Portland school system should be meddling. At the same time, these overzealous exemplars of our failed public school system should decisively conclude that pushing students – especially ones who are years from even qualifying for a driver's license – into the bedroom with handfuls of goodies is a pretty lousy idea.

It doesn't take a social conservative to be able to agree with that.

THE MEANING OF "ANTI-WAR"

DEAR EDITOR:

Re "Anti-war groups send mixed messages" Ed Op Oct 23, 2007

Like a Guantanamo detainee, logic is tortured beyond belief in Greg Collins' recent column. He reasons that anti-war groups like the Radical Student Union are in fact pro-war Collins defines anti-war as calling for "defeating the specific enemy targeting American forces."

Such a definition is absurd.

Anti-war individuals typically have practical and ethical objections to war, and the massive destruction of life, waste of resources and loss of innocence that inevitably accompanies it. Victory doesn't enter into their considerations, because they have already decided it is either impossible or not worth the sacrifice.

Realistically, victory as Collins defines it (stable democracy under U.S. occupation) is impossible in Iraq. The American presence there has not created stability or brought about reconstruction. It took less than four years for the U.S. and allies to triumph over Japan and Germany. The Iraq war is approaching year five, with no progress or end in sight.

For Collins to successfully claim that anti-war groups are impeding peace in Iraq, he needs to prove that the U.S. presence there is positive.

Unfortunately, his implicit goal is not to provide insight on the Iraq conflict, but to attack its opponents.

Andrew Freeman
UMass Alum, 2007

DEAR EDITOR:

Greg Collins claims that the anti-war message of many anti-war groups is lofty and in fact pro-war. Instead, he offers that the U.S. military needs to remain in Iraq in order to foster democracy and that this is the only way for the war to end.

We've been hearing this lofty and disconnected proclamation for a long time. This never has been and never will be the intention or result of military occupation in Iraq. Therefore, a call for the immediate withdrawal of troops from Iraq really doesn't sound that lofty when we consider that there aren't any benevolent reasons for them being there.

A democracy isn't a democracy unless conflicts, economic and political systems, culture, and all other aspects of a society are decided by the folks that they directly affect: that society's workers and citizens. In this case, I am talking about the people who live and work in Iraq, not the imperialist politicians, militaries and business-people of foreign nations.

PLACE THE BLAME AT HOME

DEAR EDITOR:

Re "MA drug stats 'shootout up' Ed Op, Oct. 22 2007

Joshua H. Wilder places the blame of a state-wide drug problem on "Colombian drug lords" and drug sellers on the streets. This notion, that foreigners are coming in and flooding America's streets with drugs, "peddling products to our youth," causes a great misunderstanding of America's drug problem that must be rectified if we are to find the solution.

The drug problem in America is, in large part, due to the lack of economically viable options inner-city and impoverished youths face. I have witnessed firsthand the drug trade on the streets of Jamaica Plain and Roxbury and I know the enemy is not the seller, but rather the system that leaves him or her with so few choices.

It is true that drug sellers target younger children to be sellers because they face fewer entanglements with the law. But I don't think, as said in the Boston.com article that Wilder cites, drug dealers specifically label bags with cartoon characters "to attract younger customers."

The practice of marking drug bags has been in place for decades, it is there to identify the supply, not as a way of dressing up the package. These things are said to demonize the drug seller and not the societal structure. It is a rare thing to see a drug dealer giving away anything for free, never mind to a child.

There are a variety of reasons a person may use or sell drugs. Environment, education, background or lack of income are all factors. These are the larger societal ills that must be addressed when it comes to the problem of drug use.

During my time living in the city I knew several drug dealers and even prostitutes. Although I may not have agreed with their life choices, I could understand and sympathize with their lack of options and hope. They were people like you and I, struggling to support themselves and their families. They were not lecherous creatures trolling the streets with intoxicating candy for kiddies.

The economy today is simply not suited for those who do not have the means or desire to attend college. The disappearance of the manufacturing sector has left a void in cities like Lowell, Haverhill and New Bedford. This vacuum is usually filled with a healthy drug trade.

Drugs and drug problems have existed since, well, forever. They will probably continue to flourish as long as there is poverty, despair and a lack of education and support in cities and schools. A drug user will seek out drugs and get them somewhere, somehow. The fact that we are reaching epidemic status in our own fine state should only reinforce the idea that these problems are not distant or area specific. They are symptoms of the crisis we experience as a whole.

We must not blame the individual, calling them "remorseless, money-hungry people who have no problem destroying lives to make a few bucks," but look at the divisions and systems that have created such people and attitudes.

OUR COLLECTIVE GOAL

DEAR EDITOR:

Re "GEO pickets New Dirt site" News, Oct. 19 2007

The Daily Collegian reported on the Graduate Employee Organization's (GEO) picketing of "New Dirt" construction sites at UMass-Amherst.

GEO is a unit of UAW Local 2322 and represents approximately 2,500 workers including teaching assistants, research assistants and teaching associates. GEO members teach over half of all classes on campus.

The pickets were broadly supported and highly successful. Construction workers chose to stand in solidarity with GEO members rather than cross the picket lines. GEO was joined by undergraduate students, members of other unions and community members in sending the University a clear message that graduate student employees deserve a fair contract.

GEO has been in negotiations since February and, as the Collegian reported, the University has "take-backs" on the table. Indeed, the University is proposing to cripple our health care benefits, cut GEO staff positions in half and is refusing to negotiate over fees which are unfairly imposed on students.

For graduate student employees who depend on GEO contracts to support themselves, fees create even more problems. Fees severely cut into any wage increases that might be gained and place GEO members in financial limbo. It's difficult for graduate workers to budget when they don't know what their actual income will be.

I would like to point out two issues that the Collegian did not sufficiently represent: child care and diversity funding. The Collegian stated that the University is proposing to cut child care benefits for graduate employees. This is not the case. GEO is asking the University to provide more access to child care than what is currently available.

As it stands, only about 25 percent of most GEO member's child care costs are covered in the voucher program. We are making proposals that would move that percentage closer to 50 percent. It would seem that the University might be interested in making sure that all student employees are fully covered, but we are not asking for even that.

Most importantly, the Collegian did not discuss diversity funding. Diversity funding is one of the four core issues that GEO is fighting for, along with the rollback of fees, health care and child care. GEO's membership is particularly invested in and cares about issues surrounding diversity.

We are asking for transparency and accountability in the ways in which the diversity funds – which are established in our contract – are actually used. These are public funds and, as such, would seem to highly benefit from a democratic process.

If the University is interested in fair labor conditions and supporting graduate students in important teaching and research – not to mention democracy – they will remove their "take-back" proposals and begin to fairly negotiate. GEO will keep fighting until they do.

TEXTBOOK BLUES

DEAR EDITOR:

I have heard complaints about the goal of making textbooks more affordable, the biggest one being that it interferes with a free market, and that competition between publishers will eventually bring book prices down.

Normally I would agree that competition forces prices down, but the practices that the publishers use when it comes to pricing their books removes competition from the equation. The most common facts that publishing companies use is the non-disclosure of the price that they sell their books at when sending a teacher a list of potential reading.

The teacher then, unaware of the publisher's price makes a selection for their class. Many teachers if given the opportunity to buy a cheaper book for the class would, but since they have no real options as far as pricing goes they are forced to play a game of roulette with their student's money.

This means that there is no competition for publishers, because they control who sees the prices of their books. Without any sort of intervention the ludicrously expensive books are likely to remain priced that way.

It's time to drop the puck, couch potatoes

EA's NHL 08 delivers realistic hockey physics

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Who knew that playing a video game could be a lesson in physics? EA Sports' NHL 08 on Xbox 360 provides the best simulation of hockey of any game on the market – if that's what you're looking for, of course.

In this version you actually feel like you are skating on ice. No more quick turnarounds, abrupt stops or blazing turbo speed. You have to skillfully glide across the ice just as you would on the rink.

Although NHL 08 feels like a true hockey simulation, I find myself yearning for the arcade style of the games from the previous generation consoles. The older versions allowed the user to indiscriminately check opponents on and off the puck, thereby allowing you to maintain a nearly constant possession of the puck.

In NHL 08, you have to master the subtleties of hockey.

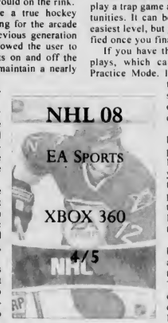
No longer can you shoot by pressing a button – you must use the right stick to fling the puck toward the net. This control is appropriately named the Skill Stick, since you'll need to spend ample time practicing this new technique.

Also, plan on mastering the art of the poke check or expect to spend most of your time on defense. Since the game's realistic skating physics makes it very hard to knock opponents off the puck, you must be craftier on defense.

However, these improvements lead to one of the game's biggest problems. Its creators failed to redesign the game's passing system, making it a challenge to steal the puck from an opponent. Therefore, possession becomes less of a tenuous concept and more defined.

You'll find that the majority of the game play involves the teams exchanging offensive rushes down the ice. Neutral zone play – an important part of the real life hockey – becomes neglected.

Of course, the game's graphics are outstanding, just like most other releases on the platform. Just be sure you have a reasonably large and relatively new television or the score and game clock will be nearly impossible to read. But then again, playing a scoreless hockey game without having any idea how much time is left makes for an interesting experience.



Just in case you tire of controlling a skater, you can try your luck playing as a goalie. The controls are hard to use effectively and it's easy to get caught out of position during a shootout after a few well-executed dekes by your opponent. Assume the command of your goaltender in-game at your own risk.

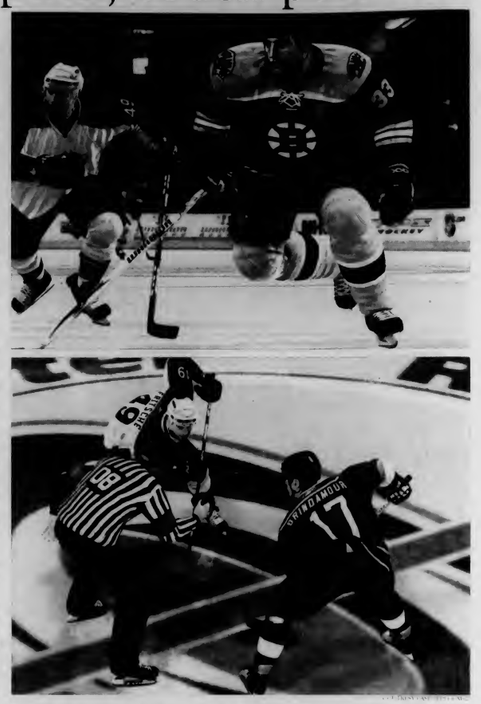
The goaltending feature is actually highly underrated since it allows you to experience how Tim Thomas feels after ceding three first-period goals for the Bruins.

The game's artificial intelligence seems pretty good and it also lets you control multiple players at once. If you hit a complicated combination of buttons correctly, your computer-controlled teammates will try to deflect the puck on your shot. But it's difficult to successfully pull off that maneuver while skating through traffic. However, I can't seem to get a forward to screen the goalie while I shoot the puck.

I'm not a button masher myself, as I prefer to play a trap game and create second-chance opportunities. It can be difficult to score even on the easiest level, but you come away even more satisfied once you finally slap home a rebound goal.

If you have the time, you can design custom plays, which can be refined to perfection in Practice Mode. It's a good thing they included this feature, as it's difficult to score on the power play and other offensive sets unless you execute a play.

Just as the shoot-out has become an important part of professional hockey since the NHL's rebirth, the game gives you plenty of chance to practice this part of the sport. Creating players with varying styles and testing them out in the Shootout Mode is one of the more entertaining aspects of the game.



Taking a page from its baseball cousin, NHL 08 includes all 29 American Hockey League teams (the NHL's minor league). This allows you the ability to develop players and play an entire season as an AHL team. Now diehard hockey fans can finally take those Springfield Falcons all the way to the Calder Cup.

Or if those options are simply not enough, you can create you own squad. This feature allows you to completely customize the details of your team, all the way down to the color trim on its jerseys.

The game's commentary is also improved over its previous versions. No longer will you be subjected to Bill Clement exclaiming the same hackneyed phrases every time you blow a scoring chance – though the Gary Throne and Clement duo are back for another season.

NHL 08 is a great hockey simulation. Just be warned: if you're looking for a hockey video game that plays more like Fight Night Round 3 than a real NHL game, look for something else.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

The newest version of EA Sports' NHL series is more of a real-life hockey simulator then a classic hockey video game. Players now glide on the ice, must master the 'skill stick' and can even play between the pipes.

So ridiculous, you just have to laugh

Comedian Nick Swardson releases new CD/DVD combo

BY ALLIE ROTH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Nick Swardson, a comedian from Minnesota, is often bunched in with comics like Dane Cook, Carlos Mencia and Jamie Kennedy. Many know him as one of his movie characters, like Jeff, the racecar bed-owning guy who still lives with his parents, or "roommates," in 2006's "Grandma's Boy." Others may know him as Terry, the gay prostitute on roller-skates from Comedy Central's "Reno 911!"

Swardson has been doing stand-up since the age of 19. He is the youngest comedian to have two "Comedy Central Presents" half-hour specials, first in 2000 and again in 2006. He has appeared in films such as "The Benchwarmers," "Blades of Glory," "Malibu's Most Wanted" and, most recently, "I Now Pronounce You Chuck and Larry."

Much of the humor in Swardson's jokes lies in the fact that they omit a "that's so true" response. Although not completely intellectual, Swardson's humor is well-rooted in many of those moments where sometimes one must laugh just out of the pure ridiculousness of the situation. Blacking out, telling bad stories, being generally awkward in life and reacting to the actions of others are just a few of the topics he normally explores.

Last Tuesday Swardson released his first CD/DVD called "Party" (Comedy Central Records). On the album, he employs the comedic talents of Saturday Night Live's Fred Armisen, Andy Samberg and former SNL star David Spade. The DVD features Swardson's two Comedy Central half-hour specials. Overall, the package is an enjoyable piece of typical college-aged party-time and "let's get drunk" humor.

The CD opens with "Blackout Morning," a sketch about the confusion that occurs after a night of crazy partying. He wakes up to find a slew of phone messages from friends describing the events of the previous night which included stealing a gun, making plans to go to Africa and build a boat, becoming a heroin mule and causing a general ruckus.

"Party" is an example of a "that's so true" moment. He talks about how he loves blacking out because it's like fulfilling a childhood dream of becoming a detective.

"So when you drink too much and you black out, you have a lot of mysteries to solve," he says. "Where are my pants? Somebody stole them! A clue! Somebody vomited! Who did that?"

In "Smoking Pot," he describes his stoner roommates who could "turn anything into a pipe," including their VCR. He tells of how he quit pot recently and thought he was psychic because he could actually remember where he put things.

"Movie Previews" is a reaction to the fact that there are so many previews before the actual feature presentation. "They show so many previews that I like forget what movie I'm there to see," he says.

Nick Swardson, seen here as Jeff in 'Grandma's Boy,' brings college humor and a unique style of stand-up to his new comedy disc.

Although Swardson is a talented stand-up comedian, he admits he is not a good storyteller in his every day life. On the track "You Had to Be There," he describes his propensity towards embellishment to save bad stories. "I embellish it way too much so it's not believable at all," he says.

To save a story about a stranger asking Steve, a drinking buddy of Swardson, where the bathroom is, Swardson ends the story with, "So then Steve fin' stabbed him." The crowd erupts in laughter.

Other sketches include "Dying," about how Swardson would want to commit suicide in a public place right after yelling something weird just to mess with people, "British Kid," about how British accents make even gross things sound adorable, and "1580s," about a CD purchase gone incredibly wrong.

The album ends with probably one of the most "eww" sketches on the cd: a sketch called "Cary and Mindy" about farting in an elevator. Featuring David Spade, the characters seem to stem from Spade and Adam Sandler's skit "Gap Girl" if they went to college and were stuck in an stank elevator without a way out. Their voices are nasal to the point that the fast forward button must be pressed immediately.

Even though Swardson is 30 years old, his humor reflects the mentality of a college kid who likes to party, play video games and party some more. He is the kind of guy you'd want to hang out with.

His comedy, including that found on "Party," is not really a think piece at all. But instead, it is an enjoyable group of jokes about things most people, especially college students, can relate to on some level. And maybe everyone needs a little laughter from jokes about blacking out sometimes.

Butter or margarine: the greasy debate

Lily Knowlton

You're at the great divide. On one side, the fancy, bright-labeled margarines catch your eye. On the other, old-fashioned butter calls out. I see it all the time – people standing in the grocery store staring at all the choices. They are all thinking the same thing: "Butter isn't good for you, right? Margarine must be better."

You find yourself reading every label, scanning for health claims that might help you. Finally, you reach a verdict. You take the cholesterol-free, saturated fat-free margarine thinking that you'll sacrifice just a bit on taste to give your heart a break. But what if you knew that your heart-healthy spread wasn't healthy after all?

For years, doctors and scientists have warned about the dangers of saturated fats and cholesterol in butter. They developed margarine as the perfect replacement. It looked the same, tasted almost the same and contained none of the cholesterol and saturated fat.

According to the USDA, consumption of margarine in the United States increased dramatically in the 1940s, while butter consumption plummeted. At the same time, rates of heart disease have skyrocketed. Many studies, including a 21-year study from the Journal of Epidemiology, have found that margarine consumption is strongly

The health debate between butter and margarine is one that has been waged for many years, but new research is finally declaring a winner.

Vampire feeding frenzy in rural Alaska

'30 Days of Night' provides blood, gore and little substance

BY SHAYNA MURPHY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Based on the graphic novel by Steve Niles, "30 Days of Night" presents an interesting premise. Barrow, Alaska, the northernmost town in the United States, descends into total darkness for one month each winter. Hundreds of miles inland and surrounded by snow, the land would appear inhospitable to most. But for a pack of vampires, Barrow is the perfect hunting ground and the townspeople are the perfect prey.

Fans of the source material will be pleased to discover that the basic format of the novel is preserved in the film adaptation. Leading the townspeople in their fight for survival is local sheriff Eben Oleson (Josh Hartnett), who begins to suspect something is amiss before night descends upon the town. The discovery of the maimed carcasses of the town's sled dogs makes for one rough day. The reappearance of his estranged wife, Stella (Melissa George), makes it even more so.

30 DAYS OF NIGHT

STARING
JOSH HARTNETT, DANNY HUSTON AND BEN FOSTER

The cast is rounded out by a few forgettable folk who will presumably make great lunchables for the vamps as the plot thickens, or in this case, coagulates. Ben Foster appears briefly, in the form of a shady drifter, to foretell of the town's doom. His presence on screen as a makeshift Renfield demanding raw meat at the local diner is amusing and effectively creepy.

Suspense is given a short shift to unfold. However, the first half hour of the film does so ominously. As the sun sets on the final day of light, anticipation of the carnage to come mounts. Indeed, the carnage that manifests is plentiful. The townspeople don't even know what bit them.

The vampires here are stronger, faster and meaner than what has been portrayed on screen as of late. There is something feral about the manner in which they stalk the townspeople. Acting as pack animals led by alpha dog Marlow (Danny Huston), they lie in wait under houses and amid rooftops. Speaking in a foreign tongue, with teeth sharpened and nails overgrown, they strike a grotesque image.

The problem is the movie reveals itself too quickly. The film, which begins with promise, falls apart as night continues to fall upon the town. The vamps cease to be ambiguous creatures of nightmare and become familiar fixtures on the screen, in a sense, depriving them of their monstrousness. Their feeding frenzy is too frenzied – they decimate the bulk of Barrow's population within a few short hours. Afterwards, there's not much left for them to do except pace the streets of Barrow aimlessly – presumably in pursuit of some snow boots.

Violence, although graphic, is one-note. Blood is splattered on walls and across the snow for eerie effect. But there are only so many times one can see someone getting their throat ripped out before it starts to get a little tedious. In turn, the vampires lose their cool factor as soon as their boss begins to turn every murder scene into a soliloquy about death and survival. Even with subtitles, it's painful.

As the vampires cool their heels outside, the human survivors of the attack huddle together in an attic, attempting to wait out the month. Ideally, director David Slade ("Hard Candy") could use this opportunity to explore themes of claustrophobia and tension. But the psychological aspect of being confined to a small space is barely examined. Instead, Eben and company opt to pine for better locations.

The passage of time moves questionably as casualties start to accumulate. Running outside whenever the mood strikes, and heading to the general store to stock up on supplies, it becomes unclear how these characters ever managed to escape in the first place.

Frankly, the survivors suck at surviving. They seem to survive not because of ingenuity or strength, but because the storyline allows them to fall through the cracks of coincidence.

They run into the street when the street is full of vamps? That's okay. All the vampires are on the other side of the street. They get into fights, slap each other around in their hiding place? Don't fret; the vampires are all on sabbatical for the evening.

That type of luck requires the audience to suspend disbelief in order to advance storyline. While not unforgivable, the film relies too heavily on twists of fate to secure the survival of its protagonists. The climatic showdown between Eben and the vampires might have some craving a little more blood and guts. However, the twist that precedes it injects energy into an increasingly lethargic storyline.

"30 Days of Night" is another undead entry to a genre that's been losing lifeblood ever since the Golden Age of cinema.

Mmmm, mmmmmm butter

linked to heart disease, while butter consumption is not. Although trans fats are not the sole cause of heart disease, there is an undeniable link between the two.

Some of these margarines are not healthier than butter – in fact, many are much worse for your health. Why? Many margarines contain trans fats. Trans fats are chemically altered by making liquid oils into a solid through the process of hydrogenation. Ingredient labels list them as "partially hydrogenated oils." They are mostly found in packaged foods like cakes, cookies, crackers, candy, bread, peanut butter and, of course, margarine.

Making margarine is a messy, chemical-laden process. Once the oil is hydrogenated, it comes out as a lumpy, grey and smelly semi-solid. Then it must be bleached, deodorized and artificially flavored and colored.

According to recent studies the hydrogenated oils or trans fat in margarine is more dangerous to health then the saturated fat in butter.

After all of this, many margarines still claim to be all-natural.

In contrast, making butter is very simple. Butter has been made ever since animals were milked. You can even make it in your own kitchen by shaking heavy cream in a jar. Unless your kitchen is a science lab, you would never be able to make margarine.

Although butter contains saturated fat and cholesterol, it is also an excellent source of the fat-soluble vitamins A, D, E and K.

The saturated fat and cholesterol in butter are said to raise the risk of getting heart disease. Current research has found that many past studies did not differentiate between hydrogenated and saturated fats. Thus, many of the heart-unhealthy findings about saturated fats were mixed with the effects of trans fats.

Finally, the FDA said that when taken separately, trans fats are linked much more closely to heart disease than saturated fats.

Trans fats raise the "bad" cholesterol significantly more than saturated fats and also lower the "good" cholesterol. On the other hand, saturated fats counterbalance the rise in bad cholesterol by also raising the "good" cholesterol.

The New England Journal of Medicine has found that the negative effect of trans fats on cholesterol levels are likely double that of saturated fats.

A recent study in the European Journal of Nutrition found that replacing all the saturated fats in your diet with trans fats significantly increases the risk of developing heart disease. According to the Lancet, eating just four teaspoons of margarine a day makes you 66 percent more likely to suffer from heart disease.

No matter what spread you choose, watch the total fat in your diet. Saturated fat should be kept low and trans fats should be virtually eliminated. In choosing between margarine and butter, keep in mind that no amount of trans fat is healthy while a small amount of saturated fat is healthy.

Some margarines advertise being "trans fat-free" or having "zero grams trans fat," but an FDA loophole in labeling allows products to state this even if there are up to 0.5 grams of trans fat per serving. This means if you had four servings of a trans-free product, you could potentially be eating two grams of trans fats.

To be completely sure that a product is trans fat-free, you must read the nutrition label and avoid "partially hydrogenated oil" in the ingredients. Ironically, when margarine is free of trans fats, it must contain saturated fats to keep it solid.

Margarine does not naturally taste like butter; it relies on synthetic chemicals for flavor. The effect of these chemicals on our bodies is still unknown.

Keep in mind that margarine is a highly processed food, while butter can be made at home. It seems that somewhere in this mess, common sense was greased over. Nutritionists always say that whole, unprocessed foods are better for us, but butter is the most unfortunate exception to the rule.

Robinson provides big plays on special teams and defense

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

At the beginning of the 2007 season, cornerback Courtney Robinson did not start on defense for the Massachusetts football team. And yet he still found a way to make a big play, returning a kickoff 100 yards for a touchdown in the season-opener against Holy Cross.

Seven weeks into the regular season, Robinson has taken over the starting cornerback role opposite Sean Smalls, and his big play tendencies have not left him.

The 6-foot, 195-pound junior worked his way up the depth chart this year and his development is evident in the results he's produced.

Robinson has 20 tackles on the season, including two for a loss, two pass deflections and a forced fumble.

He is also tied with three other players in the Colonial Athletic Association with a league-high three interceptions, including his latest against Northeastern Saturday, in a 24-7 victory.

"I thought he played his best game on Saturday," UMass coach Don Brown said. "He had the big interception. He was all over the field, hustling, making plays in the running game. I just think he's getting better every week. You've got to be happy with the way he's playing."

On the second play of the fourth quarter, Huskies backup quarterback John Sperrazza sold a play action fake on fourth-and-one from the UMass 34-yard line, and everyone but Robinson seemed to bite on it.

Sperrazza released a deep ball towards the UMass end zone, but overthrew his intended receiver. Robinson was in perfect position to make a play. As the ball sailed over everyone, Robinson stayed with it and made great catch over his shoulder with his back to the quarterback.

Junior defensive back Courtney Robinson is tied for the Colonial Athletic Association lead in interceptions with three. He is tied with Derek Cox of William & Mary – the Minutemen's opponent this weekend.

Robinson caught the pass at the seven-yard line running back, turned, made a few people miss and worked his way to the 26, giving the Minutemen much better field position. The catch itself resembled a center fielder going back for a deep drive.

"Well, baseball is my favorite sport, so I guess that would play a role," Robinson said. "I pretty much just saw the ball in the air, and knew I had to make a play on it."

The Delray Beach, Fla., native had two picks in back-to-back games earlier in the year against Colgate and Towson, but had not gotten one since.

"I told coach [Brown] before the game that it had been a while since my last interception, so I just saw a chance to make a play and I went to make a play on the ball."

Brown felt the play was crucial to putting the game away and getting the win over the Huskies.

"What a major play. I'll tell you – that is not an easy play," Brown said of the pick. "[Sperrazza] was going for the gusto. It was fourth-and-short, he sold the play action to Maurice Murray and tried to sneak the receiver out. And Courtney just stayed on his key, and that's all you can really ask."

Brown has called similar plays for the UMass offense, and for the most part, quarterback Liam Coen has found the receiver wide open. Courtney must have seen the play too many times in practice because on Saturday, he wasn't fooled.

"A lot of guys would get lost [on that play], but a credit to Courtney," Brown said. "Not only does he stay over the top, he goes and gets the ball."

Brandon Freeman started the year as the team's second starting cornerback, but since the game at Boston College, Robinson has been the man on the right side of the field.

"I think [Robinson] has gotten better and better and better, and now that he's playing full-time, he's certainly a lot more comfortable with what he has to do," Brown said. "I think if you put him and Sean Smalls together, that's a pretty good tandem."

UM ground attack faces conference's worst run defense interceptions) leads an offense with a number of talented pass catchers.

"Obviously he's talented. He can throw the vertical pass down the field and he has the mobility to escape the rush and make plays," Brown said. "He's got great results from his receivers when he's done that and he certainly presents some problems."

The redshirt junior quarterback appeared in seven games last season, but did not appear in the Oct. 7 matchup last year against the Minutemen. He played well at times in 2006 (5 TDs, 3 INT and 49.6 percent passing), but has broke out this season for the Tribe.

Much like Brown's compliments of Phillips, Laycock has a similar respect for the UMass signal-caller.

"Their scheme is very solid and with Coen in there he runs the show very, very well," Laycock said during the same conference call. "He knows how to move the ball around to the open receivers, he gets good protection and they have such a good running game too."

Stopping the opposing run game has been a major issue for Laycock and William & Mary this season. In the past two games for the Tribe, they've allowed 482 yards rushing – 249 against Maine in the victory and 233 in a 63-24 loss to Villanova. Black Bears tailback Jhamal Fluellen exploded for 208 rushing yards on 31 carries, three weeks after gaining 50 yards on 12 rushes against UMass.

In four games against conference opponents, the Tribe have allowed 977 yards rushing (244.25 per game) but escaped with two wins. In addition to defeating Maine, they edged Towson, 27-22, despite allowing the Tigers to run for 214 yards. Delaware gained 281 yards rushing in the season-opening victory, 49-31, over the Tribe.

The Minutemen dominated on the ground in last year's meeting, rushing for five touchdowns and 278 yards in the 48-7 victory at McGuirk Stadium. Backup tailback Tony Nelson ran for a career-high three scores. UMass racked up 596 yards of total offense, its most since 1999. It was the worst margin of defeat for the Tribe in a conference game since they joined the conference (then the Atlantic 10) in 1993. Strangely enough, William & Mary led in time of possession in that game by nearly six minutes.

The UMass defense leads the CAA in scoring defense (17.4 points per game) and in pass defense efficiency (105.3). It will be challenged by the talented aerial attack of the Tribe – which has a triumvirate of play-making wideouts R.J. Archer, Elliott Mack and Cameron Dohse have combined for 70 receptions, 1,168 yards and nine touchdowns. Tight end Drew Atchison has chipped in for 363 yards and three scores.

The UMass offense has been consistently solid this season, particularly starting running back Matt Lawrence. The redshirt senior has 797 rushing yards and eight touchdowns, and has rushed for over 100 yards in five games this season.

Lawrence ranks fourth in the CAA in rushing yards and 15th nationally.

Nelson has added 309 yards rushing in 2007, but has yet to find the end zone. He has averaged 5.5 yards per carry, while Lawrence has gained an average of 5.2.

With the struggles of the William & Mary rush defense, UMass figures to make a concerted effort to run the ball with both Nelson and Lawrence.

The two running backs also figure to take the pressure off of Coen, who is still hampered with a left knee injury.

Game notes

Saturday's matchup is homecoming for William & Mary. The Tribe are 7-1 in their last eight homecoming games. ... The Minutemen lead the all-time series between the schools, 6-4. ... UMass leads the conference in sacks with 22, while the Tribe rank last with eight. ... The Minutemen have committed the most penalties in the conference (78 for 663 yards). William & Mary has committed the fewest (34 for 281 yards). The Tribe rank last in the conference in net punting average at 28.5. ... They have been outscored this season 82-31 in the first quarter.

...everyone on the roster some playing time. Freshmen Doug Kublin and Mason Saunders played their first collegiate games Saturday against Conn.

Saunders scored the game-winning goal. He's the second UMass player this season to score his first collegiate goal in his first game and have it be a game-winner for the Minutemen. Brian Keane did the same thing against St. Lawrence on Oct. 13.

One position that should see plenty of shuffling is goaltender, where three players will be competing for playing time throughout the season. Incumbent Dan Meyers missed both games last weekend with a groin injury, and freshman Paul Dainton picked up a win and a tie, allowing five goals, earning Hockey East Rookie of the Week.

Meyers returned to practice Wednesday, which is a good sign for the Minutemen, who do not want to be wearing thin at the position this early in the season.

"He was virtually ready [Tuesday], but we just wanted to give him one more day to get set and he ready to compete. I'll see how he responds over the next couple of days to determine how we're going to use him this weekend."

Fellow freshman Matt Gedman just recently joined the team after spending the fall working with the baseball team. After a few more weeks of practice he will also be in the mix between the pipes.

"Gedman has a little ways to go, as he's only a week into practice," Cahoon said. "Right now, the way things are going, just to throw him into the situation with two league games – unless we absolutely needed him – would probably not be our choice."

Ortiz catalyst for Mass Attack

Sophomore winger provides energy on both ends for UM

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It doesn't take much to change the complexion of a Hockey East game. Teams know each other so well that nothing is really unexpected. But that certainly doesn't mean games are at all predictable.

All it takes is one play – a bad pass leading to an odd-man rush or a big hit – to energize a team and kick momentum in its direction.

On a day-to-day basis, any player can step up and make the play. But by season's end, it's typically quite clear who a team can expect these types of plays from on a consistent basis.

Will Ortiz is one of those players.

"He's a really energized kid. He loves to have fun out there and loves to be out there," junior Cory Quirk said of Ortiz. "He really loves to play the game."

Quirk and the rest of the Massachusetts hockey team saw all of this from the fiery winger as soon as Ortiz' career began. He recorded a point in six of his first seven games last season, scoring one goal and assisting on five others.

Not only did he make plays offensively, but the overall energy he brought to the ice whenever he leaped over the boards put him in the middle of the action during every shift. Despite his size, 5-foot-9, Ortiz rarely backs down from an opponent, no matter how large. Even Maine's 6-foot-7 Simon Denis-Pepin didn't make Ortiz think twice before throwing his body around when the pair got tangled up in one of UMass's four wins over Maine in early March of last season.

UMass coach Don Cahoon moved Ortiz around a lot last year, but usually paired him with at least one upperclassman. As a freshman, Ortiz' aggressiveness got the better of him occasionally, and playing with an experienced player helped him understand his role more clearly.

"I learned a lot about the college game quickly [from playing with upperclassmen]. Everything comes faster and everything you do has to be quicker," Ortiz said. "I matured a lot as a person and I matured even more as a player to this college game."

Ortiz began this season on a line with freshman Michael Leonte and senior Matt Burto against Clarkson. But since, Cahoon has him with Quirk and senior forward P.J. Fenton. Quirk is UMass's most talented offensive center and inserting him between two wingers with the skill sets of Ortiz and Fenton makes this one of Hockey East's most talented lines. Ortiz actually scored the first goal of his career while playing with this same line against Maine last October.

Cahoon doesn't use Ortiz on the penalty kill and only occasionally on the power play, so putting him with Quirk and Fenton was a way to get a dynamic player more ice time.

"I was trying to figure out a way to get him a couple more minutes because he brings that offensive dimension," Cahoon said. "I thought one of the easiest ways to do that, and because I think he would be a compliment, was to put him with Fenton and Quirk."

"Will's best assets are his skating and his shooting, he probably has the best shot on the team," Quirk said. "That helps with my passing ability. I can find Willy when he's open, so he can let that bomb go as he did against UConn."

That goal against UConn highlighted the skills make Ortiz so valuable. Not only can he identify chances when they come to him, but he can create and take advantage of them as well.

The goal started as nothing more than a promising rush as Quirk and Fenton trailed the play. But the move Ortiz used to beat the defender and the shot that found its way into the net showed the skills exclusive to Ortiz.

Ortiz' aggressiveness can also cause problems for the Minutemen, however. In the overtime of the 2-2 tie against UMass-Lowell on Friday, Ortiz executed what looked like a textbook hip check on a UML player. The referee felt that Ortiz hit the player low and sent him off on a tripping call, putting the Minutemen a man down in overtime.

"The kid he hit was about 6-foot-3 and Will is about 5-foot-9," Cahoon said. "[The referee] made the call, so that was how he saw it. I saw it differently, but it's not my judgment."

Ortiz could change his approach to the game and use the aggressiveness that makes him prolific player he is more vigilantly. But considering where it's taken him in such a short amount of time, Cahoon and the rest of the Minutemen don't want him to change a thing.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni a student.umass.edu.

Providing a unique combination of grit and explosiveness, sophomore winger Will Ortiz gives the Minutemen strong play alongside junior pivot Cory Quirk and senior P.J. Fenton.

Injuries continue for UMass

Luckey to make second career start in place of ailing Walker

BY STEVE GAMES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's soccer team is struggling to keep bodies on the practice field. UMass coach Jim Rudy gave the team a day off on Monday after a wild weekend. The Minutewomen defeated Fordham on Friday in a rainy thriller, 1-0, and lost on Sunday to La Salle, 2-1.

The team was back at it on Tuesday and Rudy said they finished the workout session playing six against six. If they were at full health the team could scrimmage with 11 players on each side. Seven players have missed at least one game due to injury and six of those players were starters.

"We had some nice spectators watching," Rudy joked. "Everyone is upbeat, we're going to play. We're just trusting that we won't get anymore injuries."

The Minutewomen (8-4-2, 3-1 Atlantic 10) will travel to Charlotte for a Friday night game and then they are at St. Louis on Sunday. Charlotte (12-3-1, 7-0-1 A-10) is currently in first place in the A-10 w/ St. Louis (8-4-2, 5-1-2 A-10) holding a tie with Dayton for third place. UMass is tied with La Salle for ninth place.

INJURY UPDATES

The Minutewomen suffered two significant injuries over the weekend. Sophomore Offensive Adams suffered a high ankle sprain early in the first half against La Salle. Adams, who scored the game-winning goal Friday against Fordham, will be out for this weekend according to Rudy.

There is some good news for redshirt senior goalkeeper Kristin Wallace after she injured her knee against Fordham. The initial diagnosis was that she had another ACL knee injury and would need surgery. She did however injure her medial collateral ligament, and according to Rudy, she will be out for the rest of the season unless the team makes a push for the NCAA tournament. Senior forward Christina Nunes injured her MCL and came back in less than a month this season.

"The MCL is badly damaged, but the ACL – the important one that holds it all together – that one is in tact," Rudy said. "There is no major cartilage damage in there, so those are good things."

Rudy said that sophomore midfielder Meghan Gould is not ready for action. She has been sidelined after suffering a concussion against Rhode Island two weeks ago.

Junior forward Vanessa Patry will be ready to go for this weekend; she took a hit to the back of her head against Fordham.

HELP WANTED

With all these injuries the coaching staff will be packing extra uniforms for the trip this weekend. If more players go down then Rudy will have to use backup goalkeeper Melissa Jubinville on the field. Jubinville has no collegiate playing experience. One of the uniforms they will pack is an extra jersey if a player gets blood on her uniform and the other is for Jubinville.

"I hope to put a team on the field that can play two 90-minute games because the way it's going you reach a point and say, 'OK, can we, should we, could we play with 10,'" Rudy said. "Throw [Jubinville] on the field and she's not a field player."

Jubinville transferred to UMass after playing hockey at Northeastern and St. Anselm.

FIRST START

Sophomore Lauren Luckey made her first career start in net Sunday against LaSalle. Luckey faced 20 shots and made eight saves. As a freshman Luckey did not see any action as she played behind Walker.

This season Rudy played her late in the second half of the non-conference games. Luckey has 18 career saves and has allowed three goals in limited action.

Steve Games can be reached at sgames a student.umass.edu.

Junior Erin Parker and the Minutewomen took 11 shots in their loss to Dartmouth last night, but the team failed to score a goal.

Bourazeris' shot rattled off multiple sticks in front of the net and eventually went wide.

UMass was awarded another corner later in the half and Bourazeris got the chance to shoot the ball again but shot wide.

In the second half, UMass got an early chance to score. They ran one of their signature plays, the double-flip. The ball is inserted, then two players take a shot and the third actually shoots. Bourazeris got another chance and put it right on net, and Dartmouth goalkeeper Ashley Heist made a kick save and cleared the ball away.

On the Minutewomen's last attempt, they never got the chance to shoot because the ball was mishandled by the stopper, Murphy.

Also in the second half, UMass had its chances but fell short. There were two in less than a minute toward the end, but the Dartmouth defense held strong to keep the Minutewomen from tying the game.

Another thing that Sowry commented on was the team's play inside the opponent's circle. She said that she was disappointed because the team could not get rebounds, shots or goals for the amount of times players had possession inside the circle. She also felt that UMass should have been awarded more penalty corners than it actually got. But she remained optimistic and said that she will continue to work with the team for its upcoming match against Rhode Island on Saturday.

played with a sense of urgency in the late minutes of the second half.

"I want that desperation and persistence from the first minute – not when time's running out and we're trying to get a goal," Sowry said. "So it was good, but at the same time, I expect that intensity throughout the entire match."

The second half play was so intense that freshman midfielder Makaela Potts received a green card for the Minutewomen. But Sowry praised Potts' play. She thought that Potts was the best player on the field for the UMass and explained that the umpire thought that Potts was playing too physical and that she was intimidating Dartmouth's offensive players.

Potts drew the booking when she feigned an attempt to shoot the ball at a Dartmouth player. The umpire whistled the play dead and issued the card to Potts.

One of the Minutewomen's leading scorers this season, sophomore midfielder Cher King has seven goals and three assists.

Minutemen head south

Maroon and White look to maintain perfect CAA record

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Saturday's game between William & Mary and No. 4 Massachusetts is a matchup of two very different football teams.

After last year's 48-7 drubbing by the Minutemen, the Tribe are hoping for a very different score this time around in Williamsburg, Va.

UMass quarterback Liam Coen is listed as day-to-day with a sprained left knee, but is expected to be under center for the Minutemen (6-1, 4-0 Colonial Athletic Association) for the 1 p.m. kickoff at Zable Stadium. The knee has given him trouble for several weeks, after he initially tweaked it in the victory over Towson on Sept. 15.

"The reality is it is not going to go away," said UMass coach Don Brown during this week's CAA coaches conference call. "He rehabs it every day and I just know he will be back out on the practice field and be physical when Saturday comes."

Coen needs just one touchdown pass and 316 yards passing to become the school's all-time leader in both categories. Should Coen be unable to go Saturday, backup Scott Woodward – who has seen action in five games this season – would get the start. He is 13-of-24 for 143 yards in limited time in 2007.

The Tribe (4-3, 2-2 CAA) have alternated wins and losses for five consecutive games. They were off last weekend and defeated Maine, 21-20, the week before on Oct. 13. William & Mary overcame 249 rushing yards from the Black Bears to escape with the victory, mainly due to not turning the ball over and an 8-of-17 performance on third downs.

William & Mary coach Jimmy Laycock – in his 28th season – leads a Tribe team that is particularly one-dimensional on both sides of the ball. On defense, they rank first in passing defense in the CAA (allowing 169.4 yards per game) but last in the 12-team conference in rushing defense (220.1 yards). Current Tribe defensive coordinator Bob Shoop worked under Brown last season as the defensive backs coach of the Minutemen.

Offensively, the Tribe leads the CAA with 304.4 passing yards per game and are second-to-last in rushing yards per game at 120.7. Quarterback Jake Phillips (125-of-214, 1,978 yards, 14 TD and four

One of the leaders of a consistent UMass offense, redshirt senior Matt Lawrence has 797 rushing yards and eight touchdowns this season. Lawrence and the Minutemen take on the CAA's worst run defense this weekend, as the team travels to Virginia to face William & Mary.

Junior centerman Cory Quirk and the Minutemen take on Providence in a home-and-home series this weekend. Quirk is second on the team with one goal and two assists in four games this season.

Hockey East action is in full swing this weekend when the Massachusetts hockey team plays a home-and-home series with Providence. The Minutemen visit the Friars Friday night then return home for Round Two at the Mullins Center Saturday.

UMass (2-1-1, 1-0 HEA), is coming off its first home stand of the season. It went 1-0-1, tying UMass Lowell, 2-2, before downing Connecticut, 4-3, in a Saturday matinee.

Providence (0-4, 0-1 HEA) has struggled out of the gate, but that has only made UMass coach Don Cahoon more wary of his conference rival.

"I'm scared silly about Providence, just because they're 0-4," Cahoon said Tuesday. "I think they will prove themselves to be a much better team than that."

The Friars finished last season in eighth place in Hockey East, just qualifying for the playoffs. They were 10-23-3 overall, 9-15-3 in conference and struggled mightily against the Minutemen, going 0-2-1.

UMass swept an early-season home-and-home series, and then tied the Friars in the Mullins Center on Feb. 10. However, Cahoon feels this only makes Providence a hungrier team in desperate need of a victory.

"They got off to a tough start in the North Country [against St. Lawrence and Clarkson]," Cahoon said. "They lost an overtime game against Northeastern, and then probably tripped themselves on Saturday as a result of those three losses against Holy Cross."

Four tough losses later, there is an angry Friars team down in Providence, waiting quietly for last year's surprise team in Hockey East.

"Here they are 0-4 with a week to prepare for a Friday night game in our own building," Cahoon said. "So we're challenged with a difficult task of playing well ourselves, taking them a little bit off their game and finding a way to get this done."

Cahoon has shuffled the lineups so far this season, getting almost

UMass falls short against Big Green

Dartmouth spoils final game for seniors at Garber Field

BY JUSTIN MCGRAIL

The Massachusetts field hockey team lost to the Dartmouth Big Green, 1-0, in the Minutewomen's final home game of the season last night.

The lone goal came late in the first half. Dartmouth forward Leigh Rorick worked the ball into the circle and passed over to Lizzie Bildner, who hit a bouncing ball towards Becky Letourneau. Letourneau geared up to kick the ball out of the circle, but it took an odd bounce. It went right under her foot and found the back of the cage to give the Big Green the lead.

Dartmouth (5-9) pressured Letourneau for the entire first half. The team had four penalty corners and five shots on goal; Letourneau saved four of them.

UMass coach Justine Sowry talked about the state of the team heading into the team's next match against the Rhode Island Saturday.

"We were complacent tonight, but this will just make us take a hard, long look at our performance, and I think it will motivate us to try and be the best that we can be," Sowry said after the game.

Dartmouth	1

The second half was completely different from the first. Sowry switched goaltenders, going with sophomore Sarah Williams in the second half. Sowry said that the move was decided before the game and that it had nothing to do with the goal that Letourneau allowed.

UMass (10-8, 5-1 Atlantic 10) turned up the intensity and controlled the tempo. The Minutewomen led Dartmouth in shots with five and in penalty corners with two.

But UMass did not make most of those shots late in the game.

There were many chances for the Minutewomen to find the back of the cage. Sophomore midfielder Cher King found senior forward Rachael Merrine in the circle, who rifled a shot at Dartmouth goalkeeper Ashley Heist. Heist got a pad on the ball and cleared it away. Katie Kelly attempted to strike the ball, but her shot was also saved by Heist.

Senior midfielder Kara Murphy looked to be in the right position to score off Kelly's rebound, but put the shot wide to the right of the net. Junior midfielder Erin Parker tried to tie the game for UMass. She dribbled her way through the Big Green defense, but lost a handle on the ball and it went out of bounds.

UMass thought it scored when Kelly passed the ball over to Parker who had her shot deflect high. The ball appeared to have gone in, but Heist got a piece of the ball with her blocker to preserve Dartmouth's lead.

Sowry noted that the team

Midfielder Kara Murphy played her final game at Garber Field last night along with six other seniors.

Sophomore midfielder Christine Rodgers and the Minutewomen fell to Dartmouth last night, 1-0. Her only goal this season was the game-winner against Saint Joseph's on Oct. 14.

Sowry and Co. struggle with penalty corners against zone

Coming off a huge win against Richmond, the Massachusetts field hockey team had a hard time finding its rhythm against the Dartmouth Big Green last night.

Richmond is an Atlantic-10 powerhouse that has beaten UMass five years straight. The win was important to UMass because it snapped the losing streak against Richmond on Senior Day. UMass coach Justine Sowry said the win was program-changing.

With all of those emotions still fresh in their minds, the Minutewomen took the field against Dartmouth on Wednesday night and struggled in the first half. Dartmouth possessed the ball for most of the half and spent a lot of time on the UMass half of the field.

Sowry commented that the Maroon and White moved the ball really well through Dartmouth's defense. It found the open space up-field and outletted the ball to the midfielders well.

Dartmouth played a zone defense and one of the reasons that UMass moved the ball so well was because it saw the seams between the defenders and got the ball to the forwards and midfielders.

Despite the great movement, UMass had difficulty getting the ball into the circle or close to the net. The backs for Dartmouth would either intercept the ball or UMass would commit a foul and turn the ball over.

One aspect of the game that Sowry stresses is the execution of penalty corners. In recent games freshman Jamie Bourazeris has been the go to shooter for the Minutewomen. She can crush the ball off the stop and has three goals in her first year in Amherst.

UMass won five corners in the game and came up empty on all five of them. Their first corner came mid-way through the first half. Erin Parker inserted to Kara Murphy, who passed the ball to Bourazeris.

Bourazeris fired a shot that was whistled dead because it was too high. The same crew took the next corner three minutes later when

Explosive threat alarms campus

Beer box bomb a 'sophisticated hoax'

BY KATIE HUSTON AND DERRICK PERKINS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts State Police bomb squad determined that a suspected explosive device found in Herter Hall yesterday morning was not a threat.

"Everything is fine and safe on campus," University of Massachusetts spokesman Ed Blaguszewski said in a press conference shortly after 9 a.m. yesterday morning as the University lifted its campus security alert.

After the discovery was reported around 5:20 a.m., Herter Hall and the surrounding buildings were evacuated and about 100 custodians and other staff gathered in the Physical Plant.

Students, faculty and staff received an e-mail alert at 6:26 a.m. announcing that the University would delay opening, and classes were cancelled until 11 a.m. The W.E.B. DuBois Library was also evacuated just before 6 a.m. and remained closed until classes began.

A potential security threat like yesterday morning's has not happened in recent memory, Blaguszewski said at the press conference.

When a custodian turned on the lights in room 112 of Herter Hall shortly after he arrived at 5 a.m., he found an empty 30-pack box with a battery outside and wires running inside, said Glynn Ellis, the supervisor for buildings and grounds who was on duty in Herter yesterday morning.

"He just thought that it was trash – he was going to grab it until he saw the wire sticking out," Ellis said. "It had a note that said, 'If this is moved it will explode.' It looked a little too sophisticated to be a standard joke."

Ellis immediately ordered custodians to evacuate the building and called campus police. The UMass Police Department summoned the Amherst Fire Department, which called in the state police bomb squad.

The UMPD and local town authorities, including the Amherst Fire Department, set up a command post and established a security perimeter around Herter Hall until the arrival of the state police bomb squad, blocking off the area from Berkshire House to the Isenberg School of Management.

"They had cruisers everywhere and weren't letting anyone into this block," Ellis said.

Authorities assessed the situation and searched surrounding buildings before determining that the suspicious object was not an explosive device.

"Unofficially, I was told that it was a very sophisticated hoax," Ellis said. "There was a giant process that went into figuring that out, which is really the aggravating thing here, because it's not funny. It's damn scary."

Campus police also decided to evacuate UMass's 26-story library at about 5:50 a.m., to examine whether a message written on the whiteboard inside the main entrance could be connect-

University administrators used e-mail yesterday morning to inform students, staff and faculty of a bomb scare – but most students found out through other means of communication.

Sophomore Heather Duquette received a phone call from her mother, who had heard about a bomb threat on the news. Sophomore David DiLorenzo heard about the incident on WMUA. Senior David Satin received a text message from a friend.

Freshman Sam Dreyfus felt that other available forms of communication should have been used yesterday.

"At orientation, they told us we should have a phone in our room in case of an emergency," he said. "They should have called us if they thought this was a bomb threat."

Sophomore Caleb Koutman felt the e-mail was much too vague.

"I did not feel safe going to my class in Herter today," he said. "The e-mail should have been more detailed. It should have said the incident was a hoax."

Freshman Emily McKinley agreed.

"They [the administration] should have told the public more," she said.

On the way to his 8 a.m. class, freshman Sang Jo ran into another student, who told him what happened. Others were able to give accounts of friends who went to their morning classes, knowing nothing of the situation.

UMass educates Afghani teachers

BY CAITLIN QUINN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts aims to pave the way for Middle Eastern teachers to incorporate new strategies into their lessons.

The Center for International Education (CIE) at the University of Massachusetts in collaboration with Institute for Training and Development (ITD) of Amherst is hosting a study tour for top Afghan educators that will provide new approaches to teacher training. The hope is that the teachers will apply these new skills to the training of secondary school teachers in Afghanistan.

The study tour is part of the Afghanistan Higher Education Project at UMass. The project, funded by $7.8 million from the United States Agency for International Development, is working with 16 Afghan universities and teacher training institutes to develop "a vision, a plan and an implementation strategy to develop the capacity of their education faculties to do a better job in preparing secondary teachers," said CIE director David R. Evans.

The study tour is a step toward this goal.

"They couldn't set out a vision very well because they didn't have the concepts to do so. They were out of touch with modern academic life," said Evans.

The tour includes one educator from each of the 16 Afghan institutions and will "expose them to a wide range of modern educational practices."

The four-week tour ran from Sept. 29 to Oct. 27. During this time the educators participated in workshops that took place at institutions throughout the state, including UMass, Westfield State College and Fitchburg State College.

The workshops focused on the areas of curriculum design, teaching methodologies, administration systems, supervision and teacher mentoring.

Their goal was to provide the educators with the "software of modern institutions," according to Evans. This includes learning how to manage faculty, and organize departments within their institutions.

The educators are also visiting secondary schools throughout Massachusetts.

They will be observing classes to gain "exposure to modern classrooms," said Evans.

Afterward, they will engage in discussions with the U.S. teachers they observe to gain knowledge on "how educational institutions provide supervision and support to their teachers."

Upon their return to Afghanistan, the teachers will share their new information with colleagues at their respective institutions and apply it to improving the training of secondary school teachers.

The educators will be sharing their experiences with "over 500 faculty members working in education in those institutions," according to the CIE Web site.

The Afghanistan Higher Education Project is being implemented by a consortium led by the Academy for Educational Development that includes CIE at UMass and Indiana University as partners.

The group of visitors also includes officials from the Ministry of Higher Education in Kabul, since the goals of the Project include "developing the capacity of the Ministry of Higher Education and the Ministry of Education to provide leadership for education," according to the CIE Web site.

The grant for the project is for five years. The project started in April 2006, with a workshop at Kabul Education University (KEU), where the goals of the project and the various activities were discussed with the Rectors of the 16 Afghan institutions of higher education.

Summit to discuss education

PHENOM addresses cost –

BY HANNAH NELSON

The self-proclaimed "sleeping giant of Massachusetts politics" is working to make public, higher education more affordable and accessible to students across the state.

The Public Higher Education Network of Massachusetts (PHENOM) will hold its second Higher Education Summit today. Framingham State College is hosting the event from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m., with registration starting at 9:30 a.m.

"PHENOM is working with the legislature to make sure that trend is reversed," said President of the Massachusetts Society of Professors and UMass professor Max Page on Massachusetts's trend of low-level funding in comparison to neighboring New England states. "Gov. [Deval] Patrick has called himself a champion of public higher education and we are holding him accountable – we expect to see positive changes this year."

At today's summit, the affordability of education will once again have a top-billing with the release of the group's newest study, "The Affordability Crisis in Massachusetts Public Higher Education."

The study highlights the trend of the state's rising tuition and expenses matched with the decline of financial aid in the public colleges.

The Summit has other goals in mind as well.

"One of the themes of the Summit is affordability, but really is set around the five principles that were set earlier this year," said Jake Oliveira, student representative to the Board of Trustees at Framingham State College and chair of the Student Advisory Council to the Board of Higher Education. "Affordability is the key to successful higher education."

The five principles include funding public higher education so it can serve the Commonwealth, making higher education affordable, making higher education accessible to all, hiring more teachers, researchers and staff and honoring and expanding democratic institutions of governance for public higher education.

With these goals in mind, the event will host speakers such as

In 10 major cities across the country this Saturday, hundreds of thousands of war activists will march with one goal in mind: ending the war in Iraq.

"The vast majority of students here on campus are against the war," said University of Massachusetts Campus Anti-war Network (CAN) member Dan Keefe. "We are demanding an end to funding for the Iraq War. We don't want to attack Iran. The message read, "Bomb here in the back stairwell and keys to everything in Building 7," pertaining to the detention of a smaller van/trailer across from the Visitor Information Center that also contained keys to Chenoweth Laboratory and Fernald Hall, according to Warner.

According to Warner, campus police decided that the writing was directed to the white waste receptacle in the stairwell.

"The police determined that what was written in the bathroom was not related to what was going in Herter," he said.

Bagavathi said the University emergency response, alerting students, faculty and staff of the situation via e-mail and the UMass Web site had been successfully planned.

"It's not common on campus [this morning]," he said at the press conference pointing toward the screen behind him. "This is the first potential threat. We're pretty well prepared [for this]. Caution is always part [of it]."

According to Bagavathi, the University has been enhancing its emergency preparedness and campus alert system over the past six months since the Virginia Tech tragedy.

Donald F. Robinson, who is responsible for emergency management on the UMass campus, said yesterday morning's scare highlighted important aspects of UMass preparedness on which the University can improve.

"We know that the UMass community was getting a message, but that was difficult for people to believe. It is important to work with UMPD, Office of Information Technologies [to] see what [more] we could be doing to improve the situation," he said.

UMass is also working on a voluntary text messaging alert system, modeled after and [illegible] at the outset of the screen for the UMass TV system.

Is UMass prepared?

Early yesterday morning, University of Massachusetts authorities discovered a 30-rack box in Herter Hall with a battery attached, wires sticking out and a sign reading, "If this is moved it will explode."

An e-mail was sent out at approximately 6:30 a.m., warning students that a "suspected explosive device," was found in Herter. When the scene was cleared, another e-mail was sent out at about 9 a.m. alerting the campus community that the security alert had been lifted and classes would resume. The e-mails were definitely timely, but the real question is whether they were sufficient.

For some students it worked. They woke up and checked their e-mail or the UMass homepage, and they knew what was going on.

Other students, though, got off buses and were surprised to see campus so deserted, or showed up to empty lecture halls wondering why no one was there. They waited outside the library with hoodies up until it re-opened at 11 a.m. When Massachusetts Daily Collegian staff members approached students to ask how they heard about the scare, some students responded with, "What scare?"

Many students were woken up by text messages from their friends and frantic phone calls from their parents. Not everyone, though, checks their e-mail, or is lucky enough to be forewarned by friends or parents.

Today, the threat wasn't real, and no one was hurt. But would simply e-mailing students, staff and faculty be enough if something dangerous had truly been found on campus?

UMass has received a grant from the state to create a text messaging alert system, which administrators hope to implement in the coming months. Today's events highlighted the need for such a system, and the need to have it soon.

It works at Montclair State University. The public university in northern New Jersey won the 2007 Campus Technology Innovators Award from Campus Technology magazine for their distribution of a Campus Connect cell phone.

Four thousand students, including all first years, have the cell phone. It can be used to receive information regarding campus activities. Most importantly, though, it provides Montclair students with quick and up-to-date information about serious situations occurring on campus.

No one expects UMass to start passing out cell phones. But instead of investing in a warning siren system, another option on the table, UMass should focus on implementing a voluntary text messaging system, similar to the one at Montclair. This would reach students who live off-campus as well as in dorms.

Inadequate communication between campus security and the UMass community could yield dangerous results. During this semester alone, two students have been stabbed outside the Student Union, two students have been attacked in their dorms with a baseball bat, and there has been a bomb scare in Herter Hall. After each incident, an e-mail from UMass campus security has followed.

It's not enough. We need to replace campus security's insufficient e-mails with a more effective text messaging system of alerts – before anything else happens on campus that may threaten students' security.

Transforming UMass

Bruce Lerner

Let's examine the structure of the University of Massachusetts for a second. Who are the patrons, the bosses, and the workers? The answers to these questions are somewhat complicated, but several players are easily identified. The administration, meaning the bourgeois upper class of the University, makes the rules, and the workers, meaning everybody else who makes the place run, follow them. This current relationship between the administration and the workers must change, and the Graduate Employee Organization's (GEO) fight for a fair contract is a good place to start.

First, UMass must be identified not as a place for people of all stripes to come and edify themselves to fulfill their quest for knowledge. This notion must be outright rejected as it does not hold water. Most people come to college because a college degree has taken the place of what a high school degree used to be. People need to get decent-paying jobs in order to survive.

Any knowledge that is gained in the process is secondary to the tangible benefits that a college degree offers. It's a little bit grim to think of college in this way, but it's important to be honest.

The administration and all of the corporations who fund UMass know this fact and capitalize on it. This is why there is a lack of transparency at the school. It explains why there is difficulty finding on the school's Web site any substantive information about how decisions are made.

The goal of the University is to be a successful business. Unfortunately, this means that cutting costs and raising profits is the order of the day. That's why we see things like the cutting of professors, while increasing undergraduates. This is all while refusing to give decent wages to graduate students who must work harder to accommodate increased class sizes.

According to the Boston Globe in 2005, UMass was the 5th most expensive public school out of a survey of 67. Where does all that money go? It certainly doesn't go to the graduate students, the very people who are in need of the money and the source of UMass's functioning status.

The low price of tuition, which has stayed at reasonable rates, is deceptive, given that fees and room and board are what add to the major price tag. This is a result of the cutting of state budgets for public education.

UMass is increasingly becoming a place for rich whites, with a pathetic minority rate in both the student body and the faculty.

As usual, the administration is not the party who suffers. The graduate students and the poor minority undergrads foot the bill, the cost of which is an affordable education resulting in upward mobility. From the looks of it, the chancellor is not doing too badly for himself financially. It is the people who are running the show who are actually in a place of financial hardship.

The GEO has been in negotiations with the UMass bigwigs for 10 months to no avail. The graduate students are not asking for luxurious hot tubs filled with Crystal champagne, but for simple things such as no new financially crippling fees.

The administration refuses the GEO's contractual tenet of transparency as well, meaning that grad students could face arbitrary fee increases which would in effect render any raise they receive inconsequential. This is akin to getting a loan from the bank and the bank not stating the interest rate until the loan has already been given. A child could see the inherent injustice in this process.

GEO's other demands are likewise completely reasonable and include things such as healthcare, childcare, and diversity funding. UMass is increasingly becoming a place for rich whites, with a pathetic minority rate in both the student body and the faculty.

GEO realizes the importance of different backgrounds being represented in the school and is pushing for diversity funding which would be allocated to humanities and social sciences as opposed to just the hard sciences. This would give opportunities to students who come from different places.

Having one's children taken care of is simply a right and is to be expected if one is to work at the University. The same should be said of healthcare, as it is indispensable to ensure the health of UMass's intellectual workers in order to continue the running of classes.

The University is playing the same trick with healthcare as it is with fees, letting the co-pay open-ended, as opposed to the once stable $250 price tag. Enough is enough. These people deserve their basic rights, and the University has enough resources to follow through, if it even pretends it has a choice in the matter.

To quote the Boston Globe again, "Though the state may still own the University, its real master is now the marketplace." Every undergraduate, graduate, and faculty member must fight for the basic rights of people on this campus and for the right of people from less privileged circumstances to attend school here. The alternative is what we are currently seeing: the complete transformation of a public university into a privately money-making machine for corporate elites.

In other words, instead of nurturing intellectual environment, UMass is a corporate education factory. This must change, and people must realize that UMass-Amherst is not a dream world where everyone can just relax. The reality for many people dictates that things must change if we wish to preserve the right of affordable and decent education for all, not just for the white and rich. The fight starts with the GEO and ends wherever people choose.

An ode to the library

Matt Hoffman

One of my favorite parts of the UMass campus is the library and its surrounding area. This love of mine is in no small part owed to the flowers that have been planted around the base of the gargantuan tower of books.

I don't know about you, but I literally stop and smell the flowers. I might be the only one. I might look like a dork. But some of them smell really beautiful. Try it. It might help you decrease your stress as you run from class to class, while attempting to do homework in between.

The library also exudes a sense of community. Even when just walking by the benches that surround the flower beds, one can spot names of those who donated those benches in honor or memory of someone else.

This act of donation provides us students with a link between the past and present. Thinking about the hard work that others have put into creating our society – even if we don't actually know the person whose name is etched on the bench.

Connecting others' past work to our present is a way to appreciate our past, strengthen our present, and make an even more glorious future.

Albert Einstein, the most famous scientist of the 20th century and spirited Zionist and Jewish leader, once commented that when he realizes how hard those who have come before him have worked for what we have now, he understands that he owes it to them to continue their work. I find this notion to be especially inspiring.

If one follows this line of reasoning, then one can hope for a similar state of mind that led Oprah, Her Highness the demi-god, to exclaim, "When I look into the future, it's so bright it burns my eyes." (I don't mean to be sarcastic about Oprah; I admire her.)

Once you've passed the flower beds and the benches, you can enter the library and go down one floor to the Learning Commons. Here is where I truly feel a sense of community. The area is lively (as lively as a library should be), with students constantly teeming in and out.

A society should be judged by what her inhabitants hold to be important. Judging by the amount of time I Mass students spend in the pursuit of knowledge, the realm of ideas, and the application of learning to practical solutions, it seems that we are a community dedicated to enhancing the future.

Connecting others' past work to our present is a way to appreciate our past, strengthen our present, and make an even more glorious future.

I'm glad we don't just play video games all day long. Imagine if W.E.B. DuBois spent all day playing video games. We wouldn't have a library named after this man. I know, DuBois has a lot more to his name than just a library.

He was a great voice for racial equality. But if we all get lazy, we won't have anything to show for it.

The fact that so many students spend time at the library would also make Judah Ibn Tibbon, the 12th century Jewish poet from Granada, Spain, proud. He advised, "Make books your treasures and bookshelves your gardens of delight." I found this quote on the wrapping of a book I received from the Birthright Israel program, after I visited that pioneering country, and I just thought it was deliciously true. It is nice to study among the works that other scholars have created.

As Barbara Streisand, my own personal favorite, sings in the movie Yentl (as she is admitted to a yeshiva, a Jewish center of learning), "I can walk through the Forests Of the trees of knowledge. I can enter rooms. Where there are rooms within rooms. Wrapped in the shawl that learning weaves." I can open doors and take from the shelves All the books I've longed to hold. I can ask all the questions. The why's and the wheres. As the mysteries of life unfold."

To know that the UMass community is heeding the advice of Albert Einstein, Oprah Winfrey, Judah Ibn Tibbon and Barbra Streisand, I could say a lot about our character. We should all be proud.

Now for the next challenge: get some architecture students to build a library that is pleasing to the eye.

Apparently, Kermit was wrong. It can be easy to be green. At least Facebook would like to think so. Brent Charbonneau, a University of Ottawa student, has created a way to decrease carbon dioxide production by the click of a mouse. His masterpiece, called Greenbook, has gathered 9,171 daily active users who want to improve their environment.

How does it work? According to Charbonneau, "Facebook servers and your computer use energy which puts carbon dioxide in the air. Installing the Greenbook application generates money through sponsorship, which is used to reduce harmful emissions. So now we can hug out 18 hours a day on Facebook, knowing that we are doing our part for the planet." This all seems easy enough.

The more Facebook users who join Greenbook, the bigger the amount of carbon dioxide reduction can be purchased and distributed to its users. Every month, sponsorships are given to Greenbook to buy an amount of carbon dioxide reduction. Each day Greenbook gives out a fraction of the purchased reduction to each user depending on how many users they have. The more sponsorship money they have to buy and the more users, the better.

Greenbook also shares a platform to exchange ideas for green living. It gets better. Other users can vote on whether they like your green ideas with a "thumbs up" approval. With these votes, you will get carbon dioxide removal votes at the end of the day. The more votes you receive, the more you will benefit the environment.

Greenbook is a step in the right direction. However, it is not enough.

For the skeptics out there, there is a FAQ section to discern any uncertainty. Important question number one: How do you really reduce the carbon dioxide in the air? Greenbook answers that they are using the money they get from their sponsors to buy forward strips on Solar Renewable Energy Credits (SREC) from Sun Run Generation LLC. This corporation is a green solar company. SREC's help to offset the emissions of carbon dioxide.

A Skeptic may also ask: How do we know you are actually spending money on this? Greenbook challenges back that Sun Run Generation is a real company and will gladly vouch for Greenbook. They invite you to contact them at sunrungeneration.com or even give them a call.

The Experience Project is currently sponsoring Greenbook for the month of October. They have attributed a whopping 104,369 pounds of carbon dioxide offset to the cause. Meaning, each day Greenbook will be able to share approximately 3,478.967 pounds of carbon dioxide offset with every user this month.

It all sounds idealistic and too good to be true. A click of a mouse resulting in carbon dioxide offset seems to be a stretch. Not only can you send out pixilated "tree trees" to your friends with Greenbook, but you can make the world a better place. Should we buy into this?

I say yes. Greenbook is a step in the right direction. However, it is not enough. This generation has an obsession with making things easy. A click of a mouse to make a change just each and not suffice. Get up, get outside and make change.

If you want to better your environment, become an active part of that change. Plant a tree, don't send your friend a pixilated one on Facebook. Help reduce carbon dioxide without the use of sponsors and complication.

When you're cold this winter, bulk up with warm clothes and turn down your heat. Not only will this save you money, but it is better for the environment. If you're hot, open a window rather than cranking up your air conditioning. It seems like common sense, but somehow is still ignored.

There are hundreds of ways to live a greener lifestyle. It's a matter of choice.

If you care enough about your environment, take care of it. Recycle. Don't let the facade of a Facebook application let you think that you're appeasing your duty to the environment.

Suspected bomb proved fake

ed with the bomb threat, said Terry Warner, assistant director of administrative services at the library.

The message read, "Hush blew up the Twin Towers" and "Key to everything is Building 7," perhaps a reference to a smaller skyscraper across from the World Trade Center that also collapsed on Sept. 11, 2001 and is shrouded in conspiracy theories.

According to Warner, campus police concluded that the writing was unrelated to the bomb scare, according to Warner.

"The police determined that what was going on in our building was not related to what was going in Herter," she said.

The UMPD declined to comment.

"Kids write on that board every day," said Lorraine Lapointe, a building monitor supervisor at the library. "They've been writing stuff about 9/11 ever since 9/11."

The library was evacuated in about five minutes, according to Warner.

"I don't think other than fire evacuations we've ever had anything of this nature," said Warner of the library evacuation.

At 10:45 a.m., a few dozen students were waiting outside the doors of the library, which reopened at 11 a.m.

Blaguszweski said the University emergency protocols, alerting students, faculty and staff of the situation via e-mail and the UMass Web site had been successfully followed.

"It's not crowded on campus this morning," he said at the press conference, praising the speed at which authorities reacted to the potential threat. "We're pretty well prepared [for this]. Can we always learn? Absolutely."

According to Blaguszweski, the University has been enhancing its emergency preparedness and campus alert system over the past six months since the Virginia Tech tragedy.

Donald Robinson, who is responsible for emergency management on the UMass campus, said yesterday morning's scare highlighted important aspects of crisis preparedness on which the University can improve.

"We know that the UMass homepage was getting so many hits that it was difficult for people to access it, so we want to work with OIT [Office of Information Technologies] to see what possibly could be done to improve that situation," he said.

UMass is also looking at a voluntary text messaging alert system, outdoor sirens, and a grappler at the bottom of the screen for the UMass TV system.

"Some of these things were already in the works. This enforced the need to continue down this road," he said.

Ellis, who first called the police, was impressed with the speedy response.

"We have a lot of dedicated employees who are willing to be here in half an hour to make sure students are safe," he said. "Students should know that there's a lot of people who want to make sure they're safe," he added, noting that Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano had arrived within 30 minutes in his track pants.

Police are conducting an ongoing investigation of the device and are following up on several leads, Blaguszweski said this morning. Whether the UMPD would lead the investigation was not yet known.

The Learning Commons and W.E.B. DuBois Library were evacuated because of the bomb threat yesterday morning.

Students judge Higher edu. dialogue crisis warning

Many students found out about the bomb scare through word of mouth, or from signs posted in their residence halls by resident assistants. Of 20 students interviewed, only two found out about the incident because they checked their e-mail uninformed.

U-Store cashier Amy Connelly described activity on campus as "kind of like a snow day."

The U-Store opened at 9:30 a.m. yesterday morning and had fewer customers than usual.

"We had some kids come in and say they went to their classes and there was nobody there," said Connelly.

Junior Mike Moise, an RA in Chadbourne Hall, felt that a simple system can be put in place.

He expressed that the message should be passed from desidence directors to RAs, and then directly to residents on campus, which is what Moise did with his residents.

The University is currently working on a campus-wide text message alert system, which administrators hope to implement soon.

"I remember last year filling out a survey and they asked if we should have emergency text messaging," said senior Christine Corley. "I thought it was a good idea. I check my e-mail every morning, but I know a lot of people who do not. Everyone has a cell phone."

Patricia De Oliveira, representing the Student Immigrant Movement and minority students.

Also speaking will be Clantha McCurdy for the Board of Higher Education, President Michael Widmer of the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation, and Senators Robert O'Leary and Stanley Rosenberg representing the Legislature's Joint Committee on Higher Education.

The Summit is organized into workshops, panel discussions and a general assembly to present the variety of information.

Oliveira said he would like to see the Summit educate people and keep them involved. "We need to educate a many people as possible, students, staff, and faculty," he said.

PHENOM aims to have all branches of the public education system working together toward a common end.

This involves community colleges, state colleges and the UMass system all coming together to have increased affordability and accessibility.

The accountability that Page mentioned won't be forgotten either, since Gov. Patrick attended last year's Summit.

Oliveira said the best way for students to get involved through their campuses is "to talk to people already involved."

Framingham State College has instituted a sub committee as part of their Student Government Association for non-elected student officials to get involved, and he hopes to see the trend spread to all of the public campuses.

PHENOM was founded in February of this year and welcomes the public to come out to the event. The summit will host a wide variety of speakers, from state senators to students.

PHENOM's creation arose in light of the first Higher Education Summit last December.

It hasn't even been a year and the group, which includes students, staff, and faculty from Massachusetts's 29 public colleges, has already been very active in Massachusetts.

On April 25, PHENOM lobbied at the state house for improvements in higher education with numerous students standing up for their rights to an affordable education.

But they didn't attend alone. PHENOM came bearing 16,000 post cards signed by their peers on the respective campuses.

For more information on PHENOM's past and upcoming activities, visit www.phenomonline.org.

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 26, 2007

"It were best that we not all think alike; it is difference of opinion that makes horseraces." —Mark Twain

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Is UMass prepared?

Early yesterday morning, University of Massachusetts authorities discovered a 30-rack box in Herter Hall with a battery attached, wires sticking out and a sign reading, "If this is moved it will explode."

An e-mail was sent out at approximately 6:30 a.m., warning students that a "suspected explosive device," was found in Herter. When the scene was cleared, another e-mail was sent out at about 9 a.m. alerting the campus community that the security alert had been lifted and classes would resume. The e-mails were definitely timely, but the real question is whether they were sufficient.

For some students it worked. They woke up and checked their e-mail or the UMass homepage, and they knew what was going on.

Other students, though, got off buses and were surprised to see campus so deserted, or showed up to empty lecture halls wondering why no one was there. They waited outside the library with hoodies up until it re-opened at 11 a.m. When Massachusetts Daily Collegian staff members approached students to ask how they heard about the scare, some students responded with, "What scare?"

Many students were woken up by text messages from their friends and frantic phone calls from their parents. Not everyone, though, checks their e-mail, or is lucky enough to be forewarned by friends or family.

Today, the threat wasn't real, and no one was hurt. But would simply e-mailing students, staff and faculty be enough if something dangerous had truly been found on campus?

UMass has received a grant from the state to create a text messaging alert system, which administrators hope to implement in the coming months. Today's events highlighted the need for such a system, and the need to have it soon.

It works at Montclair State University. The public university in northern New Jersey won the 2007 Campus Technology Innovators Award from Campus Technology magazine for their distribution of a Campus Connect cell phone.

Four thousand students, including all first years, have the cell phone. It can be used to receive information regarding campus activities. Most importantly, though, it provides Montclair students with quick and up-to-date information about serious situations occurring on campus.

No one expects UMass to start passing out cell phones. But instead of investing in a warning siren system, another option on the table, UMass should focus on implementing a voluntary text messaging system, similar to the one at Montclair. This would reach students who live off-campus as well as in dorms.

Inadequate communication between campus security and the UMass community could yield dangerous results. During this semester alone, two students have been stabbed outside the Student Union, two students have been attacked in their dorms with a baseball bat, and there has been a bomb scare in Herter Hall. After each incident, an e-mail from UMass campus security has followed.

It's not enough. We need to replace campus security's insufficient e-mails with a more effective text messaging system of alerts – before anything else happens on campus that may threaten students' security.

Transforming UMass

Let's examine the structure of the University of Massachusetts for a second. Who are the patrons, the bosses, and the workers? The answers to these questions are somewhat complicated, but several players are easily identified. The administration, meaning the bourgeois upper class of the University, makes the rules, and the workers, meaning everybody else who makes the place run, follow them. This current relationship between the administration and the workers must change, and the Graduate Employee Organization's (GEO) fight for a fair contract is a good place to start.

First, UMass must be identified not as a place for people of all stripes to come and edify themselves to fulfill their quest for knowledge. This notion must be outright rejected as it does not hold water. Most people come to college because a college degree has taken the place of what a high school degree used to be. People need to get decent-paying jobs in order to survive.

Any knowledge that is gained in the process is secondary to the tangible benefits that a college degree offers. It's a little bit grim to think of college in this way, but it's important to be honest.

The administration and all of the corporations who fund UMass know this fact and capitalize on it. This is why there is a lack of transparency at the school. It explains why there is difficulty finding on the school's Web site any substantive information about how decisions are made.

The goal of the University is to be a successful business. Unfortunately, this means that cutting costs and raising profits is the order of the day. That's why we see things like the cutting of professors, while increasing undergraduates. This is all while refusing to give decent wages to graduate students who must work harder to accommodate increased class sizes.

According to the Boston Globe in 2005, UMass was the 5th most expensive public school out of a survey of 67. Where does all that money go? It certainly doesn't go to the graduate students, the very people who are in need of the money and the source of UMass's functioning status.

The low price of tuition, which has stayed at reasonable rates, is deceptive, given that fees and room and board are what add to the major price tag. This is a result of the cutting of state budgets for public education.

UMass is increasingly becoming a place for rich whites, with a pathetic minority rate in both the student body and the faculty.

As usual, the administration is not the party who suffers. The graduate students and the poor minority undergrads foot the bill, the cost of which is an affordable education resulting in upward mobility. From the looks of it, the chancellor is not doing too badly for himself financially. It is the people who are running the show who are actually in a place of financial hardship.

The GEO has been in negotiations with the UMass bigwigs for 10 months to no avail. The graduate students are not asking for luxurious hot tubs filled with Crystal champagne, but for simple things such as money financially crippling fees.

The administration refuses the GEO's contractual tenet of transparency as well, meaning that grad students could face arbitrary fee increases which would in effect render any raise they receive inconsequential. This is akin to getting a loan from the bank and the bank not stating the interest rate until the loan has already been given. A child could see the inherent injustice in this process.

GEO's other demands are likewise completely reasonable and include things such as healthcare, childcare, and diversity funding. UMass is increasingly becoming a place for rich whites, with a pathetic minority rate in both the student body and the faculty.

GEO realizes the importance of different backgrounds being represented in the school and its pushing for diversity funding which would be allocated to humanities and social sciences as opposed to just the hard sciences. This would give opportunities to students who come from different places.

How does it work? According to Charbonneau, "Facebook servers and your computer use energy which puts carbon dioxide in the air. Installing the Greenbook application generates money through sponsorship, which is used to reduce harmful emissions. So now we can hug our 18 hours a day on Facebook, knowing that we are doing our part for the planet." This all seems easy enough.

The more Facebook users who join Greenbook, the bigger the amount of carbon dioxide reduction can be purchased and distributed to its users. Every month, sponsorships are given to Greenbook to buy an amount of carbon dioxide reduction. Each day Greenbook gives out a fraction of the purchased reduction to each user depending on how many users they have. The more sponsorship money they have to buy and the more users, the better.

Greenbook also shares a platform to exchange ideas for green living. It gets better. Other users can vote on whether they like your green ideas with a "thumbs up" approval. With these votes, you will get carbon dioxide removal votes at the end of the day. The more votes you receive, the more you will benefit the environment.

Greenbook is a step in the right direction. However, it is not enough.

For the skeptics out there, there is a FAQ section to discern any uncertainty. Important question number one: How do you really reduce the carbon dioxide in the air? Greenbook answers that they are using the money they get from their sponsors to buy forward strips on Solar Renewable Energy Credits (SREC) from Sun Run Generation LLC. This corporation is a green solar company. SRECs help to offset the emissions of carbon dioxide.

A skeptic may also ask: How do we know you are actually spending money on this? Greenbook challenges back that Sun Run Generation is a real company, and will gladly vouch for Greenbook. They invite you to contact them at sunrungeneration.com or even give them a call.

The Experience Project is currently sponsoring Greenbook for the month of October. They have attributed a whopping 104,668 pounds of carbon dioxide offset to the cause. Meaning, each day Greenbook will be able to share approximately 3,478.967 pounds of carbon dioxide offset with every user this month.

It all sounds idealistic and too good to be true. A click of a mouse resulting in carbon dioxide offset seems to be a stretch. Not only can you send out pictures of "tree trees" to your friends with Greenbook, but you can make the world a better place. Should we buy into this?

I say yes. Greenbook is a step in the right direction. However, it is not enough. Connecting others' past work to our present is a way to appreciate our past, strengthen our present, and make an even more glorious future. This generation has an obsession with making things easy. A click of a mouse to make change just isn't going to suffice. Get up, get involved and make change.

If you want to better your environment, become an active part of that change. Plant a tree, don't send your friend a picture of one on Facebook. That reduces carbon dioxide without the use of sponsors and complications.

When you're cold this winter, bulk up with warm clothes and turn down your heat. Not only will this save you money, but it is better for the environment. If you're hot, open a window rather than cranking up your air conditioning. It seems like common sense, but somehow is still ignored.

There are hundreds of ways to live a greener lifestyle. It's a matter of choice.

If you care enough about your environment, take care of it. Recycle. Don't let the facade of a Facebook application let you think that you're appeasing your duty to the environment.

Roctober Fest this weekend

Central Area Goverment is trying something new this fall. Instead of having their usual spring concert on the hill, this year they are having a mini fall concert featuring bands such as Leaving London, The After Hour, Deep Pocket and On the Rocks.

Tomorrow, Central Hill will host Roctober Fest, a mini-rock festival featuring four local bands. The event is free to all students to attend and food and drinks will be provided. It is going to be held from 2-7 p.m., with an opener band, Leaving London, slated to go on around 1 p.m.

Roctober Fest is a new event put on by the Central Area Government, lead by Governor Mike Megaro. In previous years the Central Area Government has put the event on in the spring, hosted in the same location. This semester they decided to do things differently when the headlining band, Streamline, contacted them and requested to play a show at UMass.

Since Megaro and his fellow Central Area Government members were experienced in putting on local shows at Central, had connections, knew the bands and had the appropriate equipment available, Central Area Government decided to go forward with the band's request and put on the show a semester early this year.

Leaving London, a funk/powerpop band from the immediate area is tentatively scheduled to open the show for the evening. They are a smooth-sounding band that enjoys playing their music. They went to school and lived in dorms together, and soon there after discovered their similar musical interests.

The other bands on the lineup infiltide The After Hour, Deep Pocket and On The Rocks.

The After Hour is an experimental rock group from Auburn, Mass., who just recently played the DCU center arena in Worcester, opening for the trendy pop/rock band Boys Like Girls. Despite being unsigned, they have an EP out now available to purchase and listen to on various music sites, such as iTunes.

Their music incorporates an underlying storyline with heavy rock rhythms. Combined with their persistent, hard-working attitudes, this band is sure to quickly become the next big thing to come from Massachusetts. They already have won MTVU's "Best Music On Campus" award, and are certain to have a successful future.

Deep Pocket is a young, aspiring five-piece funk rock band from Amherst. What sets this local band apart is their unique lineup – they are led by Juneau Brennan, a female vocalist. They put an original, funky spin on the cover songs they perform, especially their rendition of Rufus and Chaka Khan's "Tell Me Something Good." They are inspired by music from New Orleans, such as The Meters, as well as legendary artists like Stevie Wonder, Ray Charles, Michael Jackson and countless others. Deep Pocket should be an enjoyable act to watch this Saturday.

On the Rocks is another young rock group from the area, and is an '80s and '90s cover band. Currently, they have five original songs, and have a whopping 75 cover songs under their belts. Some of the bands they cover include Led Zepplin, Van Halen, Black Sabbath, Jimmy Hendrix, ZZ Top and Red Hot Chili Peppers.

Streamline, the only band originating from outside of Massachusetts, will be the headliners for Rocktoberfest. Despite their self-proclamation of being a "rock band," they have a unique sound including an acoustic guitar and keyboards. However, their music is far beyond rock, with some of their instruments including an acoustic guitar and keyboard. Listeners might be able to detect hints of country, blues, soul and whatever else their fans take from their music once they give it a chance.

After recently securing their official lineup to include veteran Something Corporate drummer Brian Ireland, and creating more and more hit tracks, the band have been propelled to success. Their song "All I Need" sparked a great response from the industry and fans alike, earning them a slot on Myspace's "most played songs" for five days straight. Streamline is currently in the process of putting out a record, and are definitely worth keeping an eye on.

Halloween comes to Amherst early

BY MARCY BRAIDMAN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Student Valley Productions is getting ready to scare up another round of laughs at their Halloween Show this Saturday night at 8 p.m. in Herter Hall 231. The show is free.

SVP, a student-run organization that has been performing on campus since the early '90s, consists of three different comedy troops. The shows always start at 8 p.m. and last for about an hour. Mission Improvable is the oldest of the three troops and IWA, Improv With Attitude, is the newest. IWA was started just several years ago. Sketch 22 has existed for a little bit longer than IWA. Many of the members of SVP perform, or hold positions, in more than one troop.

Mission Improvable performs short-form improv. They play improv games that are similar to ones performed on the show "Whose Line is it Anyway?" every Saturday night.

IWA performs long form improv every Friday night. IWA uses different forms of Improv from week to week, sometimes performing scenes that will last half an hour or the full hour of the show.

Sketch 22 performs scripted sketch comedy, similar to Saturday Night Live, several times each semester.

All of the troops perform their shows in Herter Hall. Mission Improvable is a "family show," often asking the audience not to shout out suggestions that may offend their grandmothers. Sketch 22 and IWA are most certainly not family shows – their acts often contain profanity and dirty suggestions that the audience may think of. The troops of SVP frequently perform joint shows using any combination of the three troops for special occasions, such as holidays like Halloween.

SVP has been celebrating Halloween with a special show for many years now. However, it was only in recent years that the show began utilizing all three troops. Originally, it was only Mission Improvable that took the Saturday night just before or after Halloween to celebrate the holiday. The shows often include theatrics and Halloween-themed games. There is often a costume parade, which awards the most creative costume.

This Saturday will be no exception to that rule. At the end of recent shows this semester the members of SVP have made special announcements about the upcoming show and stressed the fact that costumes are expected and participants in the costume parade will be rewarded. The show will run for about an hour. Each troop will be doing its own set that will run for about 20 min-

Minutemen come marching home

BY BRIAN WOOD

With a horn introduction fit for the arrival of royalty, the 33rd annual Multiband Pops concert began on Oct. 19 in the Fine Arts Center at the University of Massachusetts. The soaring trumpet overture heralded the opening of the evening and was immediately followed by Jeff Cox, the chairman of the department of music and dance, who welcomed those in attendance in a brief commencement speech while inviting them to enjoy the wonderful array of musical talent on display while sharing in the mystery of motion, sound and time.

From the very start of the showcase, diverse themes and scattered musical styles were vividly apparent, and such snap judgments were proved correct as the night unfolded with the showcase's unorthodox selections and disharmonious ordering of acts.

A big band selection entitled "The Klaxon" was played masterfully by the Symphony Band, under the enthusiastic guide of Laura Revroth, and proved a strong start to an evening full of worthwhile performances.

Smith professor writes play

World premiere of 'Flip Side' this weekend in Northampton

BY ANDREA MURRAY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Ellen Maddow's play "Flip Side," produced by Ellen Maddow, makes its world premiere this week at Smith College. This production of the play features both students and faculty of Smith, and Paul Zimet directs to form an international collaboration with Maddow.

Maddow and Zimet are the Off-Broadway Theater Award-winning co-founders of "The Talking Band." Maddow and Zimet have teamed up before to please Pioneer Valley audiences with plays like "The Parrot," "Star Messengers" and "Delicious Rivers," which sold out last season.

In a new creative process Maddow, inspired by the set designer's visual environment, developed two sets of characters in separate worlds that churn, collide and flip upside down as if entangled in a giant Mobius strip.

In December 2006, The Talking Band began brainstorming for the play and asked Hungarian-born Anna Kirlay to create a set. Kirlay began work on the set by first creating two tent-like lightweight gazebo structures to suggest temporary shelter. These structures are so portable that the entire scenic element can disappear and reappear.

The gazebos also allow for video and shadow to be projected on them. "Flip Side's" decidedly opposite creative process gave Kirlay the freedom to create the set first and then challenge the playwright to shape the script around the environment created.

Maddow loves that Kirlay created an ethereal environment. Theater after all is an illusion, and the set follows in that manner. The audience is invited into the characters' world where it is anyone's guess as to what is real and what is a reflection, film or shadow.

The Talking Band was founded in 1974 by Maddow, Tina Shepard and Zimet. All three are former members of Joseph Chaikin's Open Theater. Originally, they worked with contemporary poets so they could create a charged language as forceful and physical movement.

Their hallmark of rich visual displays and energetic music is due to the fact that they openly collaborate with designers and musicians. The Talking Band has created over 40 original theater works that make ordinary life seem extraordinary. They have performed in Canada, Mexico, U.S., Venezuela, Chile, Russia, France, England and Denmark.

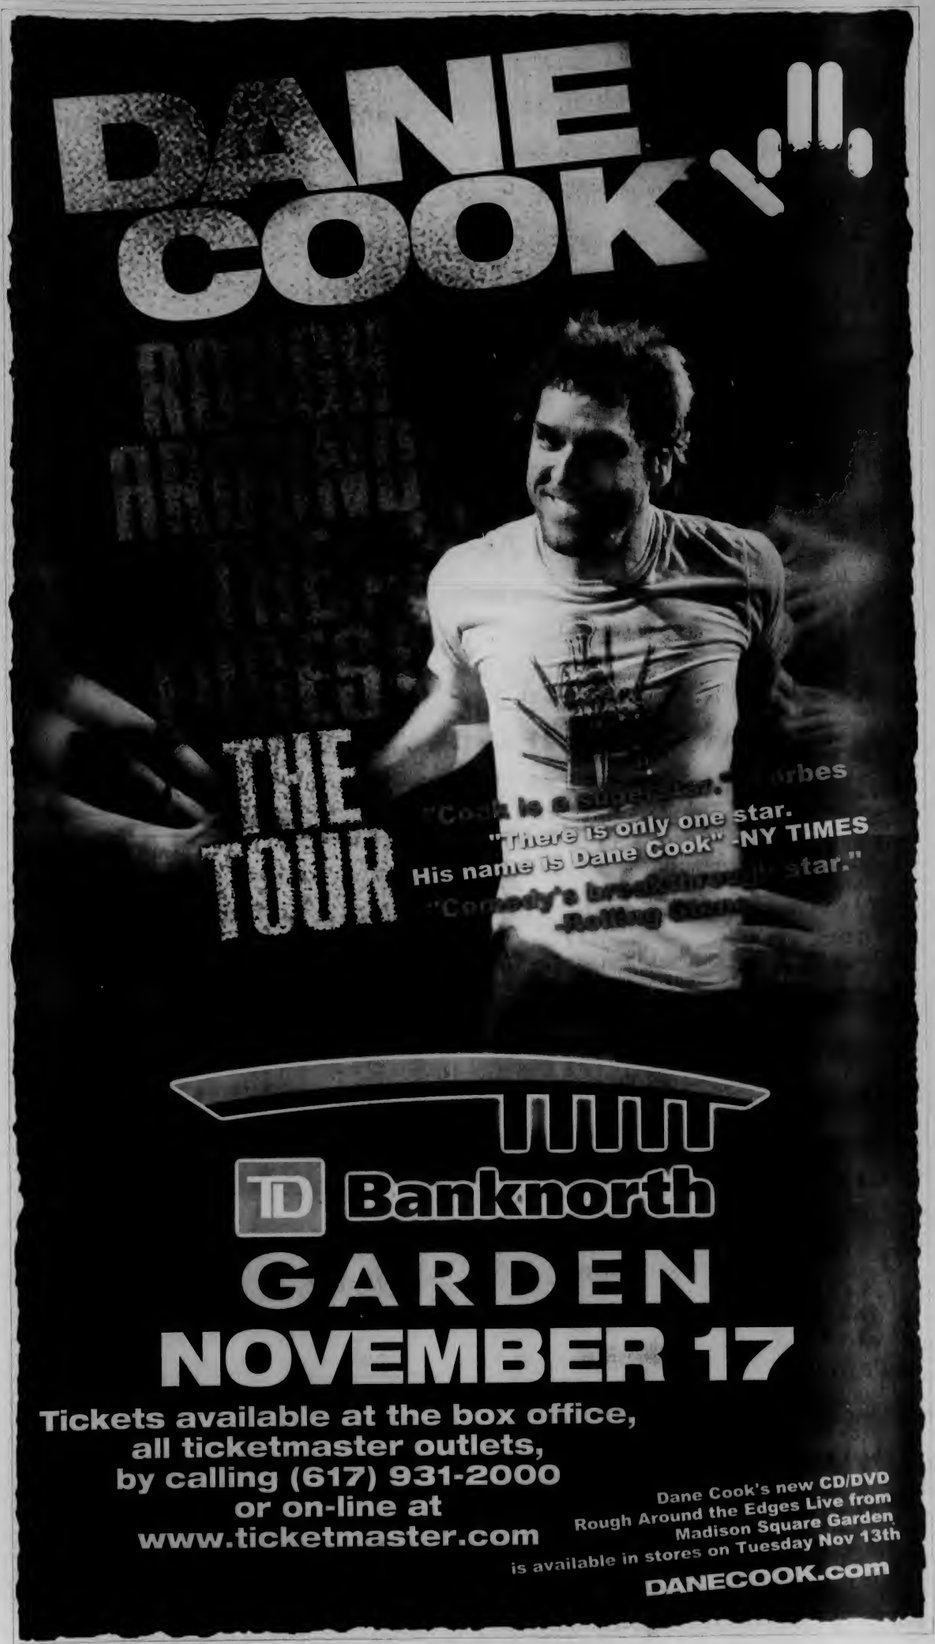
They usually tackle issues around them and their communities while also exploring the visual realms of theater. They run a separate group called The Talking Band Performance Lab that enables performing artists of all experience levels to exchange ideas and develop their performing techniques.

Zimet, a Smith associate of theatre and artistic director of The Talking Band, has directed numerous celebrated productions at Smith. He received the 2003 Village Voice OBIE award for the Talking Band production "Painter Snake in a Painted Chair" also by Maddow. He received three other OBIE awards for work on the Open Theater and the Winter Project, both directed by Joseph Chaikin.

BESSIE Award-winning composer and keyboardist "Blue" Gene Tyranny has composed and will perform original music for the play. Tyranny has composed over fifty works for electronic, instrumental and vocal ensembles. He has contributed to over 30 film and video soundtracks and another 50 scores for dance and theater productions. He has worked with a wide range of talent including Iggy Pop, Phil Perkins and Brenda Hutchinson. He has toured throughout the U.S., Europe, Mexico, Brazil and Canada. His avant-garde style will no doubt bring excitement to the production.

Maddow was awarded a grant to write "Flip Side" by NEA/TCG Theatre Residency for Playwrights. She wrote and composed "Delicious Rivers" which showed at Smith last fall. Kirlay and The Talking Band were given a grant from the New Generations International Fellowship through the Theater Communications Group. Maddow is a member of the New Dramatists as well as a founding member of The Talking Band.

"Flip Side" will open in Hungary and Poland with Hungarian actors this spring. The Talking Band will show its production in New York City next fall.



"Flip Side" is showing at Theatre 14, Mendenhall Center on Green Street in Northampton at Smith College.

Pops concert a big success

Band's selection, the all a capella Vocal Jazz Ensemble delved into two selections. The selections brought listeners back to the age of Phil Spectre and classic love ballads with their soulful crooning and rich romantic harmonies on "A Ghost of Chance" and "Waltz for Debby." This minimalist contrast to the big band introduction would be the first of many transitions that would follow this formula.

When the spotlight faded from the Vocal Jazz Ensemble it refocused itself on the Mass Marimba Band as they took to the stage. They put a modern spin on a timeless classic, wowing the audience with their rendition of "Take Five" by injecting an essence of funk into a night predominantly dominated by more traditional big band pieces. The ensemble took home one of the evening's most robust applauses, both after their performance had concluded and during the several featured individual solos that highlighted their talents throughout the piece.

Transitioning from the funk-infused Marimba Band, a French horn piece emerged from the darkness of the Fine Arts Center, bringing the mood back down to earth with mellower tones and softer expressions. Keeping with the performance's scattered theme, this level of comfort was only present for a brief moment.

An ambitious piece from the Chapel Jazz Ensemble exploded from the wake of the French horn piece, with dueling saxophone solos and pronounced, heavy use of exclamatory trumpets in support. The selection aroused the crowd with renewed interest with its energy and tact.

Moving to the medium of visual art, a tripped-out display of dance purposely brought viewers back to cheaply produced '70s films with tie dyed hippie ensembles and horribly outdated dance styles with "Flashback."

Following the dance routine, the award winning Jazz Ensemble I took center stage and delivered one of the unquestionable highlights of the showcase. With solos featured on the clarinet, baritone saxophone and tenor saxophone, a lively trumpet arrangement and strong backbone beat, their piece, "Sound Down," brought the crowd to life, and was met with fervent applause.

Moving from the big band atmosphere, the showcase shifted once again, this time towards a thunderous display of chaotically organized sound. The four-piece Percussion Ensemble mesmerized the crowd by creating a wealth of noise far grander than their numbers with their selection "Ko-ka-lilimoku."

A performance by the Saxophone Quartet and the Wind Ensemble rounded out the evening's first act, ushering in the intermission, while providing those in attendance a chance to absorb the frantically paced first half of the show with more depth.

The showcase returned from intermission with a rather bizarre choreographed selection by the UMass Flag team. The set involved a man in army fatigues, what appeared to be a baton twirling fairy and a finale that revolved around the unveiling of the American flag. The selection seemed overly ambitious and left many in attendance inquisitively whispering amongst each other. On a night full of unique twist and turns, this twist seemed to be the only to fall flat.

Finally, the show was headlined by an extended performance by the "Pride and Glory of New England," the Minutemen Marching Band. Despite their up-tempo style being at odds with the concert's indoor seated environment, the band brought out a wide variety of selections ranging from delicate renditions of classics, to more upbeat salsa inspired numbers.

The evening ended with the marching band breaking free from the restrictive confines of the stage and flowing out into the aisles of the crowd. Becoming one with the audience, they fittingly enough followed this act of defiance by playing a full hand rendition of Frank Sinatra's classic "My Way."

The band continued from the crowd with the UMass fight song, getting young and old alike off their seats and chanting along with the band, before finally concluding with a drum line outro.

Patrons were greeted upon exiting the Fine Arts Center by members of the marching band, who held doors and thanked those in attendance for spending their evening with them and for their continued support.

With an astounding amount of depth and precision, the Multiband Pops Concert succeeded in tantalizing the senses through motion, sound and time. The selections kept the crowd guessing, and left all in attendance with a brief, yet satisfying, taste of the talent that is ever present at the University and throughout the Pioneer Valley.

With over 150 events held annually, the Multiband Pops Concert proved to be a shining gem for the department of music and dance, and a catalyst for events for the remember of the year.

Sketch 22 will be performing a combination of old and new sketches. Some of the sketches have already been seen this semester in the one show that they have performed. There will be sketches that are several years old but are still remembered and loved by the members of the troop. The set will also include some new sketches that have recently been written but have not been presented yet.

The members of Sketch 22 have also written several sketches especially for Saturday's Halloween show. Danielle Soto, a sophomore who is the director of Sketch 22, is excited for the show.

"We love collaborating with Mission and IWA," she said.

"The audience gets to choose which one of the improvisers will be put to the ultimate test," said Evan Boshi, a senior who is a member of IWA, about IWA's chosen form for Saturday's show.

Boshi is also a performing member of Mission Improvable. Boshi said that their chosen form will definitely be Halloween-themed and that it is not one that the audience has seen yet this year. IWA often experiments with forms that even an audience member who frequents improv shows may not recognize, but will certainly enjoy.

Natalie Baseman, a senior at UMass who is the Chairperson of SVP and producer as well as a performing member of Mission Improvable, said, "There may or may not be doughnuts on strings involved" when asked about Mission Improvable's contribution to Saturday night's show. Mission Improvable will be playing its usual games as well as some that will be more festively themed. Baseman, who also performs in Sketch 22, said that SVP shows are a place "where you can just have fun and laugh. We start off your night right at SVP."

into the second round of the NCAA tournament.

Things haven't been quite as glamorous for the Rams this season, mostly due to their difficult schedule. URI has lost to four teams currently ranked in the Top 25 of the NSCAA/adidas poll.

But the team currently finds itself near the top of the A-10 standings, just as it has at many points throughout the past few seasons.

There's little doubt that UMass coach Sam Koch and the Minutemen are not taking the Rams lightly, even though the Rams have only four wins this season.

But statistically, UMass and URI are very similar, though the Minutemen have a superior defense. The Minutemen have a league-best goals-against average of 0.76, while the Rams rank 10th at 1.49.

On offense, the teams average the same number of goals per game (1.15), but each squad has differing scoring production. The Minutemen sport a balanced attack, with eight different players notching goals this year. On the other hand, the Rams have one forward who accounts for over half of its scoring total.

And that player is none other than the league's leading scorer, senior Lukasz Turnicz.

"He's very good at getting on the end of loose balls and he's pretty good at finishing," Koch said of Turnicz and his eight goals. "He's definitely one person we have to shut down."

In addition, UMass has the challenge of defending midfielder Geoffrey Cameron. Although the senior has played a hand in only three goals this season, he's just one example of how dangerous the Rams can be on offense.

"We have to shut down [Cameron] in the midfield – he's very good with the ball and we have to make sure he doesn't penetrate," Koch said. "He's very tricky and can be very dangerous if you don't keep him in front."

It's likely that the Maroon and White will have to play as well defensively as it did against Saint Louis if the team wants to suppress URI's offensive attack. Koch attributes his team's 1-0 win over the Billikens last Friday to near flawless execution, not some complicated defensive strategy.

"We didn't do anything differently – we just played well as a team," Koch said. "We did a very good job pressuring and covering, and didn't get caught ball watching. As a whole group, we defended very well; they couldn't get through the middle."

Regardless of the inherent implications of facing a regional rival, the outcome of this match will play a significant role in shaping the A-10 standings. UMass, Saint Joseph's and Saint Louis share first place with nine points, while URI is not far behind with seven.

"Our first goal is to make the Atlantic 10 Tournament," Koch said. "This game puts in the driver's seat as far as [qualifying for] the tournament goes with a win, and puts us in the middle of the hunt if we lose. Going 3-1 in the past four games, we're in great shape."

Big A-10 weekend for UM

she split time in net with Jodi Black and Nicole Mercer and finished 6-0 with 33 saves and a 1.46 goals-against average. She was named to the A-10 All-Rookie team and is just the second goalkeeper in school history to receive all-freshman team honors.

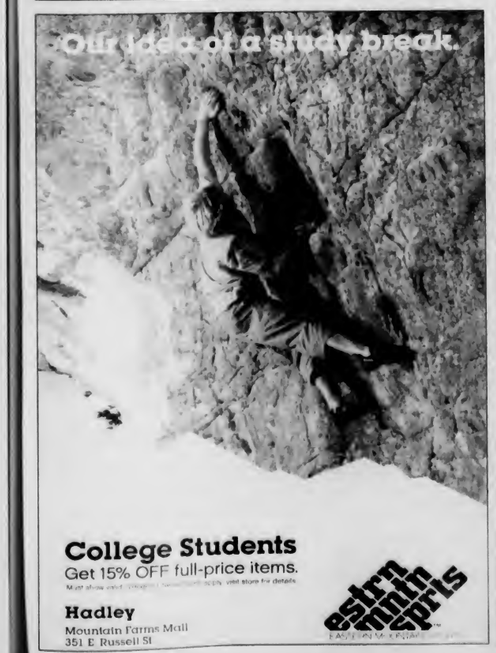
One of Saint Louis's finest players is forward Lissi Winchell. Rudy said she is the Billikens' front-runner and one of the best players in the country. The senior has started 10 of the team's 11 games this season and has amassed a team-leading five goals and two assists.

Julia Bradenburg is another player that has Rudy concerned, describing her as incredibly gifted. In last year's meeting with UMass, she scored the game's lone goal on a laser from 12 yards out to pull Saint Louis ahead from a scoreless tie.

Rudy also specifically mentioned Saint Louis's two wing midfielders, Alyssa Mautz and Kelly Mackerle. Mautz, a freshman, has scored four goals and one assist, while Mackerle, a sophomore, has a pair of goals and assists.

The net minding duties have been divided between freshman Dominique Turk and sophomore Ursula Kosteer. Turk is 2-1 so far with 11 saves and a .688 save percentage.

She has allowed five goals and has a .83 goals-against average. Kosteer is 4-3-1 and has let up 11 goals for a GAA of 1.24. Her 33 saves have earned her a .750 save percentage.



"We're going to fight to survive and try to keep those games as tight and as close as we possibly can and maybe punch a goal here and there because both of those teams are very very good attacking teams," Rudy said.

Head of Fish Regatta provides different test for crew teams

By Corey Michalik
Collegian Staff

The young Massachusetts rowing team heads in the direction of Saratoga, NY this weekend to compete in the 22nd-annual Head of the Fish Regatta.

The two-and-a-half-mile course is co-hosted by the Saratoga Springs Rowing Club and the Saratoga Rowing Association.

This weekend the Minutewomen will compete in the Collegiate Four, Collegiate Lightweight Four, Novice Eight, Open Eight and Open Junior Varsity Eight.

This will be the second time UMass has seen the Saratoga Rowing Association as they met last weekend at the Head of the Charles Regatta.

This course is a half mile shorter than last weekends Head of the Charles Regatta. So the team, which was struggling with endurance and conditioning last weekend, should be able to compensate for their late-race troubles.

The Minutewomen were jumping out to early-race leads and losing substantial seconds from closing boats in the last third of the race.

"We had a lot of speed in the first mile and a half and then the conditioning really showed in the last third of the races," Massachusetts rowing coach Jim Dietz said.

This season the races have had strong starts with weak finishes, according to Dietz.

"The first stage we were leading them by six seconds, then the second stage by nine seconds and then we ended up only up by two seconds," he said. "That is where our conditioning shows. This early burst shows evident strength and power through the first mile and a half but the conditioning cannot carry us through to the end of the races."

Last year's Head of the Fish was quite successful for the Minutewomen as they took first in the Open Eight with a time of 11 minutes and 34.79 seconds.

They took third in the JV eight with 12:23.52, fifth in the novice eight with 13:11.31, third in the lightweight four with 14:10.04 and first in the open four with a time of 13:27.72.

They will look to repeat these first place results while climbing a couple ranks with a younger squad competing this Halloween weekend.

With the shorter course, winning history, successful start to the season and the younger and quicker team, the Minutewomen should perform well this weekend against weaker competition.

Last weekend they were matched up against some of the best in the world. After this meet, only the Dartmouth Novice and the Foot of the Charles Regattas are left before the team begins winter training.

Corey Michalik can be reached at cmichali@student.umass.edu.

Road trip will test endurance

does the game put wear and tear on the players, but also traveling through airports is exhausting.

"At airports, it's hurry up and wait," Rudy said about the airport systems. "You hurry up to get there so you can check in on time so you can get through the security and make sure all your people are good, right place at the right time."

Rudy does credit his players on being mature on the road – he does not have a hard time chasing down players to make sure they get on the plane and they act responsible in public.

On the road the routine for the players is different. They eat meals at different times and they wake up at different times. That is why it is called home-field advantage, but Rudy thinks the players that always stick to a routine have one for the road and one for home.

"It's always hard and then you have a roommate, and is she on the same time frame as you are or is she someone that always gets up at seven no matter what," Rudy said. "I have my own thing. My thing involves getting up, get a cup of coffee and get the newspaper and start the crossword puzzle to get my brain working. I don't want to hear anyone, I want quiet."

The team will arrive at St. Louis Saturday afternoon and check into the hotel. They will not go down to the field, rather they will do some easy stretching at the hotel.

The game starts at 2 p.m., and after the game, the team will shower and jump on the plane. On the way back, they will take two flights, and Rudy thinks they will get back around 1:30 a.m. with no delays.

Pozar, UMass back in action to finish fall season after layoff

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts tennis team travels to Hanover, N.H. for the Big Green Invitational this weekend to wrap up its fall season.

Previously the Minutewomen competed in two other tournaments this fall. The first was the Sept. 15-17 Army Invitational, where the No. 1 doubles team of senior Masha Pozar and freshman Candynce Boney took first place over Rutgers senior Ariela Dujsac and junior Polina Zaretser, 9-8.

Boney and Pozar fell short of another doubles tournament at the Cissy Leary Invitational Sept. 21-23, losing to the Pennsylvania doubles pair senior Julia Koulbitskaya and Ekaterina Kosminskayak, 8-3 in the semifinals.

Three days later, UMass won a 4-3 match over Connecticut that came down to the number one singles match. Pozar once again defeated UConn sophomore Kelley LoRusso in a rematch of last year, as Pozar took advantage of LoRusso's fatigue to win, 6-4, 4-6, 6-0.

In last year's invitational, Pozar lost to Dartmouth sophomore Jesse Adler, 6-4, 6-2, in the quarterfinals. Unlike last year's tournament, the set-up is a mock dual where the weekend is a series of exhibition matches.

The Minutewomen play Dartmouth, Stony Brook and Army. UMass split regular season games last season against two of its opponents for the Invitational, beating the Cadets, 4-3, on March 3 and losing to the Big Green, 4-3, on Feb. 23.

The next chance the Minutewomen have at a regular season rematch will be Army Feb. 24 and Dartmouth Feb 20. UMass already has experience against the Cadets in its invitational where Pozar and Boney routed Michael Tolleton and Charlee Warford, 8-3.

This weekend is the first time this month UMass will play in a competitive match, as it has been practicing against itself since its last match Sept. 26.

"The difference between match play and practice is like night and day," UMass coach Judy Dixon said. "We've been playing matches the past three or four days. There's a huge difference in intensity and in footwork."

The Invitational features nationally ranked Boston College and Syracuse, although the lineups will not necessarily be the same as the regular season.

Even with the relaxed atmosphere, Pozar still expects to be competitive this weekend.

She says this tournament will be the ideal time for her to improve on some of the technical aspects in her game.

"My game depends so much on my balance," Pozar said. "As long as I keep my footwork up, my game is on."

The invitational itself is more flexible than the regular season will be. UMass will carry eight singles matches instead of six and four doubles matches instead of three.

Dixon will use the last exhibition to test out the team's new doubles pairs and figure out how they will fit on the team.

The newest doubles pair is freshmen Kaitlyn Carpenter and Tanisha Hodgson. They have not played much together this fall, so the Invitational will give them a chance to learn to play together before February when the regular season starts.

Once the tournament is over with, the Minutewomen have two weeks off before preparation for the regular season begins. The regular season begins Feb. 1 against Boston College.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill@student.umass.edu.

Senior Masha Pozar leads a young UMass tennis team into the final match of the fall season this weekend in Hanover, N.H. It will be the first match for the Minutewomen over a month.

last game against Dartmouth, each goalkeeper played one half. I etourneau allowed a goal but stopped four shots, while Williams did not face a shot on goal. Sowry has expressed confidence in both goaltenders and feels whoever is tabbed to start will perform well.

The midfield unit has shown a great deal of improvement over the course of the season. That unit's performance has been a key factor in the Minutewomen's return to the postseason.

"In recent weeks Makaela Potts at our center-half position probably had her best game of the year against Dartmouth," Sowry said. "In fact our entire midfield has just been so solid and consistent with Mary Shea, and Erin Parker providing some punch."

Offensively the team has been getting on track, but has been inconsistent, sometimes the team will have a great offensive outburst, but other times they will get frustrated, as was the case against Dartmouth.

"We certainly had our opportunities against Dartmouth," Sowry said. "We became a little bit frustrated and impatient trying to attack the goal rather than sticking to our passing game and trying to move them. We started trying to look for the long ball too much – I don't think that we were ready off the ball."

The game against the Rams will also be key to determining how the teams are seeded in the A-10 tournament. If the Minutewomen win their game against URI and Temple defeats St. Joseph's, UMass will be the second seed and will be matched up against Richmond.

This also occurs if Temple wins and UMass loses. If the Minutewomen win and Temple loses, UMass gets the top seed and Temple drops to fourth – setting up a meeting between the Minutewomen and the Owls. If Both Temple and UMass lose, all four teams in the A-10 tournament will have 5-2 records and then a massive convoluted scenario occurs.

Winning tomorrow will be just the first step toward the team reaching Sowry's goal of making the A-10 finals in just her first year, and she can't wait.

"I'm very excited it's almost tournament time," Sowry said.

Runners excited for big race

Teams head to Philadelphia for conference championship

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts cross country teams are set to take on the rest of the Atlantic 10 Conference tomorrow at the conference championship meet in Philadelphia, Pa.

In the past two years, the progress of all of the teams in the conference has been drastic, making the A-10 one of the most competitive conferences in the Northeast for cross country.

Both UMass teams suffered numerous injuries throughout the season. However, at this point in the season, both teams are starting to find a sense of balance in their lineups.

UMass will be without three of its top five finishers at last year's conference championship. With the emergence of freshman Jeff Hill (two first-place finishes in three career races) and sophomores Nicolai Naranjo and Jonathan Pierce who have combined for five top-five finishes filling the gap isn't a pressing matter.

"Depth is very strong for us," UMass men's coach Ken O'Brien said. "If we can have a day where our top five people can all [step] up their performances as we start this champion-ship season, then I think we can crack the top two teams."

According to the latest A-10 men's cross country coaches' polls, the Minutemen are ranked third in the conference, coming into this weekend's meet.

Both teams (La Salle and Duquesne) ahead of the Maroon and White in the polls have runners who finished ahead of UMass runners at the Paul Short Invitational, the last time that all three teams met in competition.

The overall team consensus is that the course in Philadelphia is a favorite of the Minutemen. It has a multitude of hills with stretches of flatland mixed in.

The team has prepared with an average of 90 miles of running per week, in addition to keeping up with proper dieting.

Senior Joe Czupryna is currently suffering from mononucleosis and will be unable to compete this weekend. With Czupryna and captain Ryan Durkin out due to illness, the eldest Minuteman will be junior co-captain Jesse Regnier.

"We have so many guys that can fill in the gaps," said Regnier. "I don't think that [the personnel losses] will be too much of a problem."

The Minutewomen have also dealt with their share of losses this season. Redshirt freshman Shivi Zan returned from her leg injury to be an immediate force on the team and senior captain Amber Sayer returned last week from an illness.

Freshman Lauren Stocker has also proven to be a mainstay in the team's top rotation of runners. Stocker has competed in every race this season for the Minutewomen, finishing no lower than fourth on the team.

From last year's top-five runners at the conference meet, the Minutewomen only return senior co-captain Christina DeRosa. In last year's race, DeRosa finished in 10th place overall, at a time of 18 minutes, 29.65 seconds.

According to the A-10 women's coaches' polls, the Minutewomen are slated as the ninth-ranked team in the conference.

Women's coach Julie LaFreniere believes that the Maroon and White is a very young team and it will take time for the runners to develop.

"In the future, we obviously will have a lot of depth," LaFreniere said. "Right now, that's not where we're at."

After an impressive race at the Albany Invitational from Zan (17th overall) and Stocker (18th overall), DeRosa, who finished first overall, is encouraged by what she sees from her young teammates.

"Everyone really stepped it up [in Albany] and it's kind of a confidence booster," said DeRosa. "I think that if everyone has the race that they're meant to have, it could be a really good outcome."

The Minutewomen will race at 10:30 a.m. and the men's race will begin at 10:45 a.m.

can do," he said. "Everybody has to be able to contribute in some way in order to do this."

"It's always good to go up against a close competitor, because you never know how intense it's going to get," Swisher added. "It shows us we can't get anything handed to us. We're going to have to work hard to get [to the A-10 Championships]; do what you can to squeeze in as many points as possible."

Both coaches are also looking at this meet to see where some of their top performers in each stroke line up against a well-rounded Army squad.

"I think we can be really strong in the backstroke, [butterfly], and the sprint free[style]," Swisher said. "But they have really good breaststrokers and distance free-stylers, so that's where they'll score points on us."

Newcomb is confident heading into the meet.

"On paper, it's going to be pretty close," Newcomb said. "We match up very well; they've got a couple swimmers that match up well against us, and we've got a couple swimmers that match up very well against them.

"Two years ago was the first time we swam; they beat us in the last relay at their place, and last year we beat them in the last relay here," he added. "That's fully what I expect for the meet this weekend; it's going to be the same thing, going right down to the end."

Playing for more than pride

Minutemen hope to end struggles vs. URI

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This group has accomplished a lot in its three seasons at the University. Among its achievements are a top 25 ranking last season and qualifying for the Atlantic 10 Tournament as sophomores in 2005. But one thing the senior class of the Massachusetts men's soccer team has not done is defeat Rhode Island. The Rams have bested UMass in the last six regular season meetings, including a 2-1 overtime loss last year in Kingston, R.I.

"It would be huge," senior captain Kenny Cook said about the prospect of beating Rhode Island in his senior season. "As long as I've been here, [URI] has been our best rival. If we could get the win this year, it would mean a lot to me and the team."

As both a regional rival and conference foe, there's no question that the Minutemen (8-5-0, 3-1-0 A-10) would take significant pride in a victory over the Rams (4-7-2, 2-1-1 A-10) this Saturday at Rudd Field.

"We know exactly what to expect," Cook said. "We've played these guys before and they have the same core. They're a very good team, but we've been playing well coming into this game. Hopefully we can get the best of them."

And what the Minutemen are expecting is a good team. The Rams are the two-time defending Atlantic 10 Tournament champions. Last season, URI had a player drafted by Major League Soccer after it completed a run

Critical weekend for UMass

Billikens, 49ers await Rudy and Co. in conference play

BY DOMINIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After splitting last weekend's games, the Massachusetts women's soccer team hits the road to face two top-notch Atlantic 10 rivals in Charlotte on Friday and Saint Louis, Sunday.

The 49ers (12-2-1, 7-0-1) are first in the A-10 and the only team without a loss against conference foes, while the Billikens (8-4-2, 5-1-2), have shown dominance on their own turf, boasting a home record of 5-0.

The weekend has UMass (8-4-1, 3-4 A-10) coach Jim Rudy, who keeps losing players to injuries, holding his breath. Seniors Christina Nunes (sprained MCL) and Tina Rodriguez (torn ACL) and sophomore Sydney Stoll (broken collarbone) are done for the year and sophomores Cristina Adams (high ankle sprain), Meghan Gould (concussion) and redshirt senior Kristin Walker (unspecified knee injury) are out indefinitely.

"I just want to get through this weekend without any more injuries and come home with a squad that may be a little deeper and a little more healthy for next weekend (against Richmond and George Washington)," Rudy said.

Charlotte's leading scorer is freshman Whitney Weinraub. The forward has six goals and an assist for 13 points this season. Weinraub was a member of the Olympic Developmental Program (ODP) Regional Pool and was a five-time member of the Eastern Pennsylvania ODP State team. She was also named NSCAA All-Region and All-State and played for Pennsylvania Strikers club team.

The other freshman sweeping Charlotte by storm is midfielder Sam Huecker. In her first year as a collegiate soccer player she is perhaps the most productive 49er, having registered five goals and six assists for 16 points.

One of Charlotte's premier players is Lindsey Ozmek. The "midfield general," as Rudy calls her, has racked up four goals and 11 assists for 19 points. The senior takes all of the team's free kicks and accumulated 58 points last season, the seventh most in school history.

According to Rudy, the 49ers also possess one of the top goalkeepers in the A-10.

Sophomore Lauren Brown has started all 16 games this season, allowing 10 goals and making 51 saves for a .836 save percentage. As a freshman

Travel itinerary a busy one for team

BY STEVE GAMES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's soccer team is hoping to have 11 players who can suit up against two of the top teams in the Atlantic 10 conference. It will be one of the toughest road trips for the Minutewomen – not only are they playing two quality teams, but they travel a far distance over a four-day period.

"We're going on a trip to hell," UMass coach Jim Rudy said on Sunday, after a 2-1 loss to La Salle.

The team left UMass yesterday at 8 a.m. to board a plane at Bradley International Airport. The team will take a direct flight to Charlotte, N.C., jump in the rental vans and immediately drive to the practice field for some training. After a short practice they will finally get to the hotel and relax.

"It's going to be quite a relaxing thing and we're trying to minimize the amount of actual traveling that we're doing," Rudy said. "It's great that we have direct flights considering all the travel we have to do."

The team also has a direct flight to St. Louis, which is about a two-hour flight from Charlotte. This is the last road trip of the regular season; they will play their final games at home the following weekend.

The day of the game Rudy will let the players sleep in late, after waking up at 8 a.m. and and traveling, the players will need to rest. Following a late breakfast, the team will have a meeting where they go over tactics, game plans and the starting lineups. The starting lineup has been a challenge of late with all the injuries to key starters.

Four hours before the game, the players will get suited up before they go over to the field. The game starts at 7 p.m., when the Minutewomen will take on first-place Charlotte. When the game ends, the team will have a post-game meal and head back to the hotel.

"We go back to the hotel and spend the night, [and] then early Saturday morning [we] take the vans back and drop everyone off and fly to St. Louis," Rudy said.

After the two-hour flight Rudy will not have the team train like they did in Charlotte. Not only

Postseason seeding on the line vs. Rams

Regular-season finale for UM

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts field hockey team's season is winding down, and tomorrow they will take on Rhode Island in the final game of the regular season.

The Minutewomen (10-7, 5-1 Atlantic 10) have already clinched a berth into the A-10 tournament, but that does not mean that their game against the Rams (7-8, 1-5 A-10) isn't important. A victory at URI would give UMass a chance to clinch a share of the conference title.

"I think there's a lot of pride on the line now and to get at least a share of the conference title is a notch in our belt," UMass coach Justine Sowry said. "We can make a statement about how far we have come this year compared to the previous year. We will be taking this game very seriously."

Rhode Island may not have an imposing conference record, but it has a legitimate chance to upset the Minutewomen. This will be the first game that UMass has had to play on a grass field, which could slow the pace of the game down and hinder its passing.

Another factor that the Minutewomen will have to overcome is that they are playing on the road against a team holding its senior day. The Minutewomen recently pulled off a monumental upset over Richmond on the Spiders' senior day. UMass should be quite familiar with the emotional lift senior day can provide.

UMass has played superb at home, boasting a 6-2 record at Garber field. But the team is only 4-5 in road games and can't get complacent and look past URI to their opponent in the A-10 tournament.

The Minutewomen will ask their defense to do what it has been doing all season long: shut down the opposition. The backline, anchored by Erin O'Brien, Kristina DelRosario and freshman Jaime Bourazeris has been terrific all season long.

Opposing offenses have averaged only one goal per game against UMass this season, averaging seven shots per game. Sowry mentioned how she felt it allowed a soft goal in its most recent game against Dartmouth, but she has faith that will not happen again.

Sowry has not decided whether Sarah Williams or Becky Letourneau will start in goal. In its Swim teams ready for meet in N.Y.

Swisher returns to school as assistant coach for men's squad

BY SAM EHRLICH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams will take on powerhouse and recent rival Army in dual match play Saturday in West Point, N.Y.

The match came down to the final relay last year for both teams, as the Minutewomen edged the Black Knights, 162-138, while the men's team lost, 155-145.

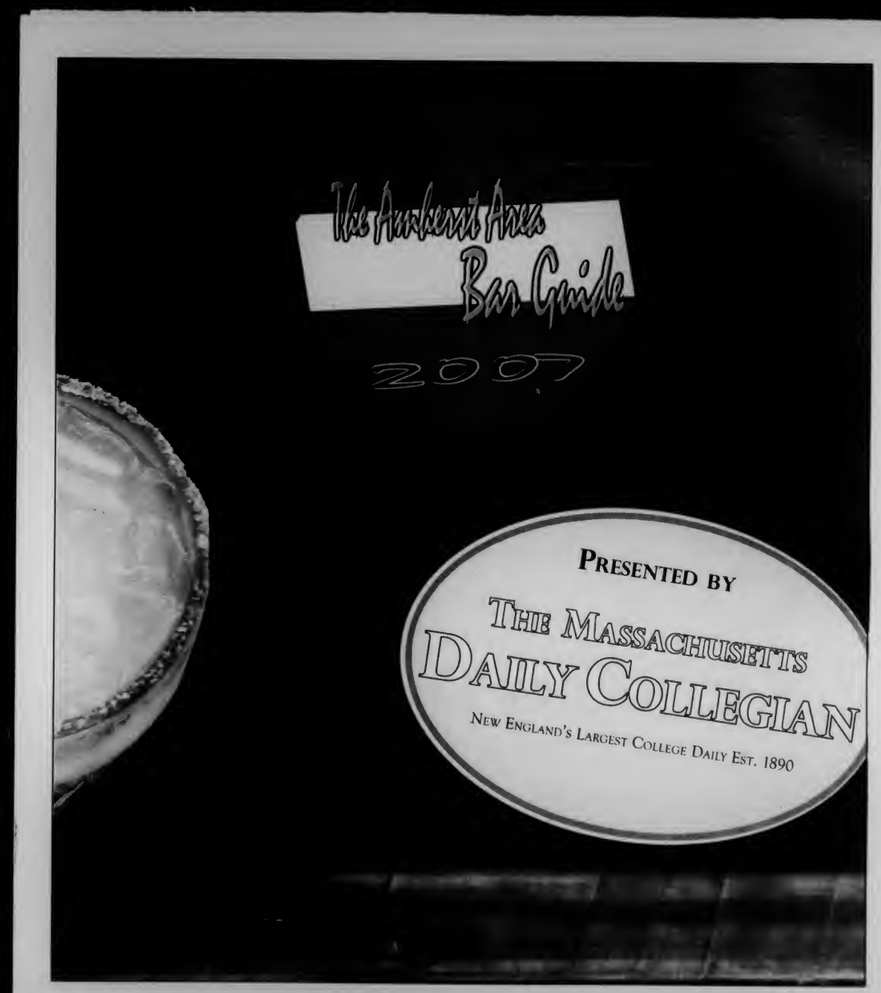
Swimming alumnus Evan Swisher, who starred for the Minutemen during his collegiate career, is now working as an assistant to UMass men's head coach Russ Yarworth. He knows firsthand of the trials that the Black Knights bring to the table.

Swisher missed the first match in his junior year when the men were "absolutely blown out," but he was competing in their close defeat last year.

"I don't think we won a single event [in 2005]; it was kind of embarrassing," Swisher said. "So when they came back my senior year we kind of came back with a vengeance. It came down to the last relay and unfortunately, they had a really strong sprint and touched us out."

Swisher is now training his team for revenge.

"We've only swum against each other for two years, so this is the third one, and we're trying to improve our record against them," he said. "They're a really good team that's right around our level, so it's a really good challenge."



For UMass women's swimming coach Bob Newcomb, the meet this weekend is big, but the focus is still on the main prize – an Atlantic 10 championship.

"We look at this as one of our 'keys,' or goals for this time of year," Newcomb said. "This week, the Terrier Invitational in three weeks, the Rhode Island Invitational, and the Atlantic 10s are kind of the meets I use for different opportunities to observe and see where we are and what we're doing."

Newcomb thinks this meet will prepare the teams for the A-10 Championships, because it's a high-pressure and intense meet.

"I think right now it's the first opportunity for the whole team to have to step up and see what we

This round's on us.

The Amherst bar scene may not be ultra trendy, hip or exclusive, but that's what makes it great. You won't find an $8 beer, long lines or a techno-driven dance scene. Rather, you'll find cheap pitchers, 10-cent wings, Guitar Dudes and the Motown man drumming away all night long. This is Amherst, home of UMass, a school full of blue-collar, hard-working students, and our bar scene reflects just that.

Moral of the story: there is no place like home. The best part of the local bar scene is the people. The bars here are jam-packed with UMass students – I have yet to experience a night out where I don't run into a ton of friends. And I've never had to break the bank in order to get my drink on.

There is something for everyone here. If you feel like kicking back with a good microbrew, shooting some pool and watching the game, the ABC upstairs is your spot. If you want a livelier atmosphere, great music and cheap drinks, try McMurphy's, Charlie's or Delano's. The Spoke might be your spot when you want to hang with a slightly older crowd, as it seems to be a favorite of Amherst locals; however, I'd encourage people who haven't checked out the Spoke to do so their next trip uptown. Maybe you want to get your dance on? The Monkey Bar and the Pub definitely have a club-like atmosphere, sans the techno.

Those looking for a change of scenery would be wise to head to North Amherst to check out the Harp, the best authentic Irish pub in the area. Or if you find yourself down Route 116 in South Amherst, the Moan and Dove offers the best selection of beers in the Pioneer Valley. In addition, Northampton offers a ton of unique bars well worth the trip over the bridge.

Some of the best memories of our lives will be made in these bars. You'll probably forget – or have already forgotten – everything you learned in Psych 100, but I guarantee 20 years from now when you think back on your time here at UMass, you will remember those memorable nights uptown. You'll remember the people you bonded with for no good reason, you'll remember losing your voice singing "Dirty Water" after the Sox won. You'll remember the cheesy pickup lines, buying rounds of shots and ending the night at Antonio's.

Take advantage of all that this area has to offer. Enjoy it while you can, because after you graduate it's much harder to justify hitting the bars on a weeknight.

The Collegian is proud to bring you our second ever Amherst Area Bar Guide. Inside this issue, you will find features on nine of the Collegian's favorite bars. This guide only scratches the surface of what this area has to offer, but keep an eye on our Friday editions for more on the local bar scene.

Cheers, Amherst.

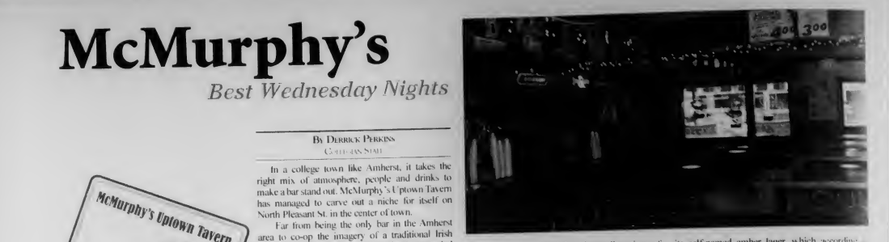
McMurphy's

Best Wednesday Nights

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

In a college town like Amherst, it takes the right mix of atmosphere, people and drinks to make a bar stand out. McMurphy's Uptown Tavern has managed to carve out a niche for itself on North Pleasant St. in the center of town.



Far from being the only bar in the Amherst area to co-op the imagery of a traditional Irish watering hole, McMurphy's has firmly grounded itself in the culture of UMass and the five colleges. Displaying old sports jerseys on the walls and hosting events like last week's "Kegs and Eggs" that coincided with Homecoming Weekend at UMass has helped forge strong underlying connections between the tavern and the surrounding colleges.

"It's pretty crowded," said Reed Powers, a UMass journalism student. "But it's always a good time."

Powers said the usual crowd at McMurphy's is mostly comprised of college kids, describing them as "your typical UMass kids."

"We get everybody," said Matt Sullivan, a McMurphy's bartender of two years and UMass alum. "It's a fun atmosphere with a base of regulars."

According to Sullivan, on an average night the crowd starts to roll in around 10 p.m., filling the upper and lower, called the "dugout," sections of the bar.

Eight strategically placed high-definition televisions give McMurphy's the atmosphere of a sports bar during any game, from the Patriots and Red Sox to UMass athletics. On Wednesday nights, during Keith Kruser and Gerry LaHuer's weekly musical appearance as the Guitar Dudes, finding a table to sit at or a spot along the bar to lean against is no small challenge.

"Usually it's completely packed," said Mike, a UMass student and regular patron who spends at least one night a week in the Uptown Tavern. "Tons of people on any weekend night, from Wednesday to Saturday. [It's] a very big college-aged mixer."

Sullivan began working as a bartender while he was only 20 years of age and had to wait a year until he too was able to order a pitcher at McMurphy's. The Uptown Tavern plays a big role in any student's right of passage to the adult world, according to Sullivan.

"Everybody knows how strict we are with IDs," he said. "So we get a lot of 21st birthdays."

The tap features a wide selection of classic selections. Budweiser, Bud Light, Bud Select and Michelob may be the most popular with the usual McMurphy's crowd, but the tavern also features the Berkshire Beer Company's Steel Rail on tap and the Massachusetts favorite: Samuel Adams.

And of course, no tavern with a name like McMurphy's could ever be without Guinness.

Still, setting itself apart from the average run-of-the-mill college bar, McMurphy's features its self-named amber lager, which according to Sullivan the tavern brews in cooperation with Budweiser.

Described as a light dark beer by Sullivan, the McMurphy's amber is a smooth-crafted and tasteful lager. Not heavily carbonated, it's light bodied and easy to enjoy. Lacking the overpowering taste or bitterness that can sometimes be associated with the typical heavier, darker beers the amber is an excellent alternative to the more popular American brews. With almost no after taste, and the subtle hint of banana, the amber is in no way an acquired taste.

This specialty has only been a fixture at the tavern for the past eight months, Sullivan said, and the bar has always had steady success serving cocktails. The most popular mixed drink, according to Sullivan, is the Grateful Dead, a sweet and deadly combination of five different alcohols.

Beer or hard drinks depends on the crowd, Sullivan said, but the classic pitcher of Bud Light is always the most popular order of the night. McMurphy's sweetens the deal by offering a voucher for a free slice of cheese pizza right next door at Antonio's with every pitcher of the house Beers.

Watching the big game on a high-def TV, munching on a slice of Antonio's pizza and sharing a pitcher of beer is what McMurphy's seems to stand for.

"If I had to sum [McMurphy's] up in one sentence, it's a guaranteed good time," said Sullivan.

The Harp

Best Special Events

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

The moment you step foot into The Harp Irish Pub, you feel welcome. Located in Amherst, this bar has a warm feel with its old wood walls and open spaces. Booths line the wall on the right side and on the left side there is an area with a pool table, jukebox and benches against the wall. The bar is L-shaped and stacked with a variety of drink taps, mixes and bottles.

Behind and above the bar are soccer and rugby jerseys, photographs from the 1920s, 19th century whiskey advertisements, homemade Druid calendars and Irish historical prints.

"The hallmark of an Irish pub is that it's fun and hospitable," said Mark "Harpo" Power, owner of The Harp.

The Harp Irish Pub, as it stands now, opened seven years ago. Before, it was known as Mike's Westview, a legendary UMass bar that held its alcohol license since Prohibition. Power took over the bar and kept the tradition of being a typical Irish pub alive.

"This is the kind of bar that when people find this bar, they go 'This is the bar for me,'" said Power.

It seems pretty normal bar, but through more investigation, several aspects of the Harp stick out. The Harp has an intense beer-on-tap list that includes domestic and microbrew favorites like Harpoon, McMurphy's Irish Stout, Miller Light, Blue Moon, Long Trail IPA, Steel Rail, Paper City IPA and Smithwick's. There are specials are pitchers and pints, like $2 pints or $6.50 pitchers of Narragansett, Honey Brown or Molson. The bar also features wines, mixed drinks and shots, as well as weekly promotions.

A very important aspect of the bar experience is the options that exist for the imminent (and possibly dangerous) drunken munchies. The Harp features an entire menu of delicious options, including Irish nachos, waffle fries with cheese and olives with salsa and sour cream on the side. This dish is the perfect mix of fried potatoes with melted cheese and (optional) olives that quenches even the most intense alcohol-induced hunger. Of course, salsa and sour cream come on the side of the serving, which is big enough to feed two or more people.

One of the major troubles with most bars is that the temperature inside the bar goes up to unbearable heights once the place becomes packed with college students aching for somewhere to stand. There is no where to escape the heat. This is not really an issue at The Harp. They have a huge outdoor porch area with picnic tables where patrons can bring their drinks outside and sit.

On Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, The Harp features live bands.

"It's the last regular music venue for college bands," said Power.

Nationally known indie rock 'n' roll band Apollo Sunshine got its start as The Harp's house band.

Tuesday is a night typically spent doing homework for many college students. But at the Harp it is one of the best nights of the week: Trivia Night. This is where participants form teams of five and flex their knowledge on a variety of topics (with a $5 per person entry fee). The top five teams walk out with a cash prize.

Even if you don't win, the event is worthwhile because after the two-round competition, there is a buffet of free food that has included shepherd's pie, mussels, French fries, pasta salad and meatballs. Plus, it's just a good time, as long as you don't let the competitive aspect get the best of you.

Like any other sports bar, The Harp has big projection TVs set up during sporting events, as well as smaller TVs scattered around the bar. There is one projection set up on the deck out back and one inside the bar. Inside or out, it is the perfect environment to sit with friends, drink some brewskies (or mixed drinks, if you prefer) and enjoy some baseball or Patriots football.

"[The Harp] has a unique atmosphere where when you come here, you feel like home. It is the kind of bar you will look for when you graduate," said Power.

The Moan and Dove

Best Beer Selection

By Katie Huston
Collegian Staff

The Moan and Dove is about three miles south of the main Amherst bar scene, but it feels a world away. A must-try for anyone who's serious about beer or likes to try new things, the bar is a classy yet relaxed hangout for a weekday afternoon, a Friday night, or, well, pretty much anytime.

"It's refreshing for people to come to a place that's not downtown. It's not like a meat market," said general manager Nathan Hobbs. "People meet here. There's a lot of romance around here. I think it has a certain intrigue."

Romance isn't hard to imagine in the dimly-lit bar. Warm orange lamps illuminate deep red walls; candles burn at intervals along the length of the bar and abstract paintings hang above the wooden booths that line the room.

The general environment is relaxed, inclusive and diverse. "We have a really good crowd of regulars here," Hobbs said. The bar draws a solid group of Hampshire students and locals, and lately more U Mass students have been discovering it, according to Hobbs.

"In one booth people are talking Faulkner, and next door to them people are arm wrestling, and in the next booth people are on a date," he said.

In fact, Hobbs believes the bar would be a success even without the beer — its atmosphere is enough to carry it.

"We could be selling [Pabst Blue Ribbon] and bourbon and the place would still be full," he said. "You don't have to listen to the same top 40. You can meet interesting people and not just be a sheep."

The bar is currently ranked the No. 1 place to have a beer in America by beeradvocate.com, and it's been in the top five since it opened in December 2002.

"A lot of people come in and they've fallen in love with it," said Hobbs.

Still, whatever the ranking, the beer is the main attraction. The Moan and Dove carries over 180 bottles and 20 drafts of specialty beer, which are actively updated by staff, based on availability and quality. Expect a wide variety of lagers, beliwe-izens, ales and Belgian-style beers — almost half of the beers are imported, and many come from European microbreweries.

In addition, the bar features two cask beer engines. In England, the first breweries had no refrigeration or artificial carbonation; instead, beer was conditioned in barrels and then pumped out. The cork peg in the beer engine lets in the air, and cask beers are better enjoyed at room temperature. Hobbs calls them "real ale," and the bar begins serving them again in late October.

If you're really serious about beer, you can join the Dove's "Mug Club." "It's a selected list of certain beers we think people should try. Some of them are the greatest beers in the world," Hobbs said.

Once you've tried them all, you get a 26-ounce mug of your own on the wall with a plaque underneath — and whenever you come in, you can buy an entire mug of anything on draft for the pint price.

"It's a really fun way for people to go through and figure out their own palate, and also for us to get to know them," Hobbs said.

To date, about 107 people have finished the list, and several more are close.

The Moan and Dove's staff is another reason to visit. The bartenders are knowledgeable and friendly and get to know their customers.

An evening at the bar can cost you. Beer on draft usually ranges from $5 to $7, and most bottles cost between $4.50 and $7.50, although a few specialty beers can be as much as $50.

"The most expensive beers tend to be rare Belgians that are vintage-aged or simply hard to get," Hobbs said.

Right now, the Moan and Dove's most expensive offering is a Cantillon St. Lamvinus, a Belgian lambic that's fermented with wild yeast and aged in oak barrels for three years. It's $45 for a 750-ml. bottle.

Selling pricey brews, Hobbs says, is not a money-making gimmick; it's for people who are really serious about beer. "You have to know what you're doing — to prove that you'll be able to distinguish between that and another beer — as opposed to just trying to impress your date by buying the most expensive beer on the menu," he said. "I've said no before."

The Moan and Dove also stands out for its regular tastings, at which it features breweries from America and Europe. "You will not see a beer or its brewer in our place simply because it's local," Hobbs said. "It has to be good." Past events have highlighted Stone (San Diego), Dogfish Head (Delaware), Offshore (Martha's Vineyard), Kerkom (Belgium) and Coniston/Ridgeway (England).

The bar sells wine at $5 to $7 a glass, and offers a range of higher-end liquors, such as single-malt scotches, bourbons, gin, rum and vodka, but it's not the place to go for a cosmopolitan.

It doesn't sell food, but customers are more than welcome to bring their own food or order in. The salted shelled peanuts are free and unlimited — and they go great with beer.

"Amherst has lost sight of the bar as community," Hobbs said. "It's not just a place to get wasted."

"Although it's a good place to get wasted," he added with a laugh.

The Moan and Dove is located at 460 West St., on Route 116 between Amherst center and Hampshire College. The bar is open from 3 p.m. to 1 a.m. on weekdays and 1 p.m. to 1 a.m. on weekends.

Amherst Brewing Co.

For the Stiffest Drinks

By Holly Seabury
Collegian Staff

If you're looking for a teeming gathering of college students, then go to any bar in the downtown Amherst chain. If that's not your style, head across the street to the Amherst Brewing Company for a more relaxed, mature atmosphere.

The restaurant is set up with a separate downstairs and upstairs. ABC is the perfect place for a naturally handcrafted beer, good food and socializing.

In the restaurant downstairs, customers have the choice of sitting at the bar or at a table, where they are waited on. The food menu is wide-ranging, from salads to chicken pot pie. The burger and the Honey Pilsner come highly recommended.

Upstairs, ABC only allows in people of legal drinking age. About 10 small tables are set up, as well as a full bar and an additional counter with plenty of seating. The room is clean, cool and carpeted. Customers are not crowding the bar, and instead are sitting down comfortably or playing pool at one of the five tables.

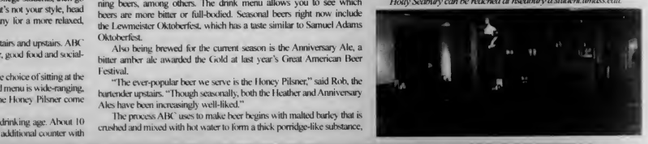
Along with pool, the upstairs offers darts, ping-pong, foosball and a jukebox with a variety of music, including upbeat reggae. Large TVs are set up around the bar, too – a 57-inch in particular is displayed in front of the small area of dining tables where customers can order from a limited food menu that is available until midnight.

Open until 1 a.m., upstairs ABC is "open and fun," said first-time customer Justin MacGregor, a senior at the University of Massachusetts. "The beer is delicious and I didn't have to wait long to get it."

The upstairs is also available to rent for parties and functions. A special party menu offers platters of shrimp, wings, cheese and other appetizers. Reservations can be made for groups of six or more, both downstairs and upstairs.

The beer selection in ABC is excellent. Handcrafted brews such as the popular Two Sisters Imperial Stout, Cascade I.P.A. and the seasonal Heather Ale, made with heather flowers instead of hops, are award-winning beers, among others. The drink menu allows you to see which beers are more bitter or full-bodied. Seasonal beers right now include the Lewmeister Oktoberfest, which has a taste similar to Samuel Adams Oktoberfest.

Also being brewed for the current season is the Anniversary Ale, a bitter amber ale awarded the Gold at last year's Great American Beer Festival.



"The ever-popular beer we serve is the Honey Pilsner," said Rob, the bartender upstairs. "Though seasonally, both the Heather and Anniversary Ales have been increasingly well-liked."

The process ABC uses to make beer begins with malted barley that is crushed and mixed with hot water to form a thick porridge-like substance, according to the brewery's Web site. During this process, fermentable sugars form, making sweet wort that is pumped into the 350-gallon brewing barrel, or brewkettle.

Then, the wort is boiled with hops and produces a balance between bitterness from the hops and sweetness from the malt before it is run through a wort chiller, says the site. The process of fermentation starts when yeast is added and the brew is contained for a certain amount of days. Ale ferments for about seven days while lager beers may take up to six weeks.

If you're not a beer drinker, ABC offers a variety of signature cocktails and hard teas, as well as red and white sangrias. Also available are wines, specialty martinis and margaritas.

Charlie's

Giant Pitchers and Beer Pong

By Justin McGrail
Collegian Staff

Since 1976, Charlie's Tavern has been a mainstay of the bar scene in Amherst. There have only been two changes in ownership in the past 31 years. What some people might not know is that Charlie's was originally a restaurant, but in 1978, the owners extended the bar to its current size. In the past, the bar was a little farther away from the other bars in town, but the extra walking is well worth the trip.

Charlie's is unlike some of the other bars in that the bouncers limit the amount of people they let in to the bar. This means that the people inside aren't shoulder to shoulder and the line to get a drink at isn't at all bad. That's not to say that there are no lines inside at the bar, but they just aren't as long and frustrating as some other places.

The crowd at Charlie's is a bit different. They have more of the older crowd, like 22, 23 and 24-year-olds, so patrons don't have to deal with new 21-year-olds. This creates a relaxed atmosphere where people can see their friends and meet new people without feeling crammed in and unable to move.

Like other bars, Charlie's advertises drink specials, but the one the staff pushes most is the Jim Beam and Coke for only $2.50. They rotate which drinks are on special and have different ways of advertising, but they always have Beam and Coke on sale.

Another thing that sets Charlie's apart from the rest is its Grateful Deads. The Grateful Dead is Charlie's best drink and bar manager Chuck Emma says that they make the best Grateful Deads in town.

Charlie's is also about convenience when serving drinks. They have a special pitcher called "The Tower of Power." A Tower of Power is a giant jug that holds two pitchers of beer. It has a spout at the bottom and sits on a weighted base. These are convenient because someone can buy one tower for the entire table and not have to waste time going back and forth to the bar.

The Tower, originally introduced by the Budweiser distributor, has become quite popular and is also relatively low-priced, depending on what type of beer it is filled with.

The bar also does special events catered to college students. It hosts a monthly Beirut tournament with cash prizes. The winners of the tournament can earn up to $120. The winners also get Charlie's Beirut Championship belts. The most recent tournament was played for charity. There was a local staff sergeant who was killed in Iraq and Charlie's decided to take the money raised for the tournament and give it to his wife. They also do events in partnership with the Hillel House a few times a semester.

Charlie's is also very student-oriented. There are two different groups about the bar on the social networking site Facebook.com, Addicted to Charlie's and Charlie's Beirut League. Addicted to Charlie's keeps members posted on drink specials and other events. Charlie's Beirut League lets members know when the next tournament is taking place, the results of previous tournaments and the rules for playing in the tournament.

The aspect of Charlie's that puts them above the rest is the people that work there. Emma said he enjoys working there. He says the management is great and the other bartenders and bouncers are great to work with.

"We're all friends with each other outside of work. It makes it a lot more fun coming to work," said Emma.

The service of the bartenders is another factor that adds to Charlie's relaxed atmosphere.

"This place is the Cheers of Amherst. You come here for a while and the bartender remembers you, says hi and talks to you," a bar patron said during the interview. "They're not just there to serve you, they're here to have a good time while they're working."

Emma added that most of the customers are regulars because of the bartenders. Remembering names and making small talk helps customers feel welcome. He also said that he sees a lot of the same people playing the Beirut tournaments, for that same reason.

A relaxed atmosphere, friendly bartenders and the best Grateful Deads in town are just some of the reasons that Charlie's has been in Amherst since 1976.

Tunnel Bar

Coolest Atmosphere

By Brad Goudie
Collegian Correspondent

Are you tired of bars packed with rowdy, obnoxious college students and beer-guzzling drunks?

Nestled comfortably below the Union Station Restaurant in Northampton, Mass., the Tunnel Bar was originally built in 1896, allowing passengers to travel between the northbound and southbound boarding platforms of the station above. Today, the Tunnel Bar is the perfect place to relax with good friends and great drinks.

Immediately upon entering the bar, the unique architecture sets the mood: the stone walls and arched brick ceiling, dimly lit track lighting and high-back leather chairs all emphasize the classy, almost romantic atmosphere. Chairs are grouped or paired together around small wooden coffee tables where couples or small parties lean close and hold whispered conversations.

The center of the tunnel opens to reveal the bar. Here, the high wood paneled ceiling gives way to chandeliers, casting just enough light to allow the bartenders to work, the ornate wooden archway and pillars preside over rows of high-class alcohol.

One thing you won't find is a television, providing patrons with a peaceful environment. Shannon Rossi, a junior at Smith College, journeyed to the Tunnel with her friends after a campus masquerade ball was cancelled – they needed a place to avoid the typical crowd where no one wouldn't give their evening gowns a second thought.

"Tonight's a game night, and it's the only place you can go where there isn't a TV on," Rossi said.

Martinis are the house specialty – with over 50 to choose from and starting at $8.50, you are bound to find one that interests you. The bar offers the classic gin or vodka martinis, as well as the standard martini variations such as the cosmopolitan, Manhattan, and gimlet.

For those who crave something a little more wild or different, the Tunnel provides a wide range of specialty martinis, such as the Gone with the Wind, the MI-6, or the blue moon. These drinks cater to a wide range of tastes, mixing vodkas and gins with champagnes, liqueurs or spirits to create sweet, bitter or fruity concoctions. The menu even offers a collection of "dessertinis." Fun, sweet creations like the Hoodsie Cup martini or chocolate martinis that make a great ending to any meal.

If scotch or bourbon is more your style, the Tunnel Bar has a large selection to choose from. Scotches are separated into single or blended styles and further categorized by region; ages range between 6-18 years, and cost between $7-21.

Are you a fan of wine? Rest assured – they have an impressive list of reds, whites and champagnes served by the glass or bottle. Prices can range from $5.75 to $9 a glass, and anywhere between $18 a bottle up to a $260 bottle of chardonnay.

And while there are plenty of domestic, imported and local beers offered, it seems a little out of place – much like ordering a salad at a steak house, you could do it, but you are missing the point at the Tunnel.

If you are inexperienced or daunted by the huge selection, the bartenders are extremely knowledgeable and helpful. The bar manager, Christian Mikula, has been working at the Tunnel for six years and is responsible for the majority of the bar's martinis. After a little questioning, he suggested "Paradise," a piña colada-style martini that went down smooth and altogether too quickly.

The staff was not only helpful, but extremely fast. Even on a busy Friday or Saturday night, service at the bar wasn't longer than six or seven minutes. If you prefer, you can also request a drink from any of the courteous and efficient waitstaff who constantly patrol the bar helping patrons and clearing away empty glasses.

The only real drawbacks are the prices and seating. Drinks are more expensive than you would find at your typical dive bar, but they are reasonably priced given the wide selection of top-shelf spirits. Coupled with the unique atmosphere, near limitless attention to detail, fun clientele, and fantastic drinks, the Tunnel Bar is well worth the extra money. Seating can also be difficult to find on a busy Friday or Saturday night.

Frankly, I'm just glad to escape the Friday night brou-ha-ha.

SuperBowl

Great for an Afternoon Cocktail

By Andrea Murray
Collegian Correspondent

You may remember SouperBowl in downtown Amherst as a cramped yet cozy soup and sandwich café. This year, owners John and Shiang Sobieski have recast it as a bar with an extensive menu – a destination for both food and drink.

When the local couple expanded to a new location a few doors down at 104 North Pleasant St., they decided to expand their food offerings and add a bar with wine, beer and cordials.

"We had been thinking about it, once we expanded, that we wanted to include a beer and wine menu to increase our evening hours," said John.

SouperBowl in downtown Amherst offers local beer and produce whenever possible. Localism helps preserve the environment by being more energy efficient and also strengthens the community by investing in it.

In keeping with the Sobieskis' philosophy, four of the six beers on tap at SouperBowl are from South Deerfield's Berkshire Brewing Company. They have BBC's Gold Spike, a light pale ale; Steel Rail, a mid-range pale ale; Lost Sailor, an Indian pale ale; and Shabadoo, a heavy black and tan beer.

"Golden Spike used to be a summer beer – it became so popular that it is now offered year round," said John.

The other two beers are somewhat local, too; they come from the Harpoon Brewery of Boston. They offer Harpoon's IPA and UFO, a hefeweizen.

The SouperBowl offers a great wine selection, including four white wines such as Gabbiano Pinot Grigio, Five Rivera Chardonnay, Covey Run Sauvignon Blanc and its organic wine, Bonterra Chardonnay. They also offer four red wines, including Stonehaven Shiraz, Five Rivers Merlot, Cuncannon Cabernet Sauvignon and Firesteed Pinot Noir. House wines are available for $4.50 per glass and the other wine ranges from $5.50 to $7.75 for the organic wine.

A new creative bar menu started this month, including chicken and vegetable quesadillas, pulled buffalo chicken with dip, avocado potato skins and calamari. They will also begin to offer cheese and chocolate fondues this week.

The Sobieskis use local produce, when in season, for their soups, sandwiches, paninis and salads. Other offerings include organic coffee, bubble tea and homemade desserts.

"Our desserts are homemade, and a lot of them change according to season," he said. "Now we'll be offering a lot of the pumpkin desserts like pumpkin pie and pumpkin cheesecake, and also apple pie.

"We're [going to] be doing hot and cold local ciders for the season, [and] also bottled hard cider," said John.

The ciders will come from the local Pine Hill Orchards of Colrain. They can make specialty coffees for customers with their offering of organic coffee and selection of cordials in their bar. Their non-alcoholic beverage options include Izze sodas, Infused Water and Nantucket Nectars.

SouperBowl has won The Valley Advocate's reader-voted award "Best Soups of the Valley" for six years and running between 2001 and 2007. It makes six staple soups and six to seven alternating soups daily. Soups are available in their fresh bread bowls or with bread on the side.

"We have a total of about 12 a day. Approximately half are vegetarian," said John.

"Their soups have moments of pure brilliance," a customer remarked.

Other customers said the bubble tea was great as well their wine assortment. The same group of customers praised the service as "friendly."

SouperBowl was re-opened in June this year after its move and remodeling. The move gave the owners a chance to revamp the look. The vibe is more modern and sporty, sticking with a red, black and beech wood theme for the most part. The Sobieskis recently acquired a 70-inch plasma TV. They have both long and small tables so almost any party size can be accommodated.

"We want to add on a few more [TVs], a couple more big ones," said John.

"Our crowd has widened. We have a pretty good mix – a mix of college students, local professionals, local residents, tourists and parents of local students," he said.

Their music works well for all crowds. They stick to a fun classic rock theme, featuring favorites such as Elton John, The Who and The Rolling Stones. The music adds to the casual and relaxed atmosphere.

The SouperBowl is open at 11 a.m., and its bar at 12 p.m., and it closes at 11 p.m. They have future plans to begin accepting credit and debit cards. For now, cash and UMass's Off Campus Meal Plan (OCMP) are accepted.

Best Place to Dance

The Pub

By Sarah Belanger
Collegian Correspondent

In a town where Thursdays are thirstier than the Sahara and the weekend never seems to come soon enough, students flock to the downtown streets, money in their pockets, glee in their hearts. Those blessed with the gift that comes with 21 years, however, may find themselves at a crossroads upon their journey into the alcoholic jungle. Which bar best suits me and my taste buds?

Tucked away in Amherst center lies a hidden treasure, what some might call the college student's Mecca. It's a bar, restaurant and nightclub all rolled into one brick enclave called the Amherst Pub.

With 40 different varieties of domestic and imported beer, and specialty drinks such as freshly squeezed grapefruit juice and vodka, there is no doubt that the Pub will satisfy even the pickiest of connoisseurs.

Family-owned since 1968, the Pub takes pride in its lunch and dinner menu, outstanding service, and community oriented atmosphere. Open seven days a week, the Pub has attracted individuals such as Johnny Carson, Natalie Cole and Mr. Bojangles himself, Bob Dylan.

Keeping its doors open until 1 a.m on Tuesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights, music emanates throughout the Pub, where there is always a DJ mixing crowd favorites. From time to time, Pub owner Aaron Jolly can also be found entertaining bargoers with bands from around the area.

If you plan on adding to your liquid diet, be sure to arrive to the Pub between 11:30 a.m. and 9:30 p.m. when they stop serving the menu. Jolly's recommendation? Try the Pub's famous nachos, or if you're in need of a protein fix, try the spinach and artichoke dip.

While the Pub is not a sports bar, New Englanders can rest assured that the glow of Boston red will never cease to illuminate the faces of customers. If you're a die-hard fan and you're looking for a more sports-oriented atmosphere, try Rafters, also owned by the Jolly family and just a short drive from the Pub.

The Pub is the largest bar in the downtown area, able to host up to 280 people. Thursday nights have proven to be the busiest, attracting a wide array of people from all over the Amherst area. People crowd into the Pub at around 11 on weekend nights, but getting a drink is never a problem. In addition to the main bar area, Jolly has also set up a satellite bar on the other end of the restaurant to ensure speedy service to thirsty customers.

After a long week of work and class, the Pub, conveniently located on East Pleasant Street, will help you unwind, or at least help you forget why you wanted to unwind in the first place.

The Spoke

Best Place You Haven't Tried Yet

By Ryan McAskill
Collegian Staff

There are many places near campus to get a good stiff drink. The Spoke is one that flies under the radar.

Located between The Sub and Pizza and Copycat Print Shop on North Pleasant Street, The Spoke has had "service with a grunt" since it was founded in November of 1984 by UMass alum Myles Washburn.

With a name like The Spoke, the bar does favor bikes, but not the kind you would think. It becomes clear what type of two-wheeled vehicles the Spoke refers to when you see the bicycle hanging from behind the bar. Washburn choose the name because of his love for cycling, something the Delta Chi fraternity member did professionally after graduation.

While The Spoke has gotten away from the cycling theme of the original incarnation, the friendly atmosphere has not gone anywhere.

Based on the name alone, there is a misconception for those who have never been inside that The Spoke is a rough biker bar. While that may be true when looking at some of the customers, it is far from the norm. The Spoke is truly a neighborhood bar and the patrons are mainly of the older variety, made up mainly of locals with some of the college crowd mixed in.

Not chi-chi like Amherst Brewing Company or The Moan and Dove and not quite a "college bar" like McMurphy's and Delano's, The Spoke has carved out a niche all its own.

It offers a laid-back alternative to the typically crowded scene at many of the uptown watering holes. There is a choice to hang off to the side or engage in conversation. It is quite common to walk in and be able to get a drink right away, as the line at the bar, if there even is one, is small. This is something that is not lost on The Spoke's frequent patrons.

"The spoke is a place where you can actually hang out and drink with some buddies," said Alex Follettie, a recent UMass graduate and common drinker at the Spoke. "At most of the places uptown, all you can do is squeeze your way between frat boys and stumbling drunk girls and try your best to find a place to stand with your plastic cup of cheap beer."

Aside from atmosphere, the other big draw of The Spoke is its inexpensive prices. The bar offers bottled beer specials ($2.50 for a 16 oz. Bud Light), $2 beer of the month (currently Busch Light), $5 pitchers, and a $3 drink of the week (currently vodka and tonic). The price is right for any crowd.

If you don't have cash, the friendly and funny barkeeps will turn you away, but don't fret – they will point you to the ATM in the corner.

The bar also features a wide array of vodkas and whiskeys to go along with the beer on tap.

Aside from alcohol, The Spoke also features a pool table with free pool on Monday, darts in the back, jukebox, occasional live music and two flat-screen televisions on either side of the room broadcasting the Red Sox.

There is also currently a contest to come up with a new slogan to put on The Spoke T-shirts to add to the current saying, "What happens here stays here." While not official, one favorite is "Get poked at The Spoke."

One of the few drawbacks to The Spoke is size, but it doesn't seem to bother the regulars. With a couple scattered tables, a counter with stools and the bar, the inside can be cramped, but the outdoor patio/smoking section opens things up. The normally light crowd, however, makes finding a place to sit and hang out easy.

A lack of food options, aside from simple bar snacks like popcorn, peanuts and crackers, can be a turnoff for some people. There is a quick fix to the problem by simply visiting The Sub and Pizza next door before heading for some liquid stimulation.

Regardless of what you're looking for in a bar, The Spoke offers something that the normal crowd doesn't want to lose. As recent UMass graduate and frequent patron of The Spoke George Baroud said, "Give this place a bad review so we can keep it like this."

'Good times never seemed so good'

Boston Red Sox clinch 2007 World Series title in Denver

DENVER (AP) – There's a new monster in baseball, and this one's in Boston, too.

Overwhelming in every way, the Red Sox swept to their second title in four years Sunday night. Jon Lester, Mike Lowell & Co. left little room for drama with a 4-3 win over the Colorado Rockies in Game 4.

Then again, no NL team could have blocked Boston this October.

This was hardly a repeat from 2004, when the Red Sox ended their 86-year championship drought by beating St. Louis. Boston is a major league bully these days, playing in rarefied air before crowds who demand to win.

"It doesn't get old," manager Terry Francona said.

At this rate, New England fans might get spoiled. Francona's team has become a perfect counterpart to coach Bill Belichick's bruisers on the Patriots.

After trailing Cleveland 3-1 in the AL championship series, the Red Sox won seven straight games and won their seventh World Series crown.

The wild-card Rockies, who won a remarkable 21 of 22 games to get this far, were a mere afterthought by the end. Brad Hawpe homered in the seventh inning and Garrett Atkins hit a two-run shot in the eighth that came too late.

"At the end of the day, you look back on the game. How did you execute?" Rockies manager Clint Hurdle said. "They executed better than us all four games."

Lester, undergoing chemotherapy at this time last year for cancer, pitched shutout ball into the sixth inning and Jonathan Papelbon closed with his third save of the Series.

Lowell won the MVP award, though Boston had plenty of candidates – especially in a year in which Japanese stars Daisuke Matsuzaka and Hideki Okajima helped put the world in World Series.

"It took all 25 of us to get the job done," Papelbon said. "It's just phenomenal."

Rookie Jacoby Ellsbury got it started with a leadoff double and, even without big contributions from sluggers Manny Ramirez and David Ortiz, Boston was too good. Bobby Kielty made the most of his first appearance in this Series, connecting for a pinch-hit home run in the eighth.

Coors Field was filled with Red Sox fans, many of them brazenly waving brooms they might have brought from the Green Monster seats at Fenway Park.

The celebrations started early, with converted DH Ortiz raising his hand after a nice scoop at first base, and Lester pumping his fist after a key strikeout.

Jason Varitek caught the final pitch and tucked it in his back pocket as Papelbon threw his glove high in the air after striking out pinch-hitter Seth Smith. The Red Sox spilled out of the dugout to party between the mound and first.

"This team's got a lot of heart," Varitek said. "We worked really hard. We just beat a very, very good team, an excellent team. We had to do the little things."

Crowds gather in SW

Officials say students were 'largely peaceful'

Students, police dressed in riot gear and mounted officials gathered outside Southwest after the World Series game last night.

By Will McGuinness
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts literally punctuated the last pitch of the World Series with fireworks at midnight this morning.

In what has become UMass tradition, approximately 750 to 1,200 students assembled in the Southwest residential area between Berkshire Dining Commons and John Quincy Adams tower in celebration of the hometown team's victory.

A crowd inundated the area with chants of "Yankees Suck!" and "Go Red Sox" as toilet paper flew through the air and brooms were proudly displayed signifying Boston's sweep of the Colorado Rockies in Game 4.

Those gathered were described by University spokesman Ed Blagaszewski as boisterous and largely peaceful.

At approximately 12:45 p.m., University police read the riot act, and a line of more than 30 police officers, including four mounted units and several K-9 officers, acted in decentralizing the crowd from its origin outside Berkshire.

Deputy Chief of Police Patrick Archibald said that no munitions were fired but conflicting eyewitness reports indicate officers fired crowd controlling munitions in an effort to push students from the area.

Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor could be heard loudly advising students that the order to disperse had been given and students should go home.

UMass student and member of the Campus Anti-war Network, Dan Keefe, makes his voice heard at the rally in Boston on Saturday.

UMass students rally against war in Boston

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

In ten major cities across the country last Saturday, hundreds of thousands of war activists came together to voice a single message: the war in Iraq must end.

Rallies and marches were staged on Oct. 27 in Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles, New York City, New Orleans, Orlando, Philadelphia, Salt Lake City, San Francisco and Seattle.

The UMass Amherst chapter of the Campus Anti-war Network (CAN) arranged for chartered buses for student activists to take out to Boston the morning of the rally.

They were met with a strong response from the student body, which made sure that its voice was heard at the rally. The CAN was also a co-sponsor of last Thursday's speech by guest Dahr Jamail, author of "Beyond the Green Zone: Dispatches from an Unembedded Journalist in Occupied Iraq."

"The vast majority of students here on campus are against the war," said UMass CAN member Dan Keefe. "We are demanding an end to funding for the Iraq War. We don't want to attack Iran. We are asking for more support for our communities, and our cities that have gone without, like New Orleans and Minneapolis."

The rally in Boston began at noon, and featured noteworthy speakers including Liam Madden, from Iraq Veterans Against the War.

Madden, who spent time in Iraq along with many others who joined him on stage, recounted the grim realities of life in the country. He read a poem titled "I'd Rather See a Sermon."

"To those who here, whom I'm asking to become leaders," he said, "Our current system is broken, and will not fix itself. The master's tools will not be used to fix the master's house.""

Madden will speak at UMass on Nov. 13.

Other speakers on Saturday included Dahlia Wasfi, an Iraqi-American doctor who was raised in Iraq. Wasfi was born in 1971 to a Jewish mother and an Iraqi father, and spent her childhood under Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq.

Wasfi visited Iraq for three months and, on her return to the United States in Mar 2006, based on her experiences, she has spoken out to end the occupation.

"We must be heard!" screamed Wasfi. "No timetables! Immediate withdrawal!"

The rally also featured speeches from John W. Olsen, President of the Connecticut AFL-CIO, and Boston City Councilor Felix D. Arroyo, who rode into the rally on the back of a red pickup truck mounted with bullhorns.

BASICS increases prog. fees

By Cory Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Students who have to attend the BASICS program at the University of Massachusetts will have to shell out more money to be educated on underage drinking and the consequences of their actions while under the influence.

"There hasn't been a raise in the program [fees] in 10 years and the fee was raised because the program costs more money now," said BASICS program director Diane Fedorchak. "It is a competitive rate to other comparable outside institutions."

Students who get caught drinking illegally on the UMass campus not only get in trouble within their dorms, but also have to attend the alcohol education program for a fee.

The Brief Alcohol Screening and Intervention for College Students program has been at UMass since February, 2006, and up until now the cost for the program was 50 dollars for the first offense and 75 dollars for the second offense.

Now, the cost has risen to 100 dollars for the first offense and 175 dollars for the second offense.

Fedorchak said the hardest part about the program for the students is the cost and she said she tries to get that out of the way first so the students can move forward and be able to learn from the program.

"I was upset about the costs because I didn't have a lot of money at the time, with all of my college expenses," said Matt Smith, a junior at UMass who completed the program. "[I] felt that it was an excessive punishment for a small crime. I think that the students are going to be upset because they need money for more important reasons during college."

Other students who finished the program agreed.

"I think it's a little ridiculous to pay that much and they should definitely not make it higher," said BASICS graduate and sophomore Kelly Urquhart. "I think students will be angry about the higher costs. But what is it going to change? Kids aren't going to stop drinking because they don't want to go to BASICS because it costs too much. It's just another way for the school to get more money because the kids are forced to do it anyways, what choice do they have but to pay?"

Fedorchak said the money goes directly to the program.

Although more costly, BASICS now takes a one-on-one approach with students, which Fedorchak said is much more effective than a lecture or classroom setting.

"I know the program is working," said Fedorchak. "Months later, students will call back to talk about how the program helped them drink more responsibly. This wasn't happening when the program was in classroom format."

After completing BASICS, students can choose to fill out a survey one month after the program and again six months after the program.

If the students take the survey, they are automatically entered into a chance to win an iPod, and every student gets a 20 dollar gift card to either the University Store or to Barnes and Noble.

Surveys are given to see if students have changed their drinking behaviors. This is an indicator of the program's success, and gives BASICS a chance to give back some of the money that students spent to attend the program.

Fedorchak said this is the correct way to get students to learn.

According to Fedorchak, most students who come in are freshmen and sophomores and are students who do not know how to drink responsibly. Her goal, and the goal of the program, is to teach students moderation. She believes cost should not hinder their learning.

Fedorchak understands that college students do drink and party. She wants them to realize through the program when to stop, so an important part of the class is teaching students to know their limit so they don't make the wrong choices while under the influence.

Students are sent to the BASICS program if they break one of the UMass alcohol and drug policies.

Students are sent for underage drinking or possession, open container of alcohol in public space, possession of alcohol in alcohol-free halls and floors, possession of keg or large volume of alcohol, providing alcohol to an underage drinker, possession of alcohol paraphernalia, an unlawful gathering serving alcohol, intoxication, possession of empty alcohol containers or engaging in drinking games, according to the alcohol and drug policies.

Breaking just one or more of these rules results in a mandatory attendance in the BASICS program. If a second violation occurs, students are sent to BASICS II.

Most students who are sent to BASICS do live on campus, but students who live off-campus can also be sent to the program if they are found drinking.

There is also a BASICS program set up for students if they are found with drugs rather than alcohol.

BASICS also works with other UMass outlets on campus that help promote safe drinking. This means the money goes to many different places to promote a healthier student body.

"Mystudentbody.com," a website set up through University Health Services to quiz students on their knowledge of drinking and consequences, works with BASICS.

The freshman class of 2010 was the first class to have to pass the on-line quiz with a score of 80 percent, and it has continued with this year's freshmen.

Fedorchak said that all the programs supporting abstinence from drugs and alcohol or safer drinking work off each other, in hopes to keep the idea of safety in the students' minds while they are drinking.

One of the biggest complaints Fedorchak received from students is that they were sent to the program when they hadn't themselves been drinking, they had just been in the room of people caught or had drinks in the room from a different night.

These are the kids who especially argue about the fees.

Courtesy www.umass.edu

Diane Fedorchak is the director of the alcohol program BASICS.

"9 out of 10 times these are the students who do belong in the program," she said. "We have a chance to educate them on risks and facts before they go too far. They learn how to drink responsibly and take care of themselves."

Fedorchak understands that the increase in cost will anger students but that the overall outcome will outweigh the costs.

BASICS is free for students who decide to go the program on their own.

UM faculty contribute to climate reports

By Jennifer Bergen
Collegian Staff

Four University of Massachusetts faculty members contributed to the climate change reports, which are issued about every six years.

The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) established 19 years ago by the World Meteorological Organization (WMO), two United Nations bodies and the United Nations Environmental Program (UNEP) is the organization who issued these reports.

This year the Nobel Committee granted the IPCC as well as respected environmentalist Al Gore, the 2007 Nobel Peace Prize.

UMass geosciences professor and Director of the Climate System Research Center Raymond S. Bradley contributed to the climate change report, as did political science professor Peter M. Haas, who served as a reviewer of the "synthesis report," which imitates the previous three reports' socio-economic and scientific aspects.

"My initial thought was that participants of the Fourth Assessment were being recognized, but it became clear that the award was going to all participants in the process – from all four assessments," said UMass geosciences associate professor Doug Hardy, another contributor, after hearing the news.

Contributing author to the IPCC's third assessment report and UMass research associate professor, Mathias Vuille, commented on the content of the reports.

"The reports are such divided into three separate parts, which deal with the science behind climate change, its impacts (our vulnerability) and potential response strategies (mitigation), respectively," she said.

"Not only does the IPCC write these climate change reports, they also issue short, easy to read, non-scientific essays for policy makers.

The IPCC does not do any science. Instead, a body of hundreds of scientists from all over the world review already published literature and condense the information into these reports.

All who worked on the climate change reports were pleasantly surprised by the generosity of the Nobel Committee's recognition to all who contributed.

"I felt it was a wonderful recognition of the tremendous amount of work done by hundreds of scientists around the globe over the past two decades" said Vuille. "In many ways it's a victory for all of us who have been attacked over the years by a few climate skeptics and oil industry lobbyists."

UMass students affected by Cali. wildfires

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts sophomore Merritt Cosgrove said last week was one of the scariest moments of her life.

Cosgrove is from San Diego County, a region hit hard by the devastating wildfires. Cosgrove's family had to evacuate their home as the blaze spread last week, grabbing only the most important items in the house.

As the state of California continues to deal with last week's wildfires, students at UMass have been frantically calling and e-mailing friends and family members on the West Coast.

Emergency officials in Southern California are still working to fight the wildfires, which began last week and spread over more than a half-million acres, destroying more than 2,300 structures, including more than 1,790 homes.

UMass students from California had to watch from afar as the fires swept across their home state. As the wildfires spread, Cosgrove's brother called her and told her that her family was evacuating from their home. Cosgrove had to quickly tell her brother which items of hers he should pack away in a box.

"I think that was probably one of the scariest moments of my life," said Cosgrove. "Not being there and just having my brother calling me like that was terrifying. That was a horrible day for me."

Although they had to flee the area because of heavy smoke, Cosgrove said her home wasn't touched by the wildfires. Still, Cosgrove is still trying to deal with the results of the ongoing wildfires.

"When I go back for thanksgiving, it's not going to be the same home I left," she said.

Junior Allen Hsieh grew up in San Diego and waited anxiously last week as a wildfire came dangerously close to his childhood home.

"It got pretty close, it got nerve-rackingly close," said Hsieh. "We were constantly trying to figure out what was going on, because we were on and off the evac list every other day."

The number of deaths directly attributed to the fires officially rose to seven.

Officials confirmed that the flames killed four suspected illegal immigrants whose charred bodies were found near the U.S.-Mexico border on Thursday, said Jose Alvarez, a public information officer for San Diego County emergency services. Identification of the victims was continuing.

Hsieh said his family and friends had to quickly pack up all of their belongings in case an evacuation was ordered for their area. Despite the constant worry, he said none of his acquaintances had to leave their homes, including his family.

"[There was] a lot of everyone calling each other, seeing what's going on, seeing if everyone's safe," said Hsieh. "I kind of want to go home on Thanksgiving just to tour the area."

Cool weather and moisture in the air helped tame the fire yesterday. By late Saturday, more than a dozen blazes were surrounded and containment of nine other blazes ranged from 40 to 97 percent. Fire officials in San Bernardino County said they expected a fire there to be fully contained on Sunday.

"We're due for a change and the weather forecast is going to become warmer and drier," said Chris Caswell with the Orange County Fire Authority. "We're still cautiously optimistic."

Junior Cece Denno is from Tustin, Calif. which is in Orange County. Denno is currently abroad in France and had to communicate with her family through e-mails. Denno said one of the fires spread to the foothills of Tustin, but her home was not affected.

"I first found out about the wildfires from the Internet but I didn't think too much of it because the southland has seen wildfires before," Denno said in an e-mail to The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. "The next day when I was sitting in class, I found an article in the newspaper here in France about how badly the fires had gotten, that's when I realized that these fires were more severe than ones before."

Denno said she was in high school during the last major wildfire in Southern California.

While walking to class that year, Denno said "it started snowing ash and it didn't stop for three days after that. The ash was everywhere and would build up in your lawn and on the windshield of your car."

"I have spoken to a couple friends of mine and I heard that school campuses were closed," Denno added. "I have a friend that goes to school in Riverside County and she said that the fires were surrounding where she was."

As of yesterday, some of the hundreds of thousands of evacuees were being allowed back into their neighborhoods, and shelters were emptying. Qualcomm Stadium in San Diego, which sheltered more than 10,000 people at the height of the evacuations, had just 2,500 people left Thursday morning.

Material from the Associated Press was used in this report.

Eric Athas can be reached at eathas@student.umass.edu

came from eminent historian, and author of "A People's History of the United States," Howard Zinn.

"This government does not speak for us," said Zinn, to a roaring crowd. "We are on our own! Governments have always failed us. They have always represented privilege. Read the Declaration of Independence. 'We the People' have the right to abolish tyrannical governments. You can't have a war on terrorism... War is terrorism. National security? We need health security, and people security."

Arrests occur after Sox win

It took police roughly ten minutes to march from George Washington tower to John F. Kennedy tower.

Many who resisted officers reciprocated each push from the police with "Go Red Sox" as if they were involved in a battle between good and evil. The chant seemingly doubled as a rallying call. Each time the crowd was pushed backwards, students could be heard chanting profanely to officers.

However, they were the minority.

Most involved were by-standers who assembled to witness and not participate in the events.

Archibald could not comment on the number of police called to the scene, but a mix of UMPD, Amherst Police, and Massachusetts State Police were called in. While most officers were dressed in riot gear, many were undercover and others were recording the scene with handheld video cameras.

Archibald said there were six arrests.

Three were arrested for disorderly conduct and three for disorderly conduct and failure to disperse. One medical emergency was reported. The individual was crowd surfing and fell onto the concrete before the call to disperse was issued. Officers promptly pierced the crowd and attended to the injured man, who refused medical treatment.

While police could not comment on the ramifications of the charges, the department's Web site declares under its responsible fan behavior link: "Students who participate in riotous behavior or failed to disperse when ordered will be sanctioned under the Code of Student Conduct. These sanctions ranged from University probation up to and including immediate expulsion from the University."

Archibald could not comment on whether or not the department plans to use the video devices to gather information for further arrests, but UMPD used campus cameras and student pictures from social networking sites such as www.facebook.com and www.myspace.com and the video sharing www.youtube.com to gather information in its investigation of around 57 cases in relation to damage caused by the December 2006 riot in the same location.

In that instance, about 1,000 students flooded Southwest in response to the 28-17 playoff loss of UMass football to Appalachian State.

Unlike 2006, O'Connor described the crowd as calm at the time of the call to disperse. Last night's event resulted in no reported damage in stark contrast to the $100,000 of destruction during the Appalachian State riot.

Hoax box bomb revealed to be visual aide in presentation

By Katie Huston
Collegian Staff

The suspicious device that caused a bomb scare at the University of Massachusetts last Thursday was a student project, according to classmates.

At 5:20 a.m., a custodian discovered an empty 30-rack box with a battery attached to the outside and wires sticking out in room 112 of Bartter Hall.

The box was accompanied by a note that said, "If this is moved it will explode," according to Glenn Ellis, supervisor for buildings and grounds who was on duty that morning.

Ellis immediately evacuated the surrounding buildings. The UMass campus was shut down until 11 a.m. and a state bomb squad was called to evaluate the situation. The W.E.B. DuBois Library was also evacuated.

By 9 a.m., the bomb squad had determined that the device was not a threat, and classes resumed at 11 a.m.

Courtney Ellison, a junior who had class in room 112 late on Wednesday afternoon, said she saw a male classmate bring the box into the room.

"It was a 30-rack of Keystone Light and it was empty. It was in a plastic bag," she said.

Although Ellison left class 15 minutes early, another student, who wished to remain anonymous, said the box was part of the student's presentation.

In the class, "Dean's Book," which is a requirement of the UMass honors college, students read "Terror in the Name of God: Why Religious Militants Kill," and made presentations on subjects relating to the book.

"The kid chose to do chemical weapons," said the Collegian source. "He brought in a 30-rack beer box and a slideshow."

He presented the slideshow and the beer box and explained how easy it was to build a bomb with directions he found on the Internet, she said.

"He showed us the wires that were protruding from the box and said that he followed the instructions, but replaced the explosive materials with water or some such non-lethal substance," said the source.

She also said the presenter expressed concern that the National Security Agency monitors such Web sites and he didn't want to be mistaken for a potential terrorist.

The "bomb" was used in a presentation on Jessica Stern's book.

When the class ended, he left without the box, she said.

Neither of his classmates saw a note with the 30-rack.

"The note 'If this is moved it will explode' throws me for a loop. I never noticed a note anywhere on the box, nor was one referenced by any class members or the teacher," said the source.

The Office of News and Information at UMass has yet to release information regarding the investigation.

Fraternity victim of robbery

By Lisa DeBenedictis
Collegian Staff

Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity was broken into on Friday, Oct. 26.

The Amherst Police Department arrested one suspect, 18-year old Akeem LaValley of Hadley, Massachusetts, who was found with several electronics in his backpack and a wallet that belonged to someone who lives at the fraternity.

The incident occurred at the fraternity house at approximately 12:15 a.m. Friday.

"From what I understand, two or three unidentified males were walking around trying to get in through an open window," said Sigma Phi Epsilon president Matt O'Connor, who was at the house during the time of the break in. "They got inside and were caught in the act of trying to steal items from one of the rooms. The police were called and arrested the individuals."

According to O'Connor, the individuals broke in through the second story window of the house. Upon arriving at the scene, the police detained the suspects and searched the surrounding area.

Officers Richard Maclean, Dominic Corsetti, and Frank Batchelor found and arrested LaValley shortly after, locating him in the wood line behind Olympia Drive in possession of the wallet, laptop computers and video games.

LaValley was arraigned Sunday morning at the Eastern Hampshire District Courthouse. His charges include breaking and entering and larceny from a building.

"One arrest was made in regards to the incident, but it is still under investigation," said Detective Damouras, of the Amherst Police Department.

In regard to the stolen items, O'Connor stated, "As far as I know, all of the items are accounted for, but some are being held by the police. Now, it is just a matter of when we will get them back."

The result of LaValley's arraignment will be determined this morning after the full report is released.

New England, new era

Brad DeFlumeri

The Boston sports scene is in the midst of unprecedented success of historic proportions. Never in its long and sometimes illustrious history has so much gone so right all at once for its beloved professional and college teams. The Boston Red Sox – much to the utter delight of their homegrown nation – may be World Series champions by the time this column prints. In the first three games of their obviously mismatched series against the National League champion Colorado Rockies, the Red Sox outscored their opponent by a remarkable 25-7. In doing so, they have solidified their position atop the pinnacle of professional baseball and most likely engendered enough support from their fans to last them long enough for another 86-year title-free drought.

Meanwhile, the New England Patriots are all but assured of heading into their showdown with the defending Super Bowl champion Indianapolis Colts next week with an unblemished record of 8-0. Randy Moss is having a record-setting season catching perfectly thrown spirals from the superhero-like quarterback Tom Brady, who is a virtual lock for MVP at season's end. Their coach, Bill Belichick, is widely revered in football circles as a strategic genius whose penchant for the analytical side of the game far exceeds that of his peers. And if the glory of Boston's favorite professional teams isn't enough to garner your attention, let's illuminate the meteoric rise of the Boston College Eagles, college football's newest national darling.

BC, after a miraculous last-second victory at Virginia Tech on Thursday night, now sits at 8-0 and possesses their highest-ever national ranking of No. 2, behind perennial college football powerhouse Ohio State. The Eagles finish the season against four very mediocre opponents, all of whom have at least three losses. Should the Eagles win out in the regular season and then beat either Virginia Tech (again) or Virginia in the Atlantic Coast Conference championship game Dec. 1 in Jacksonville, they will play for the national championship in early January in New Orleans. Not even in the glory days of local legend (and former Patriot) Doug Flutie did the Eagles approach such impressive success.

So, as a result of the excellence of the Patriots, Red Sox and Boston College, Boston sports fans could quite plausibly wake up on Monday, Feb. 4, 2008 with the Patriots as Super Bowl champions, the Red Sox as World Series champions, and the Boston College Eagles as national college football champions. Never in the history of American sports has one major metropolitan area experienced such a remarkable feat. It is even anomalously rare for one major media market to accomplish what Boston did in 2004 with the championships of the Red Sox and Patriots.

To add to this general sense of unrelenting optimism now so unavoidable in the Boston sports scene, the Boston Celtics had their busiest off-season in years with the acquisitions of superstars Kevin Garnett and Ray Allen. Sports Illustrated, the most authoritative sports publication in the country, featured the Celtics on the cover of their annual NBA preview edition last week and called for the Celtics to win their first division title in over a decade. Could the Celtics give Boston a candidate for a 4th team championship come NBA playoff time next June? Perhaps.

Conversely, could all of the hope, optimism and exhilaration now emanating from Boston sports fans quickly turn to despair if the Rockies come back to beat the Red Sox and the Colts once again out-gun the Patriots in the playoffs? Certainly.

However, the larger and more significant point about Boston's sports success is that it has united an entire region across socioeconomic lines and ethnic divisions. The bars of Boston, Amherst, Bristol, CT, and nearly every other city across the region will be filled to capacity with enthusiastic Red Sox fans tonight for Game 4 of the World Series. People will be spending money, cheering passionately for their beloved team and enjoying the company of others.

And on so many levels, the appeal and the success of professional sports in the twenty-first century is that it offers us a sensational escape from the sometimes tortuous monotony of our everyday lives of work or school. In this way, even a Yankees and New York Giants fan like myself can appreciate, respect and smile at the historic magic that Boston is currently enjoying.

Tonight, far from the hyper-politicization of the Presidential campaign trail or the slanted coverage of the War in Iraq, teachers, students, doctors, lawyers, busboys, waiters and window-washers all over New England will relax and enjoy a few beers and cheer on the Patriots and Red Sox. Nothing could be more fundamental to us maintaining our sanity, nothing could more inextricably linked to the heart of the sports-loving Boston culture and nothing could be more indispensably American. Boston fans: enjoy the game.

Stephanie McPherson

Robots and androids and A.I., oh my! For years, movies and books have portrayed a future full of artificial intelligence. Robot armies invading our cities. Robot children being adopted. Robot maids keeping everything squared away. All of these stories show this shared society in the distant future. But how distant is it really? We already have the robotic vacuums to clean up our messes and GPS systems to give us exact directions and locations.

But that's not all we have going on in the world of artificial intelligence. In 2000, Honda unveiled a project 20 years in the making. Called Asimo, it is a robot boy who can move much like a human, be it walking, jogging or going up and down stairs. The company even presented him "as a member of the family," according to an article in the Japan Times published five days ago. The article continued to say that the robot was "showing off skills such as kicking a soccer ball and fetching a tray of drinks in response to simulated e-mails from the parents and children."

Also, two years ago, Japanese scientists created an android to look like a human, complete with skin and human-like mannerisms. They called her 'Repliee Q1Expo.'

"She can flutter her eyelids and move her hands like a human. She even appears to breathe," said a July 2005 BBC.com article. The story continues to describe the "female" android and what she is capable of doing, but there was a particular line more haunting than anything else in the article.

"Professor Hiroshi Ishiguro of Osaka University says one day robots could fool us into believing they are human."

They could fool us?

To me, that sentence implies thought, rationality and consciousness. That is a disturbing idea.

Even more disturbing is an article that ran on MSNBC.com earlier this month. The headline was "Sex and marriage with robots? It could happen."

The story goes on to legitimately defend the idea of sex with robots, saying that it might seem geeky at first, but will eventually be accepted. And according to this article, "eventually" is in five years. With the rapid evolution of robots with more motion sensors and human-like appearance, this seems possible, according to David Levy, an artificial intelligence researcher at the University of Maastricht in the Netherlands.

Levy argued that robots could help the lonely find life partners, as the basic reasons for falling in love, such as similar interests and personality, can be programmed. This would allow those with relationship issues, or as Levy less sensitively puts it, those who are "just plain ugly," to have the happiness of a married couple.

Marriage between humans and robots is not the same as interracial or same-sex marriage ... robot-human marriage doesn't make sense.

Levy compares this situation with interracial and same-sex marriages, saying that marriage is evolving, and that this evolution will eventually include robots.

Now, it doesn't matter where you live – South Carolina or Massachusetts – marriage between humans and robots is not the same as interracial or same-sex marriage. Those cases are matters of denial of basic human rights. Robot-human marriage doesn't make sense.

But Artificial Intelligence has been around for a while, and it does follow the evolutionary trend of what is known as a "meme." These memes are anything cultural, including songs, phrases, fashions and technologies, that evolves over time. They do so almost by means of Darwin's natural selection in that, if one meme doesn't catch on, it will die off, while a more successful one will shoot to the heights of popularity and continue to create more cultural phenomenon based off the original.

The ever-more-present robots and other forms of A.I. fall under that category. From animatronics seen in Disney rides, programmed to jump out at tourists on a timed schedule, to AIM "bots" that will chat with people and respond to what they say, to the Repliee Q1Expo, robots and artificial intelligence are following their own evolutionary path alongside the biological creatures of the Earth.

There's no denying that artificial intelligence is a growing trend, and will eventually have to be accepted into mainstream society in some form. But to make A.I. so human-like seems too strange. It is too reminiscent of a science fiction movie. First, a robot husband or wife, then robot teachers. How long until a robot is running the country?

Maybe that's the way nature is heading, though. Maybe this is the next step in the evolutionary process. If so, humans might have to start getting used to a pompous C3PO of our own. Or maybe we'll have to keep an eye on things, lest we find ourselves in our own "I, Robot" situation.

No 'War on Terror' for Turkey

Ted Rogers

In what could quickly become a regular new news segment, the people running the war in Iraq have pissed off yet another one of America's shaky allies. Turkey, one of the few moderate countries in the Middle East, is becoming angry with American politics meddling with their own. Oddly enough, what the Bush administration is trying to do is stop Turkey from going into Iraq to fight known terrorists.

Sounds weird, right? Over the past month Turkish rebels belonging to a terrorist group called PKK have killed 42 Turks, including at least 30 soldiers. Since they base their attacks out of the Kurdish region in Northern Iraq, Turkey has been looking to make a military counter-attack into the region. The Bush administration is seeking to stop this particular battle in the war on terror.

The United States is pressuring Turkey not to make any forays into Kurdish territory out of fear that any attacks will destabilize the region. While the words "stable" and "Iraq" do not seem to mesh at this point in time, the Northern region of Iraq has been giving far less trouble to American troops than any other section. It is this part of Iraq that the administration likes to show off as an area of improved stability. When general Petraeus made his case that the war in Iraq was going well enough to continue, he pointed to Northern Iraq.

So really, the U.S. doesn't want the headache of dealing with more terrorists in Iraq, although that was the original impetus to go. It seems as long as the terrorists are just attacking non-Americans, we can live with it. When questioned on what U.S. forces were going to do in order to curb the dispute, Maj. General Mixon (senior U.S. military commander in Northern Iraq) replied, "absolutely nothing." He has sent no additional troops to the area, nor was he interested in tracking the movements of the group. Iraqi officials, in the meantime, have also refused to give assistance to Turkey, as weak as it may be.

This is stunning to me. The PKK has been classified as a terrorist group by both the U.S. and the European Union. Their official aim is to create a revolutionary Communist state made from parts of Iraq, Iran, Turkey, and Syria. Clearly, this would create an awful lot of instability in the area. And yet the Bush administration and the Iraqi government are trying to halt Turkey's attempts to find and destroy the PKK organization.

The way I see it, this is a disgusting example of politics taking precedence over ideals. When America was still reeling from the consequences of 9/11, not only the Bush administration, but the entire nation made a commitment to wiping terrorist groups off the map. Now, six years later, we are backing out on this promise because we fear it will further hamper some of our own goals.

The way I see it, this is a disgusting example of politics taking precedence over ideals.

What is more shameful is that we are backing out on helping a Middle Eastern country that actually has a commitment to improving relations between the west and the rest of the middle east. Turkey is a blend of middle-eastern religion and culture mixed with western values and politics. Turkey is the only predominantly Islamic country in the region that has an entrenched system of Democracy, and it's one of the few countries in the area that values the role of women in society. As such, America should be doing anything within its reach to preserve Turkey's role of a model Middle Eastern state.

What needs to happen would not be a comfortable situation for the U.S., but it is vital to long term U.S. interests. The Bush administration needs to accept that a gGlobal wwar on tTerror actually involves the globe, not just America. As such, it needs to be accepted that other countries also feel threatened by terrorism, and must take appropriate measures to stop a war in their backyards.

In this situation, the appropriate measure is to aid the Turkish people in their own war against the threat of terrorism. Or, lacking that, at least not trying to outright stop them from defending themselves. As leaders of current Western civilization, we are obligated not only to serve our own interests, but also to help countries with similar goals reach them.

If it is going to fight a Global war against dangerous terrorist groups, the the Bush administration needs to allow Turkey the right to secure itself from the threat of the PKK. We, more than any other country, should understand the tragedies of what happens when terrorists are protected from danger. Now is not the time to back out of a promise to keep the world safe from more attacks.

Rocktoberfest invades Central area hill

Intrepid weather no match for music festival and fans

By Michelle Abbasciano
Collegian Correspondent

With weather threatening to ruin Rocktoberfest this past Saturday on Central Hill, the old adage "the show must go on" was in full force. The sky looked ominous all day, and teased the crowd with pouring rain for a few minutes, stopped, and then started up again soon after. It was like this all day, combined with strong winds and freezing temperatures, but that did not deter the few people who stuck it out to enjoy the show.

The staff members of the Central Area Government helped keep the mood up all day and despite the bleak turnout and gloomy weather, they made sure that everyone in attendance was having a good time.

The show began with openers Leaving London. They did a jam session and played a few instrumental only songs until the appropriate equipment got set up so they could begin their set. They played about five smooth-rock songs that were easy to listen to and were a fun, laidback band.

The next band up, On the Rocks, was a cover band who played mostly '80s and '90s rock songs. They opened with a very fitting song for the occasion, titled "Stormy Saturday." They had a blues-rock sound to them and were also very enjoyable to listen to.

The crowd seemed to really be enjoying their renditions of the songs they played, including, "Sweet Child of Mine," originally by Guns N Roses, "Panama," by Van Halen, and The Allman Brothers' "Whipping Post."

The guitarist and the drummer kept it interesting by switching off on lead vocals, each having completely different sounds to their voices depending on which song they were covering. The crowd enjoyed their set and danced and sang along to all the classics.

Deep Pocket, another rock cover band, put an entertainingly funky spin on the songs they performed. Although their previous lineup consisted of a female lead singer, they have since recruited a new vocalist, Scott Tezlaf, who did a great job leading the band and putting on a good show for the audience considering the recent line-up change.

This change gives the band a completely different sound, but it was still an enjoyable set, and they put on an especially good cover of "Gimme Shelter" by the Rolling Stones.

Although the crowd was still on the small side, there were considerably more people on the hill by the time The After Hour went on. They immediately engaged the crowd by telling everyone to take 10 steps forward, which the crowd obliged to. The lead singer, Matt Benoit, was very energetic and was all smiles throughout the band's set. He seemed genuinely happy to be performing for the crowd and it made for a great performance.

Although the vocals were a bit shaky, the band had good rhythms and the audience was really enjoying their energy and catchy beats. The After Hour is an unsigned band, but they did play a brand new song that they hope to record soon.

As the temperature dropped and the rain continued to pour down, there were only a handful of people left by the time the headlining band, Streamline, came on.

This was unfortunate, as Streamline was the best set of the evening. The smaller crowd didn't phase the band at all. "We'd rather have 20 kids who are into us than 100 who aren't," said guitarist Brad Ourso.

Everyone remaining gave them a loud, appreciative round of applause as they took the stage. The staff members encouraged everyone to stand up to better enjoy their set, as Streamline dove into their first song, "All I Need."

The band, which has a John Mayer-esque sound with more rock rhythms, were really great sports and gave everything they had to put on a good show for

Newest generation of interactive music

MTV Games' 'Rock Band' set to challange 'Guitar Hero'

By Peter Rizzo
Collegian Correspondent

Last week the MTV Games' trailer dropped into campus to give an interactive preview of its latest blockbuster title, "Rock Band." Located in front of the library, the truck was hard to ignore because of blaring rock music and gave lucky students the chance to preview the game. The tour is part of a marketing campaign on campuses across the country.

For those unaware of the video game universe, "Rock Band" promises to be a new entry in the burgeoning interactive music genre for video games, currently ruled over by the "Guitar Hero" franchise. Weighing in at almost 20 pounds, the entire game features two guitars, a drum set and a microphone, all which can be used simultaneously to recreate some of rock music's premier songs.

While on the road, the director of community development Sean Baptiste was able to take talk about the game. Baptiste comes across as a college student on route to see his favorite band. His enthusiasm is apparent and he is quick to talk at length about the game, how "rad" it is and how "wicked stoked" his fellow developers are.

The videogame promises to bring music games to a new level, offering an expansive career mode that throws out all the stops in recreating a real band experience. The four-player mode enables players to play real shows, create their own characters and work their way from city to city in search of virtual stardom.

From these shows, money can be earned to buy equipment for your band or even tattoos for your custom characters. The career mode is so extensive, one might question the advantages to the game over being in a real band.

"[The] bands have been very enthusiastic about the game," said Baptiste, as it gives non-musicians the chance to appreciate the "musical craftsmanship" of the songs.

Despite the optimism that Baptiste and his studio show for the game, it will be hard for the public to avoid comparing the

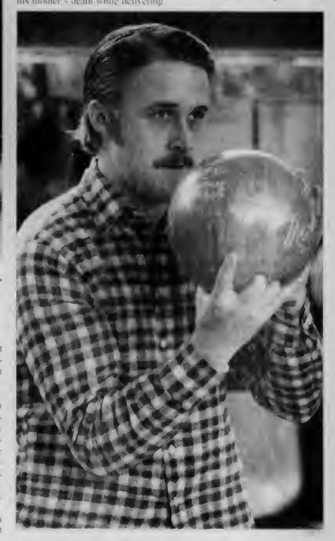
Sex dolls and the people who love them

Gosling stars is new twisted, dark comedy

By Whit McGuinness
Arts & Living Editor



For a movie about a man and his sex doll, "Lars and the Real Girl" is a lot tamer than the others I've seen lately. Audience members who were expecting gross-out and sexually oriented humor were at first sorely disappointed but later pleased with the end result as lead man Ryan Gosling turns in a touching and emotional performance that has audience members feeling for him despite the ridiculous nature of the plot.

Gosling plays Lars Lindstrom, a 27 year-old man whose emotional development is at odds with his physical development. Scarred by his mother's death while delivering him and raised in a house by his single father now incapable of loving, Lars exists in his own world. After his father's death, he and his brother Gus (Paul Schneider), along with his pregnant wife Karin (Emily Mortimer), inherit their father's home. Lars becomes unable to live in the loving environment created by Karin and moves into a room in the garage.

Lars shies away from human touch, which causes him pain and overcompensates by purchasing a life sized doll named Bianca online. Post... she's anatomically correct. However while the film seems destined to end up in the gutter, Lars's deeply religious background and child like composition forbids him to sleep with her until marriage.

Once thought to be simply shy, Lars realizes that his brother now needs serious help. Dr. Dagmar (Patricia Clarkson) is tapped to help but the best advice she can give is to

Intense dialog, strong acting drive play

Amherst student project gets high acclaim for first showing

By Kevin Kolzwara
Collegian Correspondent

The atmosphere was dark at the get-go of the play "The Pillowman," at Amherst College's Holden Theater, with the walls painted black and the lights faded dim. Then the lights dropped and the atmosphere was reflected in Brian Lewis's face and movements as he sat in an interrogation room with nothing but metal surrounding him and an overhanging light to supply light for the set.

Brian Lewis's senior project had its first performance Friday night at the Holden Theatre to a packed house. People were waiting in line to get tickets that were not being used by those who had ordered them. The line inside held more of a mashed potatoes consistency, with people pressed against one another trying to stay warm and not be pushed outside into the chilly Autumn-night air.

Lewis's performance for the packed theater of around 100 was powerful and thrilling. He demanded compassion and understanding all while being quirky and neurotic in his movements. Lewis played the main character Katurian in the play, a fiction writer whose horrific stories are being acted out by someone in town and Katurian is being questioned by two investigators about the events and the relationship between his stories and the murders.

Justin Redfearn (Topulski) and Lisa Smith (Ariel) played the two cops who were on two separate sides of the fence as to how a prisoner should be dealt with and tortured. Both actors gave strong performances that deserved more than recognition in the success in the play. Redfearn's deep voice and soft movements were powerful as he played the "good cop" in the questioning room. Smith was the subject one of the two, the "bad cop," whose constant torture techniques and violent acts showed the power of the totalitarian state under which the play takes place.

Lewis, Redfearn and Smith had a chemistry that was special go with Lars's delusions that plastic Bianca is, in fact, a paralyzed missionary with medical training who speaks little English and met Lars over the Internet.

Dagmar's advice is extended to the small town that embraces Bianca entirely, even Lars's coworker and secret mutual crush Margo (Kelli Garner) understands that only through embracing his temporary sickness and allowing him to separate his imaginary love from the existing love that exists around him can she be with him.

As Lars gradually but subconsciously accepts the efforts of the community, the plot again shifts and the movie becomes truly powerful. Through the imagined love of Bianca, Lars emerges from the garage and begins to participate in his own existence.

The audience members at Amherst Cinema could feel the warmth of the film, a feeling compounded by Director Craig Gillespie's shooting in barren winter scenes and dressing characters in simple, heartland clothing. The absence of the frivolous extras of fashion and scenery exists in stark contrast to the fullness and warmth of the characters.

Gosling delivers a performance that will certainly raise the Academy's collective brow, and Nancy Oliver (Six Feet Under) seems to have written the script with each character in mind. The result is a mix of laughter and sadness that keeps viewers enthralled.

Laughing at the mentally ill is usually reserved for Johnny Knoxville movies, but Lars and the Real Girl will inspire a feeling that the sane can appreciate as well. Leave the gross-out expectations at home and prepare to watch a powerful movie that will leave your popcorn untouched and you lamenting a first love whose existence is plastic but by no means artificial.

Will McGuinness can be reached at wmcginn@gmail.com.

In "Lars and the Real Girl" Ryan Gosling (center) plays a mentally disturbed man who believes the sex doll that he purchased on the Internet is actually a paralyzed missionary he met online. His family and friends, following a therapists orders, play along hoping it will draw him out of his depression.

Time to breakout those rocker dreams

game to its rival, "Guitar Hero III." Set to release one month prior to "Rock Band," "Guitar Hero III" has a few key advantages over "Rock Band" and there is already much debate about the two. "Guitar Hero" has an established following and has even enlisted major stars for support on its newest installment. Both Slash, of Guns 'N Roses, and Tom Morello, of Rage Against the Machine, have signed on to appear in the game, even writing parts exclusively for it.

Even without these differences, "Rock Band's" biggest challenge might be its price tag. "Guitar Hero III" is almost $100 dollars cheaper than "Rock Band," something that is sure to resonate with buyers – especially those living on college budgets. "Rock Band" will retail at $170 dollars and arrive in stores in time for the holiday season on Nov. 20.

When asked about the competition between the two titles, Baptiste was quick to deviate from the question. He seemed all too aware that there would be comparisons between the games, and was eager to stress that it is not a competition.

"The genre has gotten so big I'm sure it can handle multiple titles," he said.

Another question that has not been directly answered is that of the price and how it will affect the game's sales.

"It will be tough," Baptiste said. "I know how hard it is getting even $20 dollars out of my friends." He instead focuses on the fact the game is fun to play and he's confident that once it's played, people will be hooked.

This is one of the driving factors behind the current campus tour. This week, the tour stops at MIT where Baptiste jokes, "there they will probably be more interested in taking apart the guitars." Despite the obstacles, he remains steadfast that once people play the game they will want to buy it. This remains to be seen, but if the enthusiasm that he shows for the game is reflected in the game play, it will surely be an exciting one.

the people who stuck it out until the end. They played a new song titled "Thick and Thin," which had everyone clapping along, and is sure to be another big hit for the band.

Streamline has an interesting blend of guitars, 5-string bass, drums, a 3-tier keyboard and the acoustic guitar along, with the smooth vocals of lead singer Mike Hogan. They played a variety of upbeat songs, some faster, and some more mellow. "Higher," which sounded like a radio hit, was definitely one of the crowd's favorites. It was an energetic song and had the audience moving along, and even had some people taking out their lighters and cell phones to sway with the music.

After Hogan glanced at the full moon he commented that it looked very Halloween-like, and then introduced the next song, a faster, guitar-driven song called "Ghost."

During "The Only Thing That Matters," the band had some brief technical difficulties when the power blew out right in the middle of the song. All their instruments stopped playing and the band froze and looked around at each other. After a quick investigation, and some fiddling around with wires, they got the power back up and finished their song victoriously. UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "[Berry] kills penalties, he's on our power play and he takes a regular shift, so it obviously disrupted a lot of things."

At that point, PC already held a 1-0 lead on a Greg Collins power-play goal at 4:17 goal of the first period. The Minutemen killed off the two-man advantage, but did nothing in the rest of the period. The Friars out-shot UMass, 15-3 in the opening frame.

Nothing really changed for the Minutemen as the game progressed. The game ended with a 35-21 shot advantage for the Friars.

"Providence completely outplayed us in the first half of the game. We were lucky enough through the efforts of a few players, in particular Paul Dainton, to give ourselves a chance to stay in the game," Cahoon said.

The UMass goal came from Burto who poked in a Jordan Virtue rebound moments after setting Virtue up in the slot with a pass from the goal mouth.

Notes

Burto's goal on Friday made him the first UMass player to score two goals this season after 10 players scored UMass's first 10 goals ... Sophomore Dan Meyers missed both game's this weekend and hasn't dressed since the first weekend of the season, he has an injured groin ... Berry's game misconduct was the first for UMass since Feb. 25 of last season when Kevin Jarman went off against Northeastern ... Keane leads UMass with a plus-3 rating.

when seen on the stage. They were flawless in their lines and comfortable with one another on the stage, so much so that they could easily use the direct language of the play, which is very vulgar. The language is important to the overall structure of the play. Nothing was compromised in their styles and each actor challenged the others with a strong performance in the interrogation room.

The interrogations were intense and, strictly speaking, nerve-wracking. The audience was squirming in their seats and then the laughs would come as the uncomfortable atmosphere became too much for the audience. The quirky lines of Lewis and the deep sarcasm of Redfearn displayed in the interrogations helped lighten up the mood for the audience, bringing chuckles and roaring laughter.

The story's deep plot twists allowed for the audience to never feel as though the story was one of a typical movie or play. It had three acts but each one had a cliffhanger for the audience to grab onto, for the hope of the next act. There were no empty seats after any intermission, everyone in the audience made a point to return promptly so the play could start again.

The second act brought in Katurian's brother Michael. Played by John Timothy, Michael is the deranged and damaged older brother who was tortured by his parents for seven years before Katurian rescued him. Timothy's performance is one that brings the play to a harrowing stand still in the realm of darkness.

He is the light at the end of the tunnel. His performance and banter with Katurian brings in a chuckle and compassion from the crowd. His smile is infectious and so innocent that when Lewis is forced to hit him or call him names it is heartbreaking, even though you know it is all out of love.

Director Peter Lobdell and his crew really displayed their influence in the set designs and with the puppets that were as haunting as the play's set. The director and his crew set a mood and the actors fed off it and jumped head first into the material with strong performances.

It's safe to say Brian Lewis's senior project was a success after the standing ovation the actors received on the first night of the performance. The material was great and Martin MacDonagh, the playwright, would have been proud to have seen his play performed so well.

The story for the play "Pillowman" revolves around the interrogation of an fiction author whose horrible tales begin to be acted out in real life.

game as well. At the 14:36 mark of the first period, Berry leveled PC defenseman Mark Fayne from behind. Fayne fell to the ice instantly and officials ejected Berry from the game for hitting from behind. Shorthanded already by an undisclosed injury to sophomore center Brett Watson, the Minutemen now had 11 forwards in uniform for 12 spots.

"It was a stupid penalty and we were already down a few men out of our lineup. It just hurt us tremendously," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "[Berry] kills penalties, he's on our power play and he takes a regular shift, so it obviously disrupted a lot of things."

Fenton, Berry share point duty

sions with the puck allowed him to excel in the role.

The team has struggled to find a replacement for Matheson, electing to try forwards P.J. Fenton and Alex Berry against Providence. Cahoon hopes the pair can develop into the position over time.

"Alex has the big, big shot and that's one reason why we're trying to get him to be comfortable back there but it's a work in progress. P.J. has calmness and a sense to what's going on so he can just quarterback the [power play]."

When Berry was given a 10-minute game misconduct and subsequent ejection for hitting from behind in Friday's game, Cahoon was forced to shuffle his power play lineups further hurting the Minutemen's continuity with the man advantage.

Senior defenseman Mike Kostka, who plays opposite Fenton on the power play, has potential at the position, though he is more of a defensive-minded player. He had two one-timers tipped into the net on power play-type shots over the weekend. Each goal came in an offensive set-run similarly to a power play, though neither goal was with the man advantage.

The Minutemen prefer to keep three forwards on the goalie line on the power play, including one player in front of the net. The unit attempts to move the puck around the zone with the two skaters at the blue line looking for seams in the defense.

The team looks to create space to launch a one-timer and create rebound opportunities. The power-play units also try to catch the goalie out of position by passing to a player on the wing and finishing with a quick wrist shot.

Against Providence goalie Chris Mannix, who rarely leaves his feet while playing a stand-up style in net, this left a large number of rebounds for the Minutemen in front of the net.

Since Mannix relies on positioning to make the majority of his saves, part of the Minuteman gameplan was designed to catch Mannix on the move, especially with the man advantage.

Pair of losses leaves UMass on outside of A-10 playoff picture

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

The weekend proved as tough as Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy expected after the Minutewomen dropped a pair of heartbreakers, losing 2-0 to Saint Louis Sunday and 1-0 to Charlotte Friday.

As a result the Minutewomen (8-6-1, 3-6 Atlantic 10) are out of contention for the A-10 Tournament. The top six teams in the conference qualify for the tournament and UMass sits 10th. But Rudy said if any team was going to knock them out of the postseason prematurely, it was going to be Saint Louis.

"[The Billikens] have a very good starting lineup," said Rudy. "They also have people that come off the bench that are very good, as well."

Rudy said he is nonetheless proud of this squad's gritty performances this weekend, especially after having lost another player to injury. Forward Alyssa Visconti suffered an upper leg muscle pull in the first half of Sunday's game and did not play in the second half.

In the 11th minute the Billikens (10-4-2, 6-1-2 Atlantic 10) put the first point on the scoreboard when Julia Bradenberg fired a shot at UMass goalkeeper Lauren Luckey. St. Louis' Alyssa Mautz gathered the rebound and punched one past Luckey for the game's first goal.

It was Mautz's fifth goal and Bradenberg's second assist of the season.

The teams played 51 minutes of scoreless soccer until Bradenberg recorded a goal of her own just over 15 minutes into the second half.

In the 61st minute, Brandenburg, a freshman, collected a ball, brought it hard down the middle toward the left side and rifled off a shot.

"She came off our right side, she came inside and just hit a rocket in the far right corner and no one was stopping that. You have a pro-level keeper in there she wasn't going to stop it," Rudy said.

"All losses are tough," Rudy said. "But, our kids, they played really hard, they played well. And though we were dominated at times, there were times where we dominated the game."

The game against the Pilots (11-5-2, 5-3-1 A-10) provided a loss that seemed to set the tone for the rest of the weekend.

Again, however, Rudy was pleased by the tenacity his players showed.

"I was very satisfied with our effort and proud of the team considering we were playing the A-10's top team," Rudy said, adding that Charlotte is the conference's only undefeated team and has a lot of depth.

Charlotte's Megan Mannix scored the game's only goal with 43 seconds left in the first half.

She launched a shot toward the UMass net from about 30 yards out. It hit the lower part of the crossbar and deflected off UMass goalkeeper Lauren Luckey.

"The sad thing is to lose on such a fluky goal," Rudy said. "The thing was up in the air forever."

The second half produced a stalemate as neither team registered a tally.

Narus leads UMass to win

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts swimming and diving teams split their respective meets against Army this weekend in West Point, N.Y.

The Minutewomen notched their second dual-meet victory of the season by earning a 164-136 win over the Black Knights and the Minutemen fell to Army's men's squad 165-135.

Junior Christa Narus had a strong day, taking first-place finishes in both the 100- and 200-yard butterfly events. Narus also placed second in the 200-yard freestyle.

Also with a two-win performance was sophomore Elizabeth Walsh, she won both the 100- and 200-yard backstroke events.

The UMass freshmen provided excellent depth in the 100-yard breaststroke event. Jessica Starostelec, Tavis Potter and Meghan Nowak finished in second, third and fourth places.

Second place is an invaluable aspect of swimming that, when bunched together, can overcome a first-place finish by the opposing team. Senior captain Allison Volpe placed second in the 50-yard and 100-yard freestyle.

Senior captain Samantha Demty earned a second-place finish as well, finishing just ahead of Army junior Erin Hanley in the 200-yard individual medley.

In the 200-yard breaststroke, the Maroon and White again showed their depth. Starostelec, junior Jackie Porter, Nowak and sophomore Joan Baltazar took second, third, fourth and fifth places, respectively.

The 200-yard medley relay was also a positive event for the Minutewomen. The winning lane consisted of Walsh, junior Cecelia Jenkins, freshman Katie Inglish and Volpe.

The performance of the Minutewomen pleased UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb. He believes that the team is starting to hit its stride at this point in the long season.

"I think overall that we're getting better at what we're doing," said Newcomb. "We still have a lot of work to do but we took a lot better turns today. [We had] better races, better sets of races. There were a lot of really good things that happened [during the meet] that I think were really positive."

The Minutewomen divers were a major factor in the victory as well. Junior Karen Upperco and freshman Anne Fogerty swept in both the one and three-meter dives. Upperco earned first place in both events, while Fogerty took second. Upperco has swept both diving events in UMass's last two meets.

The majority of the points scored for the Minutemen came from their underclassmen.

Sophomore Juan Moliere placed first in the 50-yard freestyle. In that race, sophomore Nate Bromage scored points for the Maroon and White as well, earning a third-place finish. Bromage also won the 100-yard butterfly event, followed by sophomore Mike Berthaume. Senior captain Zack Priest also scored points in the race, finishing in fourth place.

Berthaume finished first in the 200-yard butterfly event. However, Army equaled Berthaume's point total by taking second, third and fourth place.

The final first place Minuteman finish for the swimmers came from freshman Max Butler, who won the 100-yard butterfly. Sophomores Trevor Ziegler and Andrew Willbrant padded the Maroon and White's point total in the event taking third and fourth places, respectively.

In the men's 200-yard medley relay, UMass took first and third place. Butler, Ziegler, Priest and Moliere were in the winning lane for the Minutemen.

The Black Knights took the top three places in both the 1000-yard freestyle and the 100-yard backstroke.

"We performed OK," said Men's coach Russ Yarworth. "It wasn't one of the sharpest performances that we've had but it's an October meet and I'm pretty satisfied. Obviously I don't like losing but I can see progress being made."

Senior R.J. Rappe is undefeated this season in the one-meter dive and for the second meet in a row, finished first in the three-meter dive, as well.

URI takes over A-10 lead

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Just 41 seconds into the match, it looked like the Massachusetts soccer team had permanently solved its offensive woes. Sophomore forward Bryan Hogan scored the early goal, but it was all of the offense that the Minutemen could muster in a 3-1 loss to Rhode Island on a rainy Saturday at Rudd Field.

The Ram victory extends their dominance over UMass to six straight regular season games and dropped the Minutemen from their former first-place conference standing.

"Everyone wanted to win this game very badly," Hogan said. "Not just because it was a conference game, but because it was Rhode Island."

The Rams dominated time of possession and out-shot UMass 27-3. Spending much of the game on defense, the Minutemen struggled to create consistent scoring chances.

"We didn't play well," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "We got the early goal and then got away from what we were doing well. Give them credit – they were quick to put us under pressure. The way we played made it a lot easier for them to take us out of our game."

The Rams excelled all over the field, especially in their transition from defense to offense. Early in the first half, URI stifled a UMass corner kick, then quickly took the ball down the length of the field and easily created a scoring chance in a matter of seconds.

The combination of a wet field and an emotional game led to a highly physical contest. Koch acknowledged that this type of game does not favor the Minutemen's style.

"They're bigger and stronger than we are," Koch said. "So if you get into a physical tussle, we're not going to fare well against a team as big as they are."

The referee avoided booking players in the match before an escalation in the level of physicality led to a sequence of three yellow cards in four minutes.

"The referee was trying to get control of the game back," Koch said. "It was just unfortunate that it was Hogan who [received the game's fourth caution]. There should have been some cards a lot sooner. And that was a pretty weak card, but [the referee] has to do what he can to control the game."

URI's first goal came on a set piece, setup by a UMass foul approximately 25 yards from the net. Andres Ruiz launched the free kick into the goal's left corner, as redshirt junior goalkeeper Zack Simmons' view was shielded on the play.

But Turnicz's replacement, Greg Balicki, scored the game-winning goal in the 76th minute.

Simmons made an initial save on a shot from midfielder Geoffrey Cameron. Balicki then knocked the rebound into the lower right corner.

As the Minutemen began to press on offense with time running out, it left open opportunities for the counterattack. Rhode Island had several excellent scoring chances, including adding to its lead with eight minutes left.

Now the Minutemen occupy a three-way tie for third place in the A-10 with nine points.

"We know we can win all four of our next games," Hogan said. "I don't think losing the last two is going to change the way we come out and play. It is tough when you beat the No. 12 team in the nation (Saint Louis) and lose to teams that aren't as [highly ranked]."

Even though the Minutemen came up on the short end against their regional rival again, Koch knows it won't be the defining moment of the season.

"I just hope we get a chance to play them in the [Atlantic 10] Tournament," he said.

Lawrence scores three

fumbled the ensuing kickoff, giving the Minutemen possession on the Tribe 22-yard line. UMass quarterback Liam Coen and the offense scored a third straight touchdown four plays later – this time on an 8-yard pass to tight end Ian Jorgensen. The three scores came in just over five minutes.

As it turned out a few minutes later, William & Mary wasn't the only team having trouble holding onto the football.

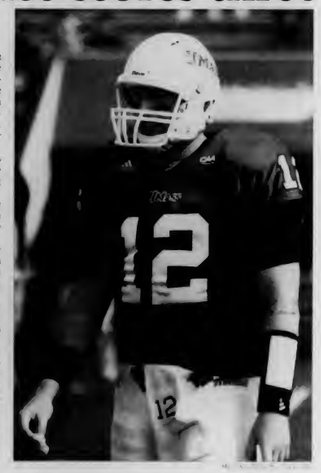
After a three-and-out for the Tribe, UMass got the ball back with a chance to take some time off the clock and put the game away.

But on the second play of the drive, Coen fumbled the exchange on a pitch to Nelson. The ball bounced around before linebacker Michael Pigram scooped it up and ran 42 yards for a touchdown. Suddenly William & Mary was down just 34-31, shifting the momentum back to the Tribe.

Incredibly, the next play from scrimmage was almost identical to the last. This time it was Lawrence who fumbled, and linebacker Josh Rutter picking up the football and running it back to the UMass 2-yard line.

The outcome changed this time, as the Tribe failed to pound the ball into the end zone for the go-ahead score.

After missing his previous four field goal attempts, place-kicker Brian Pate connected from 20 yards out to tie the game at 34 with 7:31 remaining in the fourth quarter.



"Probably the biggest series for our defense for the year," Brown said of the goal-line stand. "When the ball is on the 2-yard line and you make them settle for the field goal. So we don't lose the lead, we keep it in a tie scenario and our offense responded the way they're capable of."

Lawrence led the offense after the big stop, gaining 30 yards on five touches and finding the end zone on a 1-yard run to give the Minutemen a 41-34 lead.

Phillips threw four straight incompletions on the following drive, turning the ball over on downs. Lawrence gained another 22 yards and scored his third touchdown of the afternoon, putting the game away at 48-34 with 35 seconds remaining.

Coen completed 17-of-27 passes and threw for 218 yards and three scores. He connected on two of those scores to Rasheed Rancher including a 60-yard bomb on the game's first play from scrimmage breaking Todd Hankhead's school record for touchdown passes in a career with 52.

Eli Rosenwinkle can be reached at erosenwi@student.umass.edu

Redshirt junior quarterback Liam Coen broke the all-time touchdown pass record with his first quarter TD pass to Rasheed Rancher.

Strong defense leads UM back to top of Atlanic 10 standings

I think the stronger opponents will definitely help us in the long run."

Prior to Saturday's game, UMass had not scored three goals or more since its 4-0 victory over West Chester on Oct. 5.

The offense scored 10 fewer goals this year than they did last year, but its play on both sides of the ball pleased Sowry. She listed Cher King as one of the best defenders on the team. Solid play on the defensive side creates scoring opportunities for the offense.

"We've had a good season so far, so I think that we have a lot of confidence and we'll try to take that into the tournament," said captain Erin O'Brien.

The senior led the defense that's stymied offenses in conference play. Between O'Brien, Kristina DeRosario, Nicole Phelan and Jaime Boutzareris, the defense has limited opponents to two goals against A-10 opponents, these two goals came against conference co-champions Temple in a 2-1 loss on Oct. 12.

With the ability of the defense to transition the ball to the midfield, who in turn relay it to the forwards, the Minutewomen have taken advantage of penalty corners and pressuring defenses to score timely goals.

If UMass can continue this trend and capture their first conference tournament since 2001, they will have completely reversed their misfortunes of 2006.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu

Freshman defender Jaime Boutzareris scored her fourth goal of the season on Saturday as UMass defeated URI 3-0.

Minutewomen win '07 finale

The Minutewomen added the third and final goal when sophomore Christine Rodgers tallied her second goal of the season.

"I think throughout the season I've gained more confidence with getting more playing time. I've had more touches on the ball and I've been able to make my decisions better now," Rodgers said.

One of the biggest challenges the Minutewomen faced was playing on natural grass. UMass is accustomed to playing its games either on artificial turf at Garber Field and other venues or a newer version of turf called FieldTurf.

But URI plays its home games on natural grass, which presents different challenges for each team.

"It's a really different game because of the surface. It's harder to receive it [the ball], they're a lot bouncier," senior captain Erin O'Brien said after the game.

It was the first game that the Maroon and White have played on grass and they adapted and got the win.

UMass coach Justine Sowry added that it was hard for the players to get their footing because of the slickness of the grass.

Senior goalkeeper Becky Letourneau improved her record to 7-7. She was rarely tested but made two important saves to preserve her seventh shutout.

URI was awarded back-to-back penalty corners midway through the first half.

The Rams shot wide on the first one but got the ball on net on their second try. Letourneau came up and made a kick save to clear the ball away. Her second stop came midway through the second half. URI was attacking and brought the ball to the UMass side of the field.

The forwards worked the ball around the circle and tried to shoot to the far side of the goal. Letourneau dove to her right and got her stick on the ball to knock it away.

In the seven conference games played, the Minutewomen earned a 6-1 record and all the wins were shut outs.

Sowry spoke highly of the defensive players, calling them one of the stingiest defenses she has coached.

She also said that the team is excited for the winning season but is looking ahead to the A-10 Tournament this upcoming weekend.

Maroon and White win a wild one

Second half rally led by Lawrence's three TDs

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

WILLIAMSBURG, Va. – If you showed up 16 seconds late, you missed a record-setting touchdown pass.

If you blinked, you missed a fumble returned for a touchdown.

If you made a few quick trips to the restroom, you missed more fumbles and more touchdowns.

And if you skipped the game altogether, you missed one hell of a football game.

W & M	34

The 10,178 fans that showed up in the 80-degree weather were treated to a riveting back-and-forth football game between Massachusetts (7-1, 5-0 Colonial Athletic Association) and William & Mary on Saturday at Zable Stadium. A game with seven lead changes, four missed field goals by one team, 38 points in the fourth quarter and three touchdown drives lasting under a minute.

In the end, almost all of the fans went home unhappy as the Minutemen prevailed, 48-34, in front of a raucous homecoming crowd.

"I'll be honest, I thought William & Mary came out and played as well as they possibly could play," UMass coach Don Brown said. "Everybody had a chip in [the victory]. I was really happy with our guys and the way they battled back from adversity."

UMass running back Matt Lawrence scored two touchdowns in the final 3:46 of the game, putting the Minutemen ahead for good. The senior ran for a career-high 186 yards – 126 in the second half – and three touchdowns.

William & Mary (4-4, 2-3 CAA) led at halftime, 13-10, and extended the lead to 10 with a 1-yard touchdown run by quarterback Jake Phillips midway through the third quarter. That was just the beginning of a furious pace of touchdowns, fumbles, lead-changes and everything in between.

Lawrence scored his first touchdown five minutes later from 11 yards out, cutting the deficit to three. The Tribe gave the ball right back to the Minutemen, fumbling the ball on a 7-yard completion to tight end Drew Atchison. Linebacker Josh Jennings hit Atchison just as he caught the ball, forcing it out and into the arms of Brian Ellis.

After a 25-yard run by Lawrence, backup tailback Tony Nelson scored his first touchdown of the season on a 13-yard run, giving the Minutemen a 27-24 lead. It was the fifth lead change of the game and third UMass touchdown drive spanning under a minute long.

In a 3 minute, 7 second span, the Tribe lost an 11-point lead and trailed by three. It was about to get worse in a matter of seconds.

Late goal helps Friars steal Hockey East point

Lecomte's goal not enough for Mass Attack

Freshman goaltender Paul Dainton had no idea where the puck was.

A herd stood in his crease, anxiously swinging sticks and gloves at the puck, trying to make the game's decisive play. Providence freshman Matt Taormina made that play, knocking the airborne puck past Dainton to tie the game, 3-3, with six seconds remaining in regulation.

Overtime decided nothing, and the Massachusetts hockey team (2-2-2, 0-1-2 Hockey East) drew a tie with the Friars a night after PC upended the Minutemen, 3-1, in Providence, R.I.

UMass hosts Merrimack on Saturday in hopes of winning its first Hockey East game of the season.

Dainton made 25 saves in the draw, including three in overtime to preserve the point for the Minutemen in the Hockey East standings. He also made 33 Friday night despite the loss.

"It's very frustrating not coming away with the win. Especially [Saturday], we out-shot, out-chanced [Providence], we just need to finish them off," Dainton said. "Providence is a very competitive team. It was a good job on [its] part to battle back, but that's no excuse. We have to finish those guys off."

UMass lost two one-goal leads on Saturday night's game, including the 3-2 lead it took when freshman Michael Lecomte beat PC net minder Chris Mannix at 18:55 of the third period.

Lecomte, the center on the Minutemen's second power-play unit, entered the faceoff circle against PC center Nick Mazzolini to the left of the Friar goal. Lecomte won the puck back to senior winger Matt Bario. Bario chipped the puck through a Friar penalty killer to Lecomte who moved in alone on Mannix.

Mannix went down to force Lecomte to make a move and he did, dangling around him and sliding the puck into the low right corner of the goal; the goal was the first of Lecomte's career.

Senior defender Mike Kostka had two assists for the Minutemen. Their first two goals were both the products of Kostka shots from the point. Freshman Brian Keane sat in slot and got a stick on a wrist shot to tie the game at 1. Sophomore winger Will Ortiz scored on a nearly identical play to give UMass a 2-1 lead at 5:53 of the third period.

Before Keane's goal and with the score 1-0 in favor of PC, junior Alex Berry missed a wide open net after stickhandling around Mannix. Freshman James Marcou set the play up by attacking the net and leaving the puck for Berry who caught it on his forehand.

Inconsistent power play hurts Minutemen

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In organized hockey, there's a general correlation between power-play goals and wins.

As the Massachusetts hockey team made its run to the NCAA Tournament last season, the Minutemen consistently scored with the man advantage.

And as the team dropped three points to Providence over the weekend, it scored on one of its 11 power-play chances.

"We're really inconsistent in terms of the shape we try to create and some of the support we demand on it," UMass coach Don Cahoon said of his team's power play. "Sometimes we're pretty good with it, and other times we're not. Sometimes we do things pretty well, then get away from it."

Cahoon uses two primary power-play units and tries to find a mixture of size and quickness with each group. The top unit pairs centerman Cory Quirk with 6-foot-2 Chase Langeraap and the speedy James Marcou.

Cahoon believes his players can succeed on the power play and that they simply need more experience playing together to establish the decision making and fluidity of an efficient unit.

"The issue with the power play is just the personnel learning to coordinate themselves, and not so much the personnel," Cahoon said.

At several points during the Minutemen's 22 minutes on the power play over the weekend, the team struggled to find seams, passing the puck around multiple times before taking a shot.

When teams are too patient and timid with the man advantage, they are more likely to lose possession or become frustrated and force a shot.

Yet regardless of who is on the ice, the point man – the skater on the blue line directing the power play – is the most important piece.

Last season, the Minutemen had a player in Mark Matheson who was ideal for the position. His ice vision and ability to make quick and smart deci-

Minutewomen beat URI, share A-10 crown

KINGSTON, R.I. – The Massachusetts field hockey team traveled to Kingston, R.I. to take on Rhode Island Saturday and came back to Amherst with a 3-0 win.

UMass (11-8, 6-1 A-10) ended its season on a high note with the win and have positive momentum heading into the Atlantic 10 Tournament. The Minutewomen face Richmond in the first round, a team they beat on Senior Day at Garber Field Oct. 21.

There were a variety of outside factors that UMass overcame. First, the game started late because the officials were not on time for the start.

Second, it was Rhode Island's Senior Day so the Rams (7-9, 1-6 A-10) were on an emotional high. Finally, UMass was playing on a surface that it is not accustomed to, natural grass.

With all of these things working against them, the Maroon and White played hard and earned a victory.

The scoring started when senior Kara Murphy worked the ball into the circle and fired it into a crowd of players. The ball found its way into the back of the net after bouncing off a defender's stick.

UMass struck early in the second half when it won a penalty corner. The ball was inserted and Kristina DeRosario took a shot on net. The shot was off target, but freshman Jamie Bourazeris redirected the shot to beat URI goalie M.J. Britt and give UMass the 2-0 lead.

KINGSTON, R.I. – Just one year ago, M.J. Britt made 14 saves in the season finale against the Massachusetts field hockey team, who left Garber Field one conference win shy of qualifying for the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

Saturday the Minutewomen traveled to Rhode Island, and though they had already qualified for the A-10 Tournament, there was plenty of motivation to win – a chance to share the regular season conference crown with Temple, and to avenge last year's season-ending loss.

Britt couldn't save URI this time, and the Minutewomen dominated play while beating the senior goalkeeper three times.

The team's conference play in 2006 and 2007 is drastically different, and the results from two season finales with URI perfectly illustrate the struggles from a year ago and the current success of this year.

The win was the sixth in seven conference games for UMass, and it heads into the tournament with familiarity of conference opponents, including a first round matchup with Richmond. UMass defeated the Spiders 1-0 on Oct. 21, and Richmond will be looking to defend the conference title for the sixth consecutive year.

From Oct. 14 to Oct. 21, UMass won three consecutive 1-0 games, two of which came on the road. Last year it lost three one-goal games. The Maroon and White also significantly improved upon its conference home record last season – it went from 1-4 in 2006 to 4-0 in 2007.

Despite their success in A-10 play, the Minutewomen finished the season 5-7 in non-conference play. If they can win two tournament games, they will qualify for the NCAA Division 1 Field Hockey Tournament and face other non-conference teams.

Senior back Erin O'Brien and the Minutewomen defeated Rhode Island on Saturday.

"We actually have a pretty tough schedule in non-conference," UMass coach Justine Sowry said. "I'm going to try and do that every year, to play quality opponents because that's where we want to be. I think even though the wins and losses might be a little bit more lopsided, ultimately it's better for conference play.

Amherst professor lectures

BY BEN WILLIAMS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Amherst College professor N. Gordon Levin thinks there are still a number of obstacles blocking peace in the Middle East that aren't going away anytime soon.

Levin, who spoke at the Jewish Community of Amherst Sunday to a gathering of community members, addressed some of the major problems that need to be overcome before any sort of peace agreement between Israel and Palestine can occur.

Levin cited the fact that there is a very powerful right wing in Israel today.

Although only a small minority of Palestinian factions are violent, the right wing opposes peace talks and doesn't recognize any Palestinian settlement as legal. They also seize upon Palestinian violence as proof that the Oslo accords, the most serious attempts at peace in the region, will never work.

What makes the powerful right wing in Israel more of a problem, said Levin, is the weakness of the

Rioting not an issue after Sox win

Police and students keep calm after game

BY KRISTEN HEALY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Celebratory chants and shouts could be heard from the Southwest Residential Area as soon as the Boston Red Sox clinched the World Series win Sunday night.

Crowds started gathering around 12:10 a.m. immediately following the game and many students wondered if the University of Massachusetts would live up to its reputation for rioting once again.

Being a school that has been known to riot in the past, especially when the Red Sox have been in the playoffs, the UMass Police Department was not taking any chances. Groups of officers both on foot and on horse were waiting outside Berkshire Dining Hall and the horseshoe for when students filed out of their buildings after the game.

Many students agreed that even the presence of the police and riot officers made them think twice about engaging in any violent or destructive behavior.

Sophomore Kelly Fantasia said, "the reason why students started running into their buildings and away from the crowds was because a group of riot police started walking toward them. Even those that were just watching and not involved in the actual crowd left quickly as police started to approach."

Many students agreed that had the police not been present, the celebrations probably would have gotten more out of hand. Only one student seemed to have gotten mildly injured after being dropped while crowd-surfing. Onlookers said that students holding

ISOM and Celtics honor leaders

BY JOSH WALOVITCH

The Isenberg School of Management at the University of Massachusetts, along with the Boston Celtics, will honor men of color who are contributing to children's lives in the community of Springfield, Massachusetts.

The community leaders will be honored at halftime on Dec. 12, when the Boston Celtics take on the Sacramento Kings.

The original idea for the "Key Players Project" was developed by UMass associate professor Todd Crosset, who works in the Department of Sport Management in ISOM along with UMass alumnus and Springfield native Wayne Levy, the Community Relations Director of the Boston Celtics.

Their project is a community service learning collaboration that was developed in 2002 with an objective to recognize the thoughtful and caring devotion to the youth done by men of color in the Springfield community.

"They are having an impact on young people," said UMass senior Sarah Hurd, who is involved in the project. "And this class not only benefits them and the people in the community as they are honored for their good deeds, but it also benefits our class as we are getting firsthand experience in the community relations career, and helping others through community building."

"We are participating in and controlling the entire process of the marketing, receiving nominations and recognizing these 'ambassadors' or 'key players' in the community," she added.

Hurd, along with 15 other students, were assembled into different teams to work on different aspects of the project. One team is responsible for the social marketing – working on the television commercial – while other groups are responsible for event management, media relations, sponsorship and finance.

"The Key Players Project not only lets us recognize the great work being done in the communities by men of color, but it also allows us to get involved personally," Hurd said. "Although we aren't having the same impact on these children's lives as the ambassadors, we are making a difference through our volunteer work in the various community centers through helping kids with homework and providing them with someone to talk to. While our whole goal is to reverse the negative associations people have, we are also increasing the awareness and importance of utilizing these men as community assets."

Each student will devote 30 hours of volunteer service by working with children at schools and community centers. Nominations are made by youths in the community who are influenced by a peer. Hundreds of nominations are made but only ten are chosen to be involved with the ceremony.

"The Key Players halftime ceremony is very important to the Celtics organization each year because it allows us to celebrate the achievements and impact of men of color in the Springfield community," said Matt Meyerson, director of Community Relations for the Celtics. "It is great to give our fans the opportunity to celebrate the Key Players every season."

Springfield, a town of over 150,000 people, has a violent crime rate that is over three times the national average along with a property crime rate that is close to two times the national average.

Red Sox/Halloween weekend keeps Amherst Police busy

DANIELLE KAHN/COLLEGIAN

The Amherst Police Department kept busy over this past weekend with 138 calls made for offenses ranging from fights to property-related crimes.

Of all of these calls, 27 arrests were made. Offenses included breaking and entering, alcohol-related crimes and disorderly conduct. Still, according to the detective bureau at APD, it was just another weekend.

"It wasn't that abnormal. It was a combination of the Red Sox and Halloween, but there have been weekends that were worse. It's hard to say," said Detective Knighdy.

The Code of Student Conduct at the University of Massachusetts makes it very clear that violators of the law will not just suffer at the state's hands. Any type of physical assault, improper use or underage possession of drugs and alcohol, and willful interruption or disturbance of day-to-day conduct can, and most likely will, result in a hearing at UMass.

Hearings involve a board of UMass professors and or students who decide what the accused student's future at UMass contains, or doesn't contain for some, as these hearings can lead to expulsion, suspension, University probation, housing relocation, housing probation, University reprimand, restitution or fines.

Black Student Union hosts lecture on interracial marriage

BY GISSE SAILLANT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's been nearly 40 years since the Supreme Court struck down the anti-miscegenation laws in the United States that didn't allow individuals from different racial backgrounds to marry.

Last Thursday, in the crowded Malcolm X center at the University of Massachusetts, the Black Student Union hosted "Real Talk Interracial Dating." In an open forum, attendees were encouraged to speak as to whether or not interracial dating is still viewed as taboo.

The BSU introduced the discussion by playing a short DVD in which UMass students were interviewed on campus about their opinions on interracial dating. This video helped the students feel more at ease, as they were advised by secretary of the BSU Mohamed Vandi to "Keep it real, no matter how controversial."

Students brought up the fact that their hometowns disapprove of interracial dating. The forum discussed that living in a place that disapproves of interracial dating will decrease the chance at such a relationship to flourish.

"Assata stick with the brown. Assata is a continent and we are all different," said Catherine Ileng. "Even if I bring [home] a Vietnamese person it would be a problem."

UMass senior Leeja Powell describes a unique understanding between two people of the same race.

"It's easier to be with your own because you experience the same racial problems," said Powell.

"[They] can emphasize but can't relate," said Shassa Smallwood, a senior.

Sophomore Meskerem Mehari responded to Smallwood's comment by clarifying that a person who is not African American would have a difficult time understanding her.

"White people will never be black," she said.

According to the forum, the convergence of two distinct cultures carries as much controversy as an interracial relationship. An individual's ethnicity is instantly removed in the binary racial system America has.

"My parents are from Haiti but since I'm here, I'm considered African-American," said Michelle Dalzon, a sophomore.

Another student responded that "if we don't allow ourselves to be open then people from other racial backgrounds would never relate."

One student defended the argument that race doesn't matter. It is common experiences that bring people together.

"I was trying to promote interracial relationships, but I was promoting my experiences," said Phebee Belacy, a sophomore. "If you give too much power to your skin color, you limit yourself."

The BSU hosts a talk once a month.

"We usually ask around on what topics interest them. Interracial dating was one of them," said Chantelle Ransome, vice president of BSU.

Israeli–Palestinian conflict still at large

The left wing Kadima party supports fairly extreme policies that Levin thinks could only have worked with the Prime Minister Ariel Sharon – now in a coma – in power.

Levin also said, in the same sense of the term "only Nixon could go to China," only Sharon's weight and personal diplomacy could have caused the kind of change the Kadima party wants.

Levin said the only other Centrist party, Labor, is split between left and right leaning members, and the commitment for peace just isn't there.

Besides the political problems on the Israeli side, the Palestinian side of the peace process is hindered by the Hamas control of the Gaza Strip, an important area in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Hamas is considered a terrorist organization by the United Nations, and opposes the existence of Israel.

Levin said as long as Hamas is in power it can veto any move toward peace – through its political control or through the use of violence.

Even if we could forget these political problems, Levin said, there is still the issues of Palestinian refugees from Israel, who now number about 3.5 million.

While these refugees continue to press for their right to return to Israel, which is backed by the United Nations, Israel fears that giving an inch on the issue would open the flood gates which it wouldn't be able to close again.

Levin believes one of the first steps to be taken toward peace is for the U.S. not only to facilitate the peace process there, but for it to state what side it is on.

He hopes this would give some legitimacy to the current Palestinian leader and move the region toward peace.

He also believes that Iran will become an important player in the region in the near future, and the U.S. involvement with Iran will set the tone for that interaction. He feels some of the opportunities the U.S. had to involve Iran as an ally were missed and that the effects of any aggressive action toward Iran would be catastrophically debilitating to peace in the region.

Elizabeth Wexford of Belchertown, who attended the talk, said she was concerned the news media isn't covering the Israeli-Palestinian conflict well, and that it's hard to get a good idea of what's going on the region.

She felt the main conflict between the Israelis and Palestinians is they're "not negotiating for the same thing."

She said that, while the Israelis want to secco-existence, the Palestinians want the Israelis out.

Levin said the essential conflict over the occupation of Jerusalem is symbolic of the whole conflict and is one that "must be resolved but cannot be resolved at the same time."

Ben Williams can be reached at bwilliam a student.umass.edu

According to Levin, a big step towards peace is for the U.S. to declare a side.

Edwards labels Clinton as an insider to corruption

NEDRA PICKLER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

John Edwards on Monday cast Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton and her ties to lobbyists as part of a corrupt Washington system that voters should reject in the presidential election.

Edwards railed against the "bankruptcy of our political leadership," an approach that his campaign said would be a major thrust of his efforts in the two months before the first nomination voting. With Clinton appearing to gain strength with every poll, Edwards seemed less to target Republican President Bush's leadership than to cast fellow Democrat Clinton as the insider voters should reject.

"This corruption did not begin yesterday — and it did not even begin with George Bush, although Lord knows it's been present while George Bush has been president," the 2004 vice presidential nominee said in a speech at St. Anselm College. "It has been building for decades until it now threatens literally the life of our democracy."

"Senator Clinton's road to the middle class takes a major detour right through the deep canyon of corporate lobbyists and the hidden bidding of K Street in Washington," he said. "And history tells us that when that bus stops there, it is the middle class that loses."

Later, at a town-hall meeting in Exeter, N.H., Edwards blamed the Washington system for allowing the government to hire private security guards like those who work for Blackwater USA. Blackwater guards were involved in the killings of 17 Iraqi civilians in September in Baghdad.

"Right now, we've got men and women serving in uniform in Iraq while we've got a bunch of paid mercenaries roaming around the country lawless, the best I can tell, working for Blackwater and people like that," Edwards said.

The U.S. government has rejected the use of the term "mercenaries" in a United Nations report to describe Blackwater guards, saying it is demeaning to those who risk their lives defending U.S. interests. Edwards told reporters after his appearance that he didn't know the government objected to the term.

"And I don't care," he said, adding that he "absolutely" believes it is a fair term.

Edwards' earlier speech was subdued and direct. The campaign did not set up a flashy venue — he spoke from a podium in a small stripped-down academic auditorium with just one well-worn campaign banner hanging behind him. He read from his remarks and didn't make any attempt to fire up the crowd and draw applause.

He cast the 2008 election as the culmination of an epic struggle between Washington greed and the power of the people. "This is the moral test of our generation," Edwards said.

"Down one path, we trade corporate Republicans for corporate Democrats; our cronies for their cronies; one political dynasty for another dynasty, and all we are left with is a Democratic version of the Republican corruption machine," he said.

Although Clinton has become the clear front-runner in the Democratic primary, she still has a vulnerability — a tight race in the leadoff state of Iowa where Edwards and Barack Obama are within striking distance in current polls. But Edwards' support has dropped, according to a University of Iowa Hawkeye poll out Monday.

The poll had Clinton with 29 percent, Obama with 27 percent and Edwards with 20. Edwards was down six points from August.

Clinton's lead is stronger in New Hampshire, the other early voting state.

Her campaign said Edwards was turning to attack politics.

"In 2004, John Edwards said, 'If you are looking for the candidate that will do the best job of attacking the other Democrats, I am not your guy,'" said Clinton spokesman Phil Singer. "But now that his campaign has stalled, he's become that guy."

With many voters unhappy with Bush's presidency, Democratic candidates have been promoting themselves as agents of change. That includes Clinton, but Edwards is challenging her and trying to make the race a referendum on who will bring real change to Washington.

"Maybe I have been freed from the system and the fear that holds back politicians because I have learned that there are much more important things in life than winning elections at the cost of selling your soul," Edwards said.

"I saw the chase for campaign money at any cost by the front-runner in this race," Edwards said. "And I chose not join it because the cost to our nation and our children is not worth the hollow victory by any candidate."

The former North Carolina senator said Clinton has refused to accept his challenge not to accept political donations from Washington lobbyists. Clinton has gained strength in the polls since Edwards started making that case several months ago, but he said he thinks it will make the difference in the election.

Singer responded by questioning Edwards' ties to special interests. Edwards has taken donations from industries that employ federal lobbyists, though he doesn't take donations directly from the lobbyists themselves. "If Mr. Edwards is so concerned about the influence of special interests, he should give back the hundreds of thousands of dollars he's taken from health care, securities, and insurance companies," Singer said.

Students satisfied with win, no need to riot

him up saw the police approaching and dropped him, causing the student to hit his head on the ground.

The majority of students who went outside after the game agreed that they had no intention of causing damage or being violent; they just wanted to celebrate and be involved in the crowd.

"Every student has the right to celebrate, but it comes to a point where it gets out of hand," said sophomore Kevin Bolduc. "Celebrating shouldn't mean destroying, especially when it comes to your school, which you should take pride in and respect. Rioting just gives UMass a damaging and violent image that takes away from the quality education we are receiving here."

Few students were arrested within the first hour and by 12:45 a.m., police were asking students to disperse safely. By 1 a.m., all students had either voluntarily left or were asked to leave by police.

"I'm glad we have the chance to celebrate at all, but the cops definitely kept it under control," said sophomore Emily Gittes. "I think that most students learned their lessons after seeing what happened to everyone that participated in the riots last year, especially those who were expelled or fined."

After having been repeatedly warned by UMPD, discussions with dorm RAs, and e-mails from University authorities, no one could argue that students were not aware of the consequences of rioting.

"There is a significant message that the Amherst campus has delivered," said Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano. "The campus as a whole – faculty, staff and students – recognize the consequences of the bad actions of past bad behavior. Everyone suffers in some shape or form from the bad behavior. The bad actions either reinforce the University reputation of the past behavior or derail the work of many people to positively project a positive institutional image for the flagship campus. The Amherst campus exhibited great leadership. Faculty, staff and students all expressed their expectations for behavior and all were steadfast on accountability."

Gargano is satisfied that the warnings and messages put forth by UMass and the local and on-campus police seem to be getting these warnings across to students.

"The real message delivered was all of the constituencies that comprise the campus – faculty, staff, students and alumni – decided a cultural change was required and set in motion the process and standards to affect the institutional change that was necessary," he said.

The overall consensus is that neither the police nor students seemed to be taking any chances this year concerning the World Series celebrations. Police officers avoided violence by taking control of the crowds early and making sure everyone stayed safe.

By 1:30 a.m., just under an hour after the Red Sox won the World Series, students in the Southwest Residential Area had dispersed, whether they left voluntarily or by an officer's request.

Baby giraffe named after Red Sox win

To honor the Red Sox four-game World Series sweep of the Colorado Rockies, staff at the Franklin Park Zoo on Monday named a baby giraffe "Sox."

In a statement, Zoo New England President and Chief Executive Officer John Linehan said the staff chose the name because of the female calf's long, lanky legs.

Other names considered were "Red," "Fenway," "Champion," and "Boston."

"Sox" weighed 154 pounds at birth, standing 6 feet 2 inches tall.

The calf was born after Boston's Game 1 victory, but staff held off naming it because they didn't want to jinx the team's chances, according to the statement.

"Sox" is a member of the Maasai Giraffe subspecies, also known as Kilimanjaro Giraffe.

They are the tallest land animals, using their unique long necks and tongues to reach vegetation inaccessible to other herbivores.

Members of the subspecies survive in the wild only in the sprawling plains Tanzania and Kenya, in East Africa.

A real issue

Greg Collins

In light of the aftermath of the Jena Six controversy, discussion has resurfaced, highlighting conspicuous racial inequities in America. This thinking holds that while overt racism does not exist, subconscious prejudices create discriminatory conditions, which inhibit blacks from advancing in American society.

This reasoning leads to the idea that government should take a more active role in alleviating these racial inequalities, such as creating social welfare programs and affirmative action policies. However, history reveals that blacks have been able to achieve significant progress without help from the government. This evidence shows why calls to combat racism through government intervention are misguided.

The argument is frequently made that racial prejudices, whether overt or disguised, governmental or private, prevents blacks from having the same opportunities and attaining similarly prosperous socio-economic results as non-blacks. The issue, then, is whether or not blacks were able to advance at a time when the government did not have an active role in attempting to help them and when society held deeper racial stereotypes than it does nowadays.

As elucidated by professors Abigail and Stephen Thernstrom in their book, "America in Black and White," blacks achieved remarkable progress in the strong post World War II economy. For instance, the rise of blacks from blue-collar jobs to white-collar jobs coincided with the rapid increase in their personal incomes and, consequently, with greater access to housing, clothing, education and medical care.

Blacks' life expectancy and the number of years of formal schooling also rose dramatically. Overall, in fact, the socio-economic growth of blacks from the post-World War II period to 1960 was greater than that of whites.

Why do some people – both black and white – still recognize African Americans as an oppressed racial group?

These successes all occurred before the beginning of the Civil Rights Movement, as well as before the implementation of affirmative action programs and federal prohibitions of employment discrimination.

If people still think that government services help African Americans advance, they should seriously consider the hard fact that blacks were able to make incredible progress in employment and education without substantial assistance from government following WWII.

Furthermore, the extent of the harmful legacy of slavery on American blacks is exaggerated frequently during public discourse arising from racial conflicts like the Jena Six. The argument is made that even if blacks may have progressed significantly during the post World War II period, they had to recover so much ground as a result of the lingering effects of slavery during the Antebellum Period.

Yet numerous indicators illustrate that blacks had become integrated members in American society not only before any manifestation of modern-day government programs intended to do so, but also before the robust post-World War II economy.

Economist Thomas Sowell has shown that blacks lived in two-parent households at a far higher rate during slavery and at the turn of the 20th century than they do today. Additionally, only a generation or two removed from slavery, blacks had lower crime rates and higher rates of employment than they do today.

Few would argue that blacks have fewer rights and opportunities today than they did at the turn of the 20th century when segregation and discriminatory hiring practices were systemic within American culture. Yet they were still able to overcome these perceived inhibitions to make advances few liberals acknowledge today.

The point is not that racism does not exist now, at the turn of the 20th century or following World War II. Regardless of the extent of racism at a particular time period following slavery, blacks have been able to overcome this prejudice to make achievements that are frequently overlooked by people who claim to want to help blacks through expanded government services.

Why do some people – both black and white – still recognize African Americans as an oppressed racial group? It is because their perception regarding blacks' supposed plight is not grounded in socio-economic realities but in messages conveyed by the media, professors, politically-correct politicians and self-proclaimed black leaders.

For instance, 40 percent of blacks, the Thernstroms note, consider themselves to be part of the middle class. This statistic belies the association of blacks with poverty, an empty connection assumed and articulated consistently by Democratic politicians.

In conclusion, the genuine way to further race relations in light of the Jena Six controversy is not to expand government services. History has proved that poor, middle class and rich blacks have been able to achieve progress without third-party assistance. It is necessary that we push for policies which encourage blacks and all Americans to advance as individuals, while reducing dependency on social programs. This, and not racially-divisive politicization, is genuine social progress.

Drug policy does not speakeasy

Devon Courtney

There are wars that are going on all the time, and they are as much a part of our daily lives as going to class, showering and the dining commons' omelet bars are. We constantly hear about the War on Terror, the war on poverty, the war on drugs, etcetera.

There is a war, which a great many of us are fighting here at UMass, and it's not a war on an abstract concept. It's the war on alcohol.

You are on one of two sides as an on-campus UMass student. Either you drink alcoholic beverages from time to time, or you have nothing to do with them. There is nothing morally wrong with being on either side of this issue, but because of the "party school" hype and overblown paranoia, the odds are stacked against those of us who chose to drink.

Over the last two years, there has been a refurbished alcohol policy in effect. One glance at it will tell you that its creators were hell-bent on curbing any kind of alcoholic consumption on campus. The University Alcohol Policy is riddled with inconsistencies, all intended to intimidate and punish even the lightest of drinkers.

Rule II.D.10.h of the policy states that open containers are not allowed in public spaces. This is perfectly reasonable, but what the rule fails to inform you is that a resident assistant or other authority figure – regardless of your age – can instruct you to open a closed container and pour it out if it is deemed a potential contribution to future inebriation. In short, a residence life employee can legally command you to violate the open container by-law. Does this make sense?

When you purchase an alcoholic beverage, it doesn't magically appear inside your room. You need to carry it through a "public space" in order to legally posses it inside your domicile. However once it's there, you're not exactly in the clear.

Rule II.D.10.i says that you are prohibited from having empty containers inside your room. A 21-year-old acquaintance of mine forgot to throw away an empty handle that he had finished one evening. Because it was empty, he was documented and forced to pay the $50 sanctioning fine – this year is had jumped to $100 – and to attend the BASICS program.

The official reason that my friend had to attend the Brief Alcohol Screening and Intervention for College Students program was because he had an empty alcoholic container "as a decoration." Even if it was, how are decorations harmful?

The University Alcohol Policy is riddled with inconsistencies, all intended to intimidate and punish even the lightest of drinkers.

This brings us to my favorite rule – the alcoholic paraphernalia rule. Rule II.D.10.f politely asserts that you can't have objects that "promote the abuse of alcohol and/or put the user in a position to abuse alcohol." On the Dean of Student's website, it informs you that "this includes, but is not limited to, funnels, taps and beirut/beer-pong tables."

The rule neglects to mention that you can be written up for having other things in your room which ordinarily have nothing to do with alcohol. This includes playing cards, ping pong balls, mugs, posters and more than nine other people. The only issue I have with this list is that none of these things actually contain alcohol – the nine other people are debatable. They can contribute to the consumption of alcohol, but that seems pretty pointless if there's no alcohol in the room. You can't drink paraphernalia.

The irony of all this is that the University Store in the Campus Center sells mugs and shot glasses branded proudly with the UMass logo. The University Store sells other "paraphernalia" too, like ping-pong balls and cards. I know a set-up when I see one.

Ultimately, you are entitled to certain privileges as a 21-year-old on-campus resident. You are allowed to purchase a 12-pack of beer or a handle of liquor, conscript a wizard to teleport it to your room, and let it sit closed on your desk or in your fridge. If you do decide to consume it, you'd better not finish it, because it becomes illegal once it's empty. You should probably leave a quarter-inch of booze in the bottle, and please leave it inside your room. If you should exit your room to dispose of the bottle, you're violating the open-container by-law, and will have to pay the sanction fine.

I understand that there is a problem with alcohol on our campus. I understand the need for rules and limitations on how much a student is allowed to have. I even understand that UMass officials are concerned with the party reputation of the University's student body.

What I can't understand is why such convoluted extremes must be taken. The rules were written with so many inconsistencies in what seems like a mass attempt to discipline everyone. The fear culture that resulted from the UMass party reputation has spurred the creation of a list of incomprehensible and unforgiving rules.

How naive of me to think that prohibition ended in the 1930s.

Organizational insecurities

John Gruenenfelder

The Department of Homeland Security has taken a couple more blows this past week, further weakening its already tarnished image.

On branch, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, staged a self-congratulating press conference. Meanwhile, the Transportation Security Administration's main tool for keeping bad people off airlines and out of the country, the Terror Watch List, has swelled to over 750,000 names.

The Department of Homeland Security, also known as the DHS, is the umbrella organization created after 9/11 to corral many of the government agencies responsible for protecting the country from all manner of problems. When it was created, at a time when emotions were still running high, there were people in Congress on both sides of the fence who feared that this could easily become another money sink given the massive size of the reorganization.

Another problem is that the primary failure of 9/11 rested with the failure of intelligence agencies to handle the information they had and share it with the correct people. The DHS doesn't reetify any of that, but the DHS is what we've got.

Last Tuesday, FEMA's second-in-command, Vice Administrator Harvey Johnson Jr., held a staged news conference wherein he praised the agency's performance in handling the California fires. People in the audience asked questions, but they were actually FEMA employees and didn't identify themselves as such.

At the same time, real reporters were listening to the event on a telephone conference line but were barred from asking any questions of their own.

Johnson apologized for the event on Friday in a brief statement, but frankly that isn't going to cut it. We have a word for a staged news conference – propaganda. It is the very epitome of opaque government; and fortunately, Americans have a very low tolerance for this sort of propaganda.

And the worst part is that it is perfectly acceptable to give information to the press without questions. An agency can release a statement to the press and most people don't mind this sort of activity. The president does it all the time. Letting the press ask questions is better for everybody, but if you really don't want to, at least use the available method for doing so.

Letting the press ask questions is better for everybody, but if you really don't want to, at least use the available method for doing so.

This does nothing to improve FEMA's poor reputation. Its handling of the fires was at least adequate, but screw-ups like this give people a strong feeling that the agency is trying to hide something. This is especially true given that most people can easily recall FEMA's abysmal performance in handling Hurricane Katrina's aftermath.

A DHS spokesman, Russ Knocke, said reprimands are "very probable," but this is the sort of debacle that should spark some firings, not just reprimands. Officials up and down the ladder maintain that this is an isolated incident; however, Congress certainly needs to check into this.

Finishing the one-two punch to DHS, a USA Today article from last week indicates that the Terror Watch List has become all but useless. In 2004 the list already contained a hefty 158,000 names and now stands at over 750,000. That's quite a growth rate. The list contains names and aliases, but that only reduces the number a little. The list is actually managed by a branch of the FBI, but the TSA uses the list to decide who to monitor and creates the no-fly list, a subset of the watch list.

With so many names, it is not hard to imagine huge inaccuracies. A recent Government Accountability Office report says that the TSA is unable to specify how many people on the no-fly list might have made it into the country, merely that a "a number of individuals" have managed to do so.

A list this large is also bound to be full of individuals who have no connection at all with terrorism. Back in 2003, when the list was a fraction the size it is now, Yusef Islam, the singer formerly known as Cat Stevens and writer of the hit song, "Peace Train," was denied entry into the country after his flight was diverted to Maine.

If you have a fairly common Western name then the odds are low that it will be on the list, but people with Islamic (or even just Islamic sounding) names are already used to more grief when travelling. It is no surprise then that the American Civil Liberties Union is still working on cleaning up this mess. A smart terrorist will surely use a new alias, but a small, well-maintained watch list could at least keep out the dumb terrorists.

The DHS was formed over five years ago, yet the agency is still rife with problems, poor leadership and failed ideas. Remember the color-coded threat level?

There are always going to be pains from reorganization, but five years is plenty of time to iron out major issues.

Instead, DHS is busy creating new problems while thoroughly destroying the trust citizens have in important agencies like FEMA. None of this makes me feel very safe.

Siblings release album

Brother and sister vocalists front the band Straylight Run

BY EMMA REED
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Straylight Run's new album, "The Needles the Space," is the band's best and most innovative album to date. With influences ranging from Fiona Apple to Radiohead to the Beatles, "The Needles the Space" is a part of a genre that is all their own.

The combination of pop, rock and sweet lullabies transforms Straylight Run from your average indie-rock quartet into a pioneering band that is about to make their mark in the music business.

The band's front siblings, John Nolan and Michelle DaRosa, have taken their songwriting 10 steps forward from their self-titled debut album. Each song possesses a torrent of genius that floods the hearts and souls of its listeners. Straylight Run's music has transformed from a repertoire of emotional pop ballads to an amalgam of the hearts and souls of four individuals.

STRAYLIGHT RUN

"THE NEEDLES THE SPACE"

REPUBLIC RECORDS

The track listing on this album contains subjects ranging from love, heard in the heartfelt serenade "We'll Never Leave Again;" self-image issues, in the biting "How Do I Fix My Head;" the powerful finger-pointing of "Who Will Save Us Now," which is a hard hit to the American people and their need to find a scapegoat (or protector); and the realization of the progression of life in the album's first single "Soon We'll Be Living in the Future."

But it's not just the poetic intelligence of each song that creates a great album. This album has a musical sound all its own, which comes from the combination of four very talented musicians. With the help of their blood, sweat and tears, the band successfully produced this album all on their own.

Nolan, DaRosa, drummer Will Noon and bassist Shaun Cooper have taken Straylight Run through many generations of music with this one album. Each song is inspired and artistic. This album generates emotions that the band's fans have yet to experience.

Straylight Run's new album, "The Needles the Space," contains subjects ranging from love to self-image issues to the progression of life.

The best way to experience music is live, but Straylight Run has taken all of the best ingredients of recording an album, including the use of numerous instruments – drums, guitars, cellos, pianos and even the occasional glockenspiel – and uses them to hold your attention through the songs' powerful lyrics.

Noon's thunderous yet soothing percussion, coupled with Cooper's slow, steady and gripping bass, demand attention while the chilling sounds of the harmony created by the vocals of DaRosa and Nolan lull our brains into a beautiful dreamland consisting only of the music off Straylight Run's new album "The Needles the Space."

Halloween-inspired play performed by UMass Theater

BY STEPHANIE MCPHERSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Halloween is not just about dressing up and going out to parties. It's about facing that which scares. With a blend of tangible and supernatural terrors, the University of Massachusetts Theater Guild (UMTG)'s "Blood Wedding," opening this All Hallows Eve, sends shivers up the spine.

"Blood Wedding," by Spanish playwright Federico Garcia Lorca, as directed by Michael McSweeney, is a chilling tale about murder, love and betrayal. Set between the two World Wars, the show opens with an eerie slow motion reenactment of the murder of the protagonist's (played by Peter Storey, an English major at UMass) father and brother.

The story then begins with Storey's character, the Groom, telling his Mother (played by Lila Weingast, a UMass theater major) that he plans to marry a girl from across town. The Mother is worried, as her son is all she has left in the world, but she agrees. She soon discovers, however, that the Bride-to-be used to be romantically involved with Leonardo Felix (played by sophomore Tyler Wilkinson), a member of the family that killed the Mother's husband and son.

Unnerved by this discovery, but willing to overlook it for the happiness of her only son, she continues with the plans for the wedding.

Meanwhile, Leonardo hears the news of the engagement and, though he is married with children, it is clear he is still very much in love with the Bride, played by junior theater major Christa Elliott. When Leonardo confronts the Bride with his feelings, she must choose between the safe haven of a stable vineyard owner and the wild passion of true love.

While theater may sometimes be thought of as a place to escape for an hour or two, Elliott says of "Blood Wedding," "it's not just a fluffy piece – it has some substance – it's dark and twisted." The theater major is happy that the UMTG is daring to do something different.

Guild strike may cause delay in new shows

Members of the Writers Guild could hurt Hollywood business

Shows like "Family Guy" would be forced to show re-runs until writers returned to their desks.

BY CARY DARLING
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

With the writers in Hollywood getting ready to power down their computers and raise their picket signs, the Writers Guild of America is calling for a strike beginning on Thursday. TV viewers could be in for a season of shoddy reality and game shows that'll make "Kid Nation" look like Kurosawa. And moviegoers could see ripple effects a few months from now with delayed or canceled projects.

The writers are tussling with the Alliance of Motion Picture and Television Producers over such issues as DVD residuals and payments for "webisodes," online content that's not part of a TV series' regular run. But the details don't matter much to those of us who just want to know how Jack Bauer is going to survive without bathroom breaks or what's going to be the next romantic hody blow to "Grey's Anatomy."

Many TV viewers might not notice the fallout from the strike until January or February; most series work several weeks ahead, and filmgoers will get a longer reprieve because moviemakers work months ahead. But if the strike is prolonged, both will feel the effects.

The writers' union's 1988 strike, which lasted five months and cost Hollywood an estimated $500 million, had a profound effect on the industry. It helped further fragment a TV audience already being seduced away from the big networks by cable and videogames; it is estimated that network viewership dropped nine percent. And that was before the cultural onslaught of the Internet.

Here's our guide to how the strike might affect the average entertainment consumer this time around, though, even if there's a last-minute settlement, don't get too comfy. Contracts with the Screen Actors Guild and the Directors Guild run out in June 2008.

GOOD NIGHT AND GOOD LUCK

Cobbling together your own version of David Letterman's Top Ten List or Stephen Colbert's Threatdown, because the originals will be the first casualties of the strike. Late-night TV shows, filmed the night of broadcast and filled with very topical, of-the-moment humor, can't be stockpiled in advance. Or, maybe you can just go to bed earlier – your dreams might be more entertaining than seeing your favorite late-night host flaming out with his own badly-written jokes.

REALITY IS THE NEW REALITY, PART I:

If you thought there are too many reality TV shows on now, you'll want to vote yourself off the couch by January and go work on your sudoku skills or something. Though reality shows are overseen by professional writers, these series aren't bound by WGA contracts. The same is true for game, talk, sports, newsmagazine and animated shows. So get ready to make TV friends with Ty Pennington and Simon Cowell, because you're going to be seeing a lot more of them.

DON'T GET TOO ATTACHED

Investing viewing time in series with only middling ratings may be a riskier bet than usual. As diehard fans of shows such as "Family Guy" and "Jericho" have found, networks are quick to bring out the ax, even without a strike looming. Only hard lobbying from viewers reseued those two series from the cancellation bin.

But every network is faced with a quandary this year. Does it limp along with a series like "K-Ville," "Cane," "Journeyman" or "Life," that may have less than stellar ratings but might have a backlog of scripts and/or episodes completed that could see the network through a (short) strike? Or does it just cut its losses, since dramas are so expensive anyway? As one agent told Variety, "If Fox has to shut down a show like 'K-Ville' in the middle of filming the seventh episode, they might just decide it makes more sense to simply cancel it."

And it seemed CBS would rather risk broadcasting a blank screen than keep the quickly killed "Viva Laughlin" around.

Turn off the TV, turn on the computer.

Since the Internet is slowly severing the attachment to network TV anyway, why not make it complete and get your shows online? No, we're not talking about episodes of "Private Practice" or "CSI." Short, continuing "series" specifically made for the Internet, such as the affecting "Hometown Baghdad," the recently launched "Total Pop Star," or the much talked about "Lonelygirl15," may get a boost in traffic if everyone's TVs are dark.

QUALITY CONTROL? WHAT QUALITY CONTROL?

Reportedly, scripts are being pushed through the production pipeline without many of the touchups they might have received in less hectic times. And without writers available for rewrites while series or movies are in production, little things like quality and continuity might fly out the window in a rush to make deadlines. If "30 Rock" suddenly becomes more like "thirtysomething," then you'll know why.

Haven't we seen this before?

When in doubt, go with what you know. That's what networks just might do as they decide to plug holes with reruns of successful shows rather than go with the untried and untested. Hey guys, remember – there's no such thing as too many episodes of "Cheaters."

ALL IS NOT "LOST"

Series such as "Lost" and "24," which weren't due to return until spring anyway, may have an advantage, as they could have new episodes to show at a time when others have lapsed into reruns or strike-driven hiatus.

But a long strike could have a drastic impact on other serialized dramas, such as "Heroes," which count on viewers stitching together intricate threads of back story week after week.

SAY WHAT?

No one's going to confuse ABC with the BBC anytime soon, but you may be hearing more accents on TV as networks might look to other English-speaking countries to fill in the gaps. According to Slate, NBC is looking into airing the original U.K. version of "The Office." Now, if they would go with the French or German versions of "The Office," that would really be sweet. And someone just might pick up the controversial Canadian sitcom "I little Mosque on the Prairie."

A long strike could mean more distribution for imported films in theaters as well. If it all means increased exposure for such weirdly-fascinating series as England's "Meadowlands" or the frothy "Footballers' Wives," both now shown on BBC America, hey, we're all for it.

REALITY IS THE NEW REALITY, PART II

If the strike persists, the film industry will follow the TV industry down the path of creative workarounds. Theatrical documentaries have been on an upswing in the last few years, and that could increase if theaters are desperate for material because the latest Steve Carell release is mired in production.

ARE YOU READY TO ROCK?

Movie-theater chains have already begun experimenting with screening live stage events, whether a Prince concert from Los Angeles or an opera from New York's Metropolitan Opera. It beats showing low-grossing movies like "Rendition" and in the middle of a strike, could seem even more attractive.

YEAH, BUT I DON'T LIKE THEM FIRST TIME AROUND!

But if theaters can't convince U2 to perform for their benefit, they might have to rely on some C-list star you saw on the back of a DVD box the last time you were at a video store and thought, "They're still around?" Well, pull out your wallet and fork over $10 to see these acts on the big screen, as projects that would have gone into the straight-to-DVD netherworld may now get a chance in theaters. Who said there are no second chances in Hollywood?

Shows that do not require writers, such as reality TV show "The Bachelor," would presumably control TV airwaves. Writers are set to strike on Thursday.

A real issue

Greg Collins

In light of the aftermath of the Jena Six controversy, discussion has resurfaced, highlighting conspicuous racial inequities in America. This thinking holds that while overt racism does not exist, subconscious prejudices create discriminatory conditions, which inhibit blacks from advancing in American society.

This reasoning leads to the idea that government should take a more active role in alleviating these racial inequalities, such as creating social welfare programs and affirmative action policies. However, history reveals that blacks have been able to achieve significant progress without help from the government. This evidence shows why calls to combat racism through government intervention are misguided.

The argument is frequently made that racial prejudices, whether overt or disguised, governmental or private, prevents blacks from having the same opportunities and attaining similarly prosperous socio-economic results as non-blacks. The issue, then, is whether or not blacks were able to advance at a time when the government did not have an active role in attempting to help them and when society held deeper racial stereotypes than it does nowadays.

As elucidated by professors Abigail and Stephen Thernstrom in their book, "America in Black and White," blacks achieved remarkable progress in the strong post World War II economy. For instance, the rise of blacks from blue-collar jobs to white-collar jobs coincided with the rapid increase in their personal incomes and, consequently, with greater access to housing, clothing, education and medical care.

Blacks' life expectancy and the number of years of formal schooling also rose dramatically. Overall, in fact, the socio-economic growth of blacks from the post-World War II period to 1960 was greater than that of whites.

Why do some people – both black and white – still recognize African Americans as an oppressed racial group?

These successes all occurred before the beginning of the Civil Rights Movement, as well as before the implementation of affirmative action programs and federal prohibitions of employment discrimination.

If people still think that government services help African Americans advance, they should seriously consider the hard fact that blacks were able to make incredible progress in employment and education without substantial assistance from government following WWII.

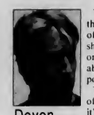
Furthermore, the extent of the harmful legacy of slavery on American blacks is exaggerated frequently during public discourse arising from racial conflicts like the Jena Six. The argument is made that even if blacks may have progressed significantly during the post World War II period, they had to recover so much ground as a result of the lingering effects of slavery during the Antebellum Period.

Yet numerous indicators illustrate that blacks had become integrated members in American society not only before any manifestation of modern-day government programs intended to do so, but also before the robust post-World War II economy.

Economist Thomas Sowell has shown that blacks lived in two-parent households at a far higher rate during slavery and at the turn of the 20th century than they do today. Additionally, only a generation or two removed from slavery, blacks had lower crime rates and higher rates of employment than they do today.

Few would argue that blacks have fewer rights and opportunities today than they did at the turn of the 20th century when segregation and discriminatory hiring practices were systemic within American culture. Yet they were still able to overcome these perceived inhibitions to make advances few liberals acknowledge today.

The point is not that racism does not exist now, at the turn of the 20th century or following World War II. Regardless of the extent of racism at a particular time period following slavery, blacks have been able to overcome this prejudice to make achievements that are frequently overlooked by people who claim to want to help blacks through expanded government services.



Why do some people – both black and white – still recognize African Americans as an oppressed racial group? It is because their perception regarding blacks' supposed plight is not grounded in socio-economic realities but in messages conveyed by the media, professors, politically-correct politicians and self-proclaimed black leaders.

For instance, 40 percent of blacks, the Thernstroms note, consider themselves to be part of the middle class. This statistic belies the association of blacks with poverty, an empty connection assumed and articulated consistently by Democratic politicians.

In conclusion, the genuine way to further race relations in light of the Jena Six controversy is not to expand government services. History has proved that poor, middle class and rich blacks have been able to achieve progress without third-party assistance. It is necessary that we push for policies which encourage blacks and all Americans to advance as individuals, while reducing dependency on social programs. This, and not racially-divisive politicization, is genuine social progress.

Drug policy does not speakeasy

Devon Courtney

There are wars that are going on all the time, and they are as much a part of our daily lives as going to class, showering and the dining commons' omelet bars are. We constantly hear about the War on Terror, the war on poverty, the war on drugs, etcetera.

There is a war, which a great many of us are fighting here at UMass, and it's not a war on an abstract concept. It's the war on alcohol.

You are on one of two sides as an on-campus UMass student. Either you drink alcoholic beverages from time to time, or you have nothing to do with them. There is nothing morally wrong with being on either side of this issue, but because of the "party school" hype and overblown paranoia, the odds are stacked against those of us who chose to drink.

Over the last two years, there has been a refurbished alcohol policy in effect. One glance at it will tell you that its creators were hell-bent on curbing any kind of alcoholic consumption on campus. The University Alcohol Policy is riddled with inconsistencies, all intended to intimidate and punish even the lightest of drinkers.

Rule II.D.10.h of the policy states that open containers are not allowed in public spaces. This is perfectly reasonable, but what the rule fails to inform you is that a resident assistant or other authority figure – regardless of your age – can instruct you to open a closed container and pour it out if it is deemed a potential contribution to future inebriation. In short, a residence life employee can legally command you to violate the open container by-law. Does this make sense?

When you purchase an alcoholic beverage, it doesn't magically appear inside your room. You need to carry it through a "public space" in order to legally posses it inside your domicile. However once it's there, you're not exactly in the clear.

Rule II.D.10.i says that you are prohibited from having empty containers inside your room. A 21-year-old acquaintance of mine forgot to throw away an empty handle that he had finished one evening. Because it was empty, he was documented and forced to pay the $50 sanctioning fine – this year is had jumped to $100 – and to attend the BASICS program.

The official reason that my friend had to attend the Brief Alcohol Screening and Intervention for College Students program was because he had an empty alcoholic container "as a decoration." Even if it was, how are decorations harmful?

This brings us to my favorite rule – the alcoholic paraphernalia rule. Rule II.D.10.f politely asserts that you can't have objects that "promote the abuse of alcohol and/or put the user in a position to abuse alcohol." On the Dean of Student's website, it informs you that "this includes, but is not limited to, funnels, taps and beirut/beer-pong tables."

The rule neglects to mention that you can be written up for having other things in your room which ordinarily have nothing to do with alcohol. This includes playing cards, ping pong balls, mugs, posters and more than nine other people. The only issue I have with this list is that none of these things actually contain alcohol – the nine other people are debatable. They can contribute to the consumption of alcohol, but that seems pretty pointless if there's no alcohol in the room. You can't drink paraphernalia.

The University Alcohol Policy is riddled with inconsistencies, all intended to intimidate and punish even the lightest of drinkers.

The irony of all this is that the University Store in the Campus Center sells mugs and shot glasses branded proudly with the UMass logo. The University Store sells other "paraphernalia" too, like ping-pong balls and cards. I know a set-up when I see one.

Ultimately, you are entitled to certain privileges as a 21-year-old on-campus resident. You are allowed to purchase a 12-pack of beer or a handle of liquor, conscript a wizard to teleport it to your room, and let it sit closed on your desk or in your fridge. If you do decide to consume it, you'd better not finish it, because it becomes illegal once it's empty. You should probably leave a quarter-inch of booze in the bottle, and please leave it inside your room. If you should exit your room to dispose of the bottle, you're violating the open-container by-law, and will have to pay the sanction fine.

I understand that there is a problem with alcohol on our campus. I understand the need for rules and limitations on how much a student is allowed to have. I even understand that UMass officials are concerned with the party reputation of the University's student body.

What I can't understand is why such convoluted extremes must be taken. The rules were written with so many inconsistencies in what seems like a mass attempt to discipline everyone. The fear culture that resulted from the UMass party reputation has spurred the creation of a list of incomprehensible and unforgiving rules.

How naive of me to think that prohibition ended in the 1930s.

Organizational insecurities

John Gruenenfelder

The Department of Homeland Security has taken a couple more blows this past week, further weakening its already tarnished image.

On branch, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, staged a self-congratulating press conference. Meanwhile, the Transportation Security Administration's main tool for keeping bad people off airlines and out of the country, the Terror Watch List, has swelled to over 750,000 names.

The Department of Homeland Security, also known as the DHS, is the umbrella organization created after 9/11 to corral many of the government agencies responsible for protecting the country from all manner of problems. When it was created, at a time when emotions were still running high, there were people in Congress on both sides of the fence who feared that this could easily become another money sink given the massive size of the reorganization.

Another problem is that the primary failure of 9/11 rested with the failure of intelligence agencies to handle the information they had and share it with the correct people. The DHS doesn't rectify any of that, but the DHS is what we've got.

Last Tuesday, FEMA's second-in-command, Vice Administrator Harvey Johnson Jr., held a staged news conference wherein he praised the agency's performance in handling the California fires. People in the audience asked questions, but they were actually FEMA employees and didn't identify themselves as such.

At the same time, real reporters were listening to the event on a telephone conference line but were barred from asking any questions of their own. Johnson apologized for the event on Friday in a brief statement, but frankly that isn't going to cut it. We have a word for a staged news conference – propaganda. It is the very epitome of opaque government; and fortunately, Americans have a very low tolerance for this sort of propaganda.

And the worst part is that it is perfectly acceptable to give information to the press without questions. An agency can release a statement to the press and most people don't mind this sort of activity. The president does it all the time. Letting the press ask questions is better for everybody, but if you really don't want to, at least use the available method for doing so.

Letting the press ask questions is better for everybody, but if you really don't want to, at least use the available method for doing so.

This does nothing to improve FEMA's poor reputation. Its handling of the fires was at least adequate, but screw-ups like this give people a strong feeling that the agency is trying to hide something. This is especially true given that most people can easily recall FEMA's abysmal performance in handling Hurricane Katrina's aftermath.

A DHS spokesman, Russ Knocke, said reprimands are "very probable," but this is the sort of debacle that should spark some firings, not just reprimands. Officials up and down the ladder maintain that this is an isolated incident; however, Congress certainly needs to check into this.

Finishing the one-two punch to DHS, a USA Today article from last week indicates that the Terror Watch List has become all but useless. In 2004 the list already contained a hefty 158,000 names and now stands at over 750,000. That's quite a growth rate. The list contains names and aliases, but that only reduces the number a little. The list is actually managed by a branch of the FBI, but the TSA uses the list to decide who to monitor and creates the no-fly list, a subset of the watch list.

With so many names, it is not hard to imagine huge inaccuracies. A recent Government Accountability Office report says that the TSA is unable to specify how many people on the no-fly list might have made it into the country, merely that a "a number of individuals" have managed to do so.

A list this large is also bound to be full of individuals who have no connection at all with terrorism. Back in 2004, when the list was a fraction the size it is now, Yusef Islam, the singer formerly known as Cat Stevens and writer of the hit song, "Peace Train," was denied entry into the country after his flight was diverted to Maine.

If you have a fairly common Western name then the odds are low that it will be on the list, but people with Islamic (or even just Islamic sounding) names are already used to more grief when travelling. It is no surprise then that the American Civil Liberties Union is still working on cleaning up this mess. A smart terrorist will surely use a new alias, but a small, well-maintained watch list could at least keep out the dumb terrorists.

The DHS was formed over five years ago, yet the agency is still rife with problems, poor leadership and failed ideas. Remember the color-coded threat level?

There are always going to be pants from reorganization, but five years is plenty of time to iron out major issues.

Instead, DHS is busy creating new problems while thoroughly destroying the trust citizens have in important agencies like FEMA. None of this makes me feel very safe.

Siblings release album

Brother and sister vocalists front the band Straylight Run

By Emma Reed
Collegian Correspondent

Straylight Run's new album, "The Needles the Space," is the band's best and most innovative album to date. With influences ranging from Fiona Apple to Radiohead to the Beatles, "The Needles the Space" is a part of a genre that is all their own.

The combination of pop, rock and sweet lullabies transforms Straylight Run from your average indie-rock quartet into a pioneering band that is about to make their mark in the music business.

The band's front siblings, John Nolan and Michelle DaRosa, have taken their songwriting 10 steps forward from their self-titled debut album. Each song possesses a tormented genius that floods the hearts and souls of its listeners. Straylight Run's music has transformed from a repertoire of emotional pop ballads to an amalgam of the hearts and souls of four individuals.

The track listing on this album contains subjects ranging from love, heard in the heartfelt serenade "We'll Never Leave Again;" self-image issues, in the biting "How Do I Fix My Head;" the powerful finger-pointing of "Who Will Save Us Now," which is a hard hit to the American people and their need to find a scapegoat (or protector); and the realization of the progression of life in the album's first single "Soon We'll Be Living in the Future."

But it's not just the poetic intelligence of each song that creates a great album. This album has a musical sound all its own, which comes from the combination of four very talented musicians. With the help of their blood, sweat and tears, the band successfully produced this album all on their own.

Nolan, DaRosa, drummer Will Noon and bassist Shaun Cooper have taken Straylight Run through many generations of music with this one album. Each song is inspired and artistic. This album generates emotions that the band's fans have yet to experience.

Straylight Run's new album, "The Needles the Space," contains subjects ranging from love to self-image issues to the progression of life.

The best way to experience music is live, but Straylight Run has taken all of the best ingredients of recording an album, including the use of numerous instruments – drums, guitars, cellos, pianos and even the occasional glockenspiel – and uses them to hold your attention through the songs' powerful lyrics.

Noon's thunderous yet soothing percussion, coupled with Cooper's slow, steady and gripping bass, demand attention while the chilling sounds of the harmony created by the vocals of DaRosa and Nolan lull our brains into a beautiful dreamland consisting only of the music off Straylight Run's new album "The Needles the Space."

Halloween-inspired play performed by UMass Theater

By Stephanie McPherson
Collegian Staff

Halloween is not just about dressing up and going out to parties. It's about facing that which scares. With a blend of tangible and supernatural terrors, the University of Massachusetts Theater Guild (UMTG)'s "Blood Wedding," opening this All Hallows Eve, sends shivers up the spine.

"Blood Wedding," by Spanish playwright Federico García Lorca, as directed by Michael McSweeney, is a chilling tale about murder, love and betrayal. Set between the two World Wars, the show opens with an eerie slow motion reenactment of the murder of the protagonist's (played by Peter Storey, an English major at UMass) father and brother.

The story then begins with Storey's character, the Groom, telling his Mother (played by Lila Weingast, a UMass theater major) that he plans to marry a girl from across town. The Mother is worried, as her son is all she has left in the world, but she agrees. She soon discovers, however, that the Bride-to-be used to be romantically involved with Leonardo Felix (played by sophomore Tyler Wilkinson), a member of the family that killed the Mother's husband and son.

Unnerved by this discovery, but willing to overlook it for the happiness of her only son, she continues with the plans for the wedding.

Meanwhile, Leonardo hears the news of the engagement and, though he is married with children, it is clear he is still very much in love with the Bride, played by junior theater major Christa Elliott. When Leonardo confronts the Bride with his feelings, she must choose between the safe haven of a stable vineyard owner and the wild passion of true love.

While theater may sometimes be thought of as a place to escape for an hour or two, Elliott says of "Blood Wedding," "it's not just a fluffy piece. It has some substance ... it's dark and twisted." The theater major is happy that the UMTG is daring to do something different.

Guild strike may cause delay in new shows

Members of the Writers Guild could hurt Hollywood business

Shows like "Family Guy" would be forced to show re-runs until writers returned to their desks.

By Cary Darling
McClatchy Newspapers

With the writers in Hollywood getting ready to power down their computers and raise their picket signs, the Writers Guild of America is calling for a strike beginning on Thursday. TV viewers could be in for a season of shoddy reality and game shows that'll make "Kid Nation" look like Kurosawa. And moviegoers could see ripple effects a few months from now with delayed or canceled projects.

The writers are tussling with the Alliance of Motion Picture and Television Producers over such issues as DVD residuals and payments for "webisodes," online content that's not part of a TV series' regular run. But the details don't matter much to those of us who just want to know how Jack Bauer is going to survive without bathroom breaks or what's going to be the next romantic body blow to "Grey's Anatomy."

Many TV viewers might not notice the fallout from the strike until January or February; most series work several weeks ahead, and filmgoers will get a longer reprieve because movie-makers work months ahead. But if the strike is prolonged, both will feel the effects.

The writers' union's 1988 strike, which lasted five months and cost Hollywood an estimated $500 million, had a profound effect on the industry. It helped further fragment a TV audience already being seduced away from the big networks by cable and videogames; it is estimated that network viewership dropped nine percent. And that was before the cultural onslaught of the Internet.

Here's our guide to how the strike might affect the average entertainment consumer this time around, though, even if there's a last-minute settlement, don't get too comfy. Contracts with the Screen Actors Guild and the Directors Guild run out in June 2008.

GOOD NIGHT AND GOOD LUCK

Start cobbling together your own version of David Letterman's Top Ten List or Stephen Colbert's Threatdown, because the originals will be the first casualties of the strike. Late-night TV shows, filmed the night of broadcast and filled with very topical, of-the-moment humor, can't be stockpiled in advance. Or, maybe you can just go to bed earlier – your dreams might be more entertaining than seeing your favorite late-night host flaming out with his own badly-written jokes.

REALITY IS THE NEW REALITY, PART I

If you thought there are too many reality TV shows on now, you'll want to vote yourself off the couch by January and go work on your sudoku skills or something. Though reality shows are overseen by professional writers, these series aren't bound by WGA contracts. The same is true for game, talk, sports, newsmagazine and animated shows. So get ready to make TV friends with Ty Pennington and Simon Cowell, because you're going to be seeing a lot more of them.

DON'T GET TOO ATTACHED

Investing viewing time in series with only middling ratings may be a riskier bet than usual. As diehard fans of shows such as "Family Guy" and "Jericho" have found, networks are quick to bring out the ax, even without a strike looming. Only hard lobbying from viewers rescued those two series from the cancellation bin.

But every network is faced with a quandary this year. Does it limp along with a series like "K-Ville," "Cane," "Journeyman" or "Life," that may have less than stellar ratings but might have a backlog of scripts and/or episodes completed that could see the network through a (short) strike? Or does it just cut its losses, since dramas are so expensive anyway? As one agent told Variety, "If Fox has to shut down a show like 'K-Ville' in the middle of filming the seventh episode, they might just decide it makes more sense to simply cancel it."

And it seemed CBS would rather risk broadcasting a blank screen than keep the quickly killed "Viva Laughlin" around.

Turn off the TV, turn on the computer.

Since the Internet is slowly severing the attachment to network TV anyway, why not make it complete and get your shows online? No, we're not talking about episodes of "Private Practice" or "CSI." Short, continuing "series" specifically made for the Internet, such as the affecting "Hometown Baghdad," the recently launched "Total Pop Star," or the much talked about "Lonelygirl15," may get a boost in traffic if everyone's TVs are dark.

QUALITY CONTROL? WHAT QUALITY CONTROL?

Reportedly, scripts are being pushed through the production pipeline without many of the touchups they might have received in less hectic times. And without writers available for rewrites while series or movies are in production, little things like quality and continuity might fly out the window in a rush to make deadlines. If "30 Rock" suddenly becomes more like "thirtysomething," then you'll know why.

Haven't we seen this before?

When in doubt, go with what you know. That's what networks just might do as they decide to plug holes with reruns of successful shows rather than go with the untried and untested. Hey guys, remember ... there's no such thing as too many episodes of "Cheaters."

ALL IS NOT "LOST"

Series such as "Lost" and "24," which weren't due to return until spring anyway, may have an advantage, as they could have new episodes to show at a time when others have lapsed into reruns or strike-driven hiatus.

But a long strike could have a drastic impact on other serialized dramas, such as "Heroes," which count on viewers stitching together intricate threads of back story week after week.

SAY WHAT?

No one's going to confuse ABC with the BBC anytime soon, but you may be hearing more accents on TV as networks might look to other English-speaking countries to fill in the gaps. According to Slate, NBC is looking into airing the original U.K. version of "The Office." Now, it they would go with the French or German versions of "The Office," that would really be sweet. And someone just might pick up the controversial Canadian sitcom "Little Mosque on the Prairie."

A long strike could mean more distribution for imported films in theaters as well. It it all means increased exposure for such weirdly-fascinating series as England's "Meadowlands" or the frothy "Footballers' Wives," both now shown on BBC America, hey, we're all for it.

REALITY IS THE NEW REALITY, PART II

If the strike persists, the film industry will follow the TV industry down the path of creative workarounds. Theatrical documentaries have been on an upswing in the last few years, and that could increase if theaters are desperate for material because the latest Steve Carell release is mired in production.

ARE YOU READY TO ROCK?

Movie-theater chains have already begun experimenting with screening live stage events, whether a Prince concert from Los Angeles or an opera from New York's Metropolitan Opera. It heats showing low-grossing movies like "Rendition" and in the middle of a strike, could seem even more attractive.

YEAH, BUT I DIDN'T LIKE THEM FIRST TIME AROUND!

But if theaters can't convince U2 to perform for their benefit, they might have to rely on some B-list star you saw on the front of a DVD box the last time you were at a video store and thought, "They're still around?" Well, pull out your wallet and fork over $8 to see these acts on the big screen, as projects that would have gone into the straight-to-DVD netherworld may now get a chance in theaters. Who said there are no second chances in Hollywood?

Shows that do not require writers, such as reality TV show "The Bachelor," would presumably control TV airwaves. Writers are set to strike on Thursday.

Haunting play will open its doors on All Hallows Eve

And different it is. Lorca wrote "Blood Wedding" in 1932, basing it on a tragic news story he had read. This play is one of three "'folk tragedies' [on which] his reputation as a playwright rests," according to a Lorca biography. The other plays follow the same symbolic and poetic style as "Blood Wedding."

Most of the characters in the play have no names, shaping them with a feeling of anonymity, as though these scenarios could be, and have been, played out many times before, in many different places.

As the play was originally written in Spanish, the Theater Guild is using a script translated by Lillian Groag, an American playwright. The poetry in Lorca's original text was not lost in translation, however, as the speech is flowing and eerie, adding another dimension to the show. The dialogue is also frequently punctuated by repetition, asides and songs that foreshadow the tragedies to come.

"Blood Wedding" is full of symbols for the more subtle viewer. Orange blossoms appear as a representation of the sanctity of marriage, and are at one point unceremoniously thrown to the ground. A Beggar, death personified, conspires with the moon as to the fate of the lovers, showing the "fragility of life," according to McSweeney, a sophomore at UMass.

The music to build the mood of dread and foreboding was a smart choice by McSweeney. The haunting pieces by Estonian composer Arvo Pärt were used wisely during more dramatic scenes to add yet another layer of darkness.

Like every theatrical endeavor, the UMTG ran into some problems during the production of the show. Its usual performance space – the Student Union Ballroom – was pulled from it, leaving the Guild to scramble in its search for a new stage, and to deal with a shorter amount of time to get everything together. Auditions were held in mid-September, giving the Theater Guild a little more than a month to polish and perfect the performance.

As a result, the set is made up simply of furniture for houses and vine draperies for scenes in the forest. This minimalist approach adds to the interesting and different feel of the play. Despite the major roadblocks, the highly talented cast and crew pulled it together.

"The process itself has gone astoundingly well," said McSweeney.

"This is a very unique show," he continued. "It'll be a crime if people miss it…it is not your run-of-the-mill theater."

"Blood Wedding" is opening on Halloween night (Wednesday, Oct. 31), and will run until Friday, Nov. 2 in Bowker Auditorium, located in Stockbridge Hall, with 8:00 p.m. shows nightly. Prices are $6 for students and $10 for general admission.

Stephanie McPherson can be reached at smcpherson@student.umass.edu.

The play "Blood Wedding" was originially written in Spanish by Frederico Garcia Lorca. The American version, translated by Lillian Groag, lost the poetic rhythm, adding an additional eerie aspect to the show.

Osbourne returns to the road

Ozzy Osbourne's son Jack has been drug free longer than his father. Jack Osbourne was made famous on the MTV show "The Osbournes."

By Chris Riemenschneider
Star Tribune (Minneapolis)

MINNEAPOLIS, MN. — You'll have to forgive the (parentheses) that appear in this article.

Ozzy Osbourne was funny, enthusiastic and even uncannily polite talking on the phone two weeks ago from Seattle, where his first arena tour in six years kicked off. But even now that he's purportedly stone-cold sober for the first time in his career, metal's most legendary singer still wasn't completely coherent or clean of profanity. Hence, the parentheses.

Osbourne's tourmate, Rob Zombie, was the director behind the recent remake update of the horror movie "Halloween," a surprise hit at the box office when it opened over Labor Day weekend.

"I haven't seen it yet, but I'm sure it's [expletive] brilliant," Ozzy said, raving about the job that Zombie did as a director on his 'Dreamer' video. "The guy is very talented, and he's just really one of the absolute coolest, nicest guys in rock 'n' roll."

Osbourne himself is also enjoying some comeback-level success with "Black Rain," his first all-new album since 2001. The CD debuted at No. 3 in Billboard and landed him his first radio hit in years, the fittingly-titled anthem "I Don't Wanna Stop."

Ozzy said the album's reception is extra sweet since it's the first he's made sober. Suffice it to say, the guy known for biting the head off a bat and snorting a line of ants had drug and alcohol problems for decades.

"I didn't know if I could [expletive] do it," he said of making the album. "I thought maybe I needed the drugs and alcohol. I'd never made a record any other way."

"I came to an arrangement with myself, I thought, 'Well, if I can't do it on my own without any alcohol or drugs, I'll call it a day and carry on just doing live shows or whatever.' But then I spoke to a friend of mine who's been in the recovery program, and he's got a lot more years in it than I. He said to me, 'You know, there's nothing wrong in asking for help.'"

The help came from his band, including longtime guitarist Zakk Wylde, and from producer Kevin Churko, known for working with, of all people, Britney Spears and Celine Dion – presumably, he can deal with difficult personalities. Osbourne also took inspiration from his son, Jack, 21, who successfully completed a rehab program in 2003.

"My son's got more clean time than I have," he said with pride.

"I don't want people to think that I'm anti-drugs, or anti-alcohol. For me, I am [against it]. If you have a good time and you're not harming anybody, it's all good. But I just don't choose to do it right now. It's just amazing the whole transformation that me and my family have had from the [recovery] program."

Ah, the family. Ozzy's kin became nearly as famous as he is during the first-of-its-kind reality TV show, "The Osbournes," a huge hit for MTV from 2002 to 2005.

Asked whether life has returned to normal for his family since the end of the series, Ozzy said, "That was normal. What you saw was the way we lived. We never had any script or direction."

Ozzy clearly grew tired of having cameras in his face every day, but he said the show became worth it in his eyes in its last season, when his wife/manager Sharon was diagnosed with colon cancer.

"They said to me, 'Do you wanna call it a day?'" he recalled. "They asked Sharon, and she said, 'Yeah. It's reality.' Immediately, she saw what good she could do.

"Me, I would've immediately said, 'Pack your bags and [expletive] off with your cameras!' She said, 'It's a terrible thing I'm going to go through, but I'm going to beat it, and people can see that it can be done.'"

Ozzy is quick to praise his wife, who did beat the cancer, but didn't lose her reputation as a whip-cracker when it comes to her husband's career.

Osbourne joked about Sharon's go-getter attitude – "I asked her when I was gonna play some arenas again, and the next thing I know, I've got this 40-city tour," he quipped, but he stressed that she has never been his "boss."

"People who say that, I think they gotta be stoned," he said. "my wife couldn't [expletive] push me to do anything I don't want to do if she tried."

Sharon raised a lot of eyebrows when she converted metal's biggest annual summer tour, Ozzfest, into a free event with sponsorship money this past summer. Ozzy said the tour was a success in his mind because it "put the brakes on everybody raising ticket prices."

"Barbra Streisand is getting like $1,500 a ticket. That's just [expletive] crazy. And a lot of bands [indecipherable] started to ask for more, more, more, so Sharon just said, '[Expletive] it. We'll do it free.' It took a lot of guts."

Ozzy is still a little dismayed that Sharon is getting ready to sell off a couple houses' worth of the family's goods, a public auction she put together to raise money for other cancer victims. The sale is a byproduct of the fact that the Osbourne kids have moved out and the family recently sold its house featured on the MTV series.

"It got to be too expensive having the security there, which was OK when MTV was footing the bill, but not us," he said. "It's got a lot of memories, that house. When the kids go, you're just left with photographs and memories and the [expletive] house. We had some fun. A lot of blood, sweat and tears in that house."

You won't catch Ozzy sounding that nostalgic when it comes to his career.

"I'm probably fitter now at the age of 59 than I was at 29, because I don't drink and I don't smoke," he said. "I take care of myself better, and I used to not take care of myself at all."

His rebounding health is just one reason he said he hasn't seriously considered retirement yet. Another good reason – boredom.

"All I do when I'm at home is sit and watch [expletive] war films all day," he said. "I just sit in my room. My room is always called the bunker because of that."

That certainly gives new meaning to that whole Prince of Darkness thing.

Flacco leads Blue Hens over Midshipmen

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

No. 7 Delaware became the most recent team from the NCAA Football Championship Subdivision to defeat a team from the Football Bowl Subdivision, when it defeated Navy, 59-52, on Saturday.

Quarterback Joe Flacco completed 31-of-41 passes and amassed 434 passing yards in the wins.

"People ask me about Joe going down and playing in that environment, and I said 'Joe won't even know,'" Delaware coach K.C. Keeler said in this week's CAA teleconference. "It's going to be like Joe in the backyard playing with his brothers. That's the way he approaches the game; he's just so steady. There's a great shot of him in the Northeastern game getting the ball knocked out of his hand. He just reaches down, picks it up, and throws it downfield for a completion. That's Joe."

Using his pinpoint accuracy, Flacco threw a career-high four touchdown passes. He also did a good job of spreading the field, as four different receivers caught at least five passes. His performance earned him CAA Offensive Player of the Week.

CAA Football

Flacco wasn't the only one who helped the Blue Hens (7-1, 4-1 CAA) score on seven consecutive possessions against the Midshipmen (4-4). Running back Omar Cuff carried much of the workload with his 28 carries for 141 yards and four touchdowns.

Cuff is making a strong case for the Walter Payton Award, which recognizes the top offensive player in the FCS. His four touchdowns give him 28 on the season and the all-time single season touchdown record at Delaware.

The previous was 24 touchdowns set by Gardy Kabue in 1971. Making Cuff's record even more impressive is that the Blue Hens still have three games remaining in the regular season and appear to be headed for the playoffs.

Delaware quarterback Joe Flacco threw for 434 yards and four touchdowns in the Blue Hens 59-52 win over Navy.

Santos shines

If Ricky Santos is still feeling the effects of his right shoulder injury, it wasn't apparent in UNH's 49-36 victory over Rhode Island. Santos threw for 415 yards and five touchdowns, while only getting sacked once and throwing no interceptions.

"Ricky made some great reads," UNH coach Sean McDonnell said. "Again, very efficient with the football, he was 24-for-30, and I think two of them were throwaways. He just makes us a better football team all the time, and we were fortunate to get out of there with a win against a good Rhode Island football team."

McDonnell said that Santos needs to work on getting down rather than taking hits, as he continues to get sore as he plays.

UNH will want Santos on the field as often as possible; he is just three touchdown passes shy of tying Steve McNair for 4th all-time in the CAA.

The No. 8 Wildcats (6-2, 3-2 CAA) are coming on strong after losing their first two conference games to James Madison and Richmond. They have yet to lose a game at home this year and are tied with Hofstra for second in the CAA North Division.

Two more upsets

In addition to Delaware's defeating Navy, there were two more games in which highly-ranked opponents fell in CAA play this week.

No. 25 Villanova moved into the rankings after knocking off No. 20 Hofstra, 35-31. The Wildcats had a bye the previous week and nearly knocked off No. 4 Massachusetts two weeks ago before falling in four overtimes.

"I think Villanova did a good job beating us," Hofstra coach Dave Cohen said, "but I also think Hofstra did a good job of beating Hofstra. Three touchdowns – one on special teams and two on turnovers – the defense isn't even on the field; that's a tough way to win in this league. This is too tough of a league to hand people that many points without having to drive the football."

CAA Special Teams Player of the Week Angelo Babbaro returned the opening second-half kickoff to break a 21-21 tie. Babbaro gained 190-yard kick returns for the Wildcats.

No. 11 Richmond also scored an upset against No. 10 James Madison. Though their rankings are only one spot apart this week, eight spots separated the two teams before the weekend's action.

The win didn't come easy for the Spiders (6-2, 4-1 CAA); they scored the first 17 points and didn't seal the game until Steven Howell intercepted JMU's Rodney Landers with 58 seconds left in the game.

The Dukes (6-2, 4-1 CAA) dropped their first game since their opener against North Carolina on Sept. 1.

Maine snaps losing streak

Maine ended its six-game losing streak on Saturday when it went on the road and beat Northeastern 20-14.

"It's been six long weeks when you're working the way we have to win in this conference," Maine coach Jack Cosgrove said. "We had a series of winning opportunities that we didn't get done late in the game, and we had given up some leads and gone into overtime and just had no success. The most gratifying part of it was that in the fourth quarter we seemed to play our best football."

Maine (2-6, 1-4 CAA) continued to receive significant contributions from running back Jhamal Huellen. The junior rushed for 126 yards and scored the game-winning touchdown at the end of the third quarter.

Timely defense also helped propel the Black Bears to what has been untamiliar territory lately.

The scored was 17-14 in favor of Maine in the fourth quarter when a Northeastern drive was halted due to a Jonathan Calderon interception.

Northeastern (1-7, 0-5 CAA) is still looking for its first conference win. It's unlikely to happen next week when they hit the road to face UNH. Even if Santos were unable to play for the Wildcats, backup R.J. Ionian has thrown four touchdowns and no interceptions this year.

Kaufman leads SLU to win over Spiders

Sophomore goalkeeper Ross Kaufman made seven saves in Saint Louis's 2-0 victory over Richmond.

By Sam Ehrlich
Collegian Staff

No. 15 Saint Louis reclaimed control of the Atlantic 10 this weekend, winning two games to rocket themselves to a 5-1-1 conference record and a hold on first place.

After the two wins, SLU now has a three-game winning streak and a reason for the National Soccer Coaches Association of America (NSCAA) to boost the team's already high ranking.

A-10 Soccer

The Billikens were actually outshot on Friday by the Spiders, 16-13, but behind goalkeeper Ross Kaufman's seven saves and goals by juniors Brandon Barklage and Jimmy Holmes, Saint Louis pulled off a 2-0 victory.

The shutout was the sixth on the season for sophomore Kaufman, who now has 14 shutouts and a 20-5-4 record in goal in his two seasons at SLU.

Offensively, the Billikens took advantage of some rare mistakes from Richmond goalkeeper Eric Scicchetti, whose five saves were two too few for the now 4-9-1 (1-3-0 A-10) Spiders.

SLU's offense had to work to pick up the momentum again on Sunday at George Washington, as GW senior Joachim Walker scored off Kaufman to give his team a first half lead.

However, the Billikens roared back in the second half, scoring three to blow away the Colonials, 3-1, and complete their sweep of their final road trip in the A-10 season. A-10 leading scorer Scott Wisniewski got the ball rolling 1:12 into the second half with his sixth conference goal, and junior Kyle Patterson got the game-winner in the 64th minute.

The Billikens, who are in their third season as a member of the A-10, now lead Fordham and Saint Joseph's by three points and one win. They have claimed at least a share of the regular-season crown in each of their first two seasons in the league, despite rival Rhode Island's beating them in both tournament championship games.

St. Joe's blown out

Dayton picked a great time for a season-high, four-goal performance, as its offensive onslaught came at the expense of former A-10 leader Saint Joseph's.

Saint Joseph's struck first in the defeat, as senior Patrick Duddy scored in the 11th minute to make it 1-0 Hawks. But SJU junior keeper Bryan Benedict was let down by his defense that allowed the Flyers to take 10 shots.

Benedict managed to keep the Hawks in the A-10 race in their next game, stopping Xavier shots for 100 minutes in a 1-0 Sunday victory.

The overtime shutout was his third of the season for the redshirt junior, who now has six shutouts in his two-year collegiate career. All three shutouts this season have come in conference play.

The Hawks will make one last road trip this week-end, facing top-ranked Saint Louis and Charlotte Friday's game, which will pit the top two A-10 teams against each other, may be the last hope for the Hawks to overtake the Billikens and stay in the hunt for the A-10 Tournament's top seed.

La Salle wins again

After a rough start to its A-10 season, La Salle has won three straight to remain competitive for a conference tournament spot.

Junior goalkeeper Andrew Bernhard, who has only given up two goals in the three games, has led the Explorers on the winning streak. He was in especially fine form Sunday, as his 12 saves helped beat Saint Bonaventure, 1-0.

However, without offense, the best Bernhard could do was two 1-0 losses and a scoreless tie. He did get his offense from senior Jeremy Ortiz, who delivered the only goal Sunday, and freshman Ryan Richter, whose team-leading fourth goal proved to be the game-winner in the Explorers' 2-1 win on Friday over Duquesne … … Fordham had a good weekend, taking both games including a 1-0 shutout against Saint Bonaventure Friday and a 3-1 Saturday victory over Duquesne. Grant Kert had his first multi-goal game for the Rams in the latter game while Dan Hajducky stopped two Bonnie shots for his second straight shutout … Temple is now 0-4-1 after losing two games on a rough weekend road trip.

Sam Ehrlich can be reached at sehrlich@student.umass.edu.

Redshirt senior wide receiver J.J. Moore continues to climb the UMass record books in his final season in Amherst. He is now tied with Brandon London with 2,021 yards on the all-time receiving list.

Brown still can't solve UMass penalty issues process. They went into halftime with a 17-13 deficit.

In the second half, however, UMass reduced the number of flags to three for 35 yards – though much of the yardage is attributed to a single pass interference call on cornerback Courtney Robinson.

UMass scored 35 of its 48 points in the second half, including 28 in the fourth quarter to overcome a 24-13 W&M lead in the third quarter.

Rosario misses target

Long snapper and reserve linebacker Cesar Rosario was relieved of his long-snapping duties on Saturday, replaced by Bob McLaughlin.

Rosario struggled with a broken finger, which kept him out of several practices in the week leading up to the game. It appeared to be bothering him on Saturday, as the usually-consistent senior committed two bad snaps that cost the Minutemen points.

The first came on the extra point attempt following Coen's record-breaking touchdown that started the game. Rosario's snap went over the head of holder Scott Woodward, leaving the UMass lead at 6-0.

The second hiccup for Rosario came on a punt in UMass territory. The snap against went off the head of its intended target, this time punter Brett Arnold. The ball was recovered at the UMass 8-yard line, and the Minutemen turned the ball over on downs.

William & Mary scored three plays later to lead 10-6 in the first quarter. Brown lauded McLaughlin's play in relief of Rosario, saying he settled down the kicking unit, which had few problems the rest of the day.

To Rosario's credit, he made a huge play at the end of the game as a linebacker, intercepting Tribe quarterback Jake Phillips, cancelling any last-minute comeback attempt W&M had in mind … Running back Matt Lawrence earned a career-high 186 yards on the ground on Saturday. It was his sixth 100-yard rushing game of the season and the third time this season he has set a new career mark (153 yards against Holy Cross, 175 at Maine) … Defensive end Michael Hanson was a monster on defense Saturday with two sacks and five total tackles, four of which resulted in a loss of yards … Safety Jeremy Miles led all UMass defenders with seven solo tackles.

Cesar Rosario struggled with his long-snapping duties for the Minutemen against the Tribe. He made up for it on defense, however, intercepting a pass from W & M quarterback Jake Phillips late in the game.

It's how you finish

DeRosa ends career by winning A-10 Title

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

The torrential downpours in Philadelphia on Saturday didn't stop senior Christina DeRosa from placing first overall at cross country's Atlantic 10 Championships. The Minutewomen placed sixth while the Minutemen placed third.

DeRosa was named most outstanding performer and received All-Conference honors. Redshirt freshman Shiyi Zan, junior Jesse Regnier and sophomore Andrew McCann also received All-Conference honors.

The Minutemen ranked third in the A-10 polls prior to the meet and placed just that in Saturday's race; although, they were hoping for a second-place finish.

"The course was basically underwater," said Ken O'Brien. He explained that the harsh weather conditions held-back the Minutemen from getting better than third place.

La Salle placed first, followed by Richmond. UMass tied with Duquesne for third.

McCann finished first for the Minutemen in 25 minutes, 53 seconds to take seventh place individually. Close behind McCann was Regnier who took 13th with a time of 26:06.

Finishing out the top five for the Minutemen were sophomore Daniel Barry (22nd), freshman Jeff Hill (24th) and sophomore Jonathan Pierce (25th).

The Minutewomen took sixth out of 14 teams with DeRosa and Zan leading the pack. UMass women's coach Julie LaFreniere hoped for a fourth- or fifth-place finish, but the Minutewomen fell just short of their goal.

"Overall it was a disappointment. It's tough to have everyone at their best," said LaFreniere.

DeRosa was the only returning runner to this race from UMass, and she showed the younger girls how to perform. DeRosa ran the race in 18:27 to finish in first place overall. Last year DeRosa finished in 10th place.

"DeRosa's performance was a culmination of what she's been doing year after year," said LaFreniere. "The course was muddy and chewed up; DeRosa was able to stay composed."

DeRosa beat La Salle's Rachel Papin, who has been the A-10 conference champion for the past three years. Papin is one of the best runners in A-10 conference history, according to LaFreniere.

Papin and DeRosa ran close together for most of the rainy race; but with a mile to go, DeRosa had a 10-15 second lead on Papin.

"She looked great. [She had] one more muddy hill to go up. It didn't look like her little feet were touching the ground," LaFreniere said.

"She deserved it. She's worked so hard for the past four years. This is one of her best performances, but the time won't show it because of the courses conditions. She had the best performance in the conference," LaFreniere said. "Conference coaches were very impressed with what Christina did on Saturday."

Zan followed less than a minute behind DeRosa to take 13th with a time of 19:16. The rest of the women's top five runners were freshman Lauren Stocker (29th), freshman Samantha Sacchetti (57th) and senior Amber Sayer (67th).

"DeRosa and Zan had top performances. Lauren Stocker ran a nice, gutsy race. Fourth place was freshman Sam Sacchetti; she had an outstanding race and I thought she did a great job," LaFreniere said. "You've got to be better prepared mentally to step it up when it comes to the conference race. Our season is not over. I think our runners need to have more confidence and step up to the performances they are capable of having."

The Minutemen and Minutewomen will each have a weekend off to gear up for the NCAA Regional Qualifier in Boston on Nov. 10.

UMass ends fall season on high note

By Sam Ehrlich

A rough beginning turned into a strong finish as the Massachusetts tennis team competed in the three-day Big Green Invitational hosted by Dartmouth in Hanover, NH.

The tournament was a challenge for the Minutewomen, as they took the court against opponents from Dartmouth, Stony Brook, Boston University, Syracuse and Army.

As the weekend went on, the Minutewomen played eight singles matches and four doubles matches each day.

UMass took on Dartmouth on the first day, followed by Stony Brook's singles competitors and Army's doubles teams on Day 2. The tournament then focused on singles play for Day 3, as the team finished with Army's singles opponents.

Dartmouth gave the Minutewomen the most problems, as the team won one match out of eleven singles and doubles on Day 1. However, UMass rallied against the Black Knights and Seawolves on Saturday and Sunday, ending up with winners in two singles matches and three second-place doubles teams by the end of the weekend.

Freshman Kaitlyn Carpenter and sophomore Laura Murillo were the leaders of singles play, taking first-place finishes in the No. 4 and 6 singles, respectively.

Carpenter beat runner-up Carly Markovitz by 11 points to win her tournament, while Murillo rallied late to beat the rest of the pack, 28-24. Both second-place finishers were from host Dartmouth.

As for doubles play, the combination of junior Masha Pozar and Candyence Boney continued to thrive, taking second in the first doubles bracket, while Murillo and Tanisha Hodgson took second in the second bracket.

However, senior captain Kristin DiPiero led the way for UMass, who, despite not finishing first in any tournament, failed to lose a singles match and helped the doubles teams after switching from singles following Day 1.

The big day for UMass was Day 2, as the Minutewomen flattened the Seawolves to vault them higher in the point standings. Pozar and Boney led the way, defeating Stony Brook's Paola Rodolfi and Claudia Samai. Hodgson, Murillo and DiPiero also beat their opposition in singles play.

This is the second straight year that UMass has competed in Hanover.

The invitational last year was more traditional with singles and doubles brackets instead of this year's point system. This weekend's tournament ends the fall season for the Minutewomen, who will resume play with a home dual match against Boston College Feb. 2 in Amherst.

Coen breaks UM TD pass record with 52

Moore fourth to crack 2,000

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts football team finally has a storied quarterback it can call its own.

Redshirt junior Liam Coen is now the all-time leader in touchdown passes in UMass history, a feat he accomplished on the first play from scrimmage of a wild 48-34 victory on Saturday at William & Mary.

A 60-yard bomb to Rasheed Rancher – the longest play of the season – represented Coen's 52nd career touchdown pass, one that placed him one better than UMass great Todd Bankhead, who quarterbacked the 1998 NCAA National Championship team.

The play came 16 seconds into the first quarter and put UMass ahead early, though the lead changed hands several times throughout the game.

Coen hit Rancher again in the second quarter and then threw a third score to tight end Ian Jorgensen as part of a 21-point run by the Minutemen that carried from late in the third to midfourth quarter.

Coen now has 54 career touchdown passes in a maroon and white uniform, and is sure to build on that number the rest of this season and next season as well – his senior year.

Bankhead's 51 touchdown passes were recorded in just two seasons, 1998-99, which says something about UMass's passing history that a two-year starter held the mark for nearly a decade. However, that has all changed now that Coen holds the record with more than a year left to play.

Bankhead's 7,018 yards passing is still far and away the career record, but Coen's 5,163 yards passing is not far off. This is likely another record Coen could reach before his UMass career is over.

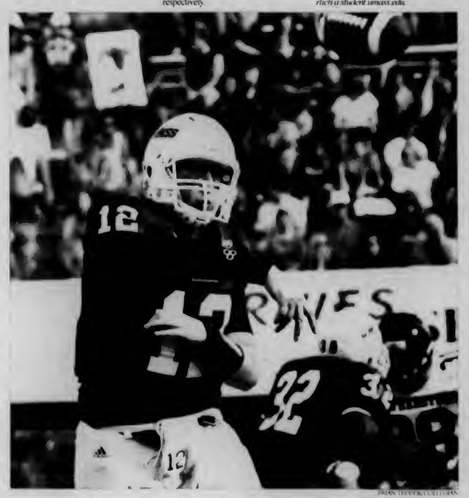
UMass Football

MOORE OFTEN THAN NOT

Wide receiver J.J. Moore has been UMass's go-to receiver this season, and continues to stamp the UMass star logo; this time becoming the fourth receiver in school history to surpass the 2,000-yard receiving mark.

Moore's 79 yards receiving on five catches on Saturday put him at 2,021 in his four-year career. Ironically, Brandon London, the team's leading receiver the past two seasons, finished his career with 2,022 yards, so Moore needs just one more yard to be his former teammate and two yards to pass to reach third all-time on the UMass receiving list.

The Minutemen's all-time receiver leader, Adrian Zullo (1998-2002), racked-up 2,892 yards in his career, so Moore would need over 800 yards through the remainder of the regular season and any potential playoff games to take the career mark away from Zullo.



However, Jason Peebler's 2,395 yards from 2001-2004 is second in UMass history and a more reachable milestone for Moore this season.

MINUTEMAN MISCUES

UMass coach Don Brown once again defended his team's sloppy play Saturday, saying the penalties the team commits are something they must work through, rather than completely eliminate.

On Saturday, that's exactly what they did. The Minutemen committed six penalties in the first half, losing 45 yards in the

GEO contract talks continue

Negotiations heading into 11th month

By Katrina Cessna
Collegian Correspondent

Members of the bargaining teams representing the Graduate Employment Organization (GEO) and the University of Massachusetts are gearing up as contract negotiations are set to enter their 11th month.

GEO is proposing a wage increase for all graduate students, equivalent to five percent of each student's current rate of pay. This increase, according to GEO's Web site, will be necessary to offset the cost of mandatory graduate student fees, which have increased by over 50 percent to $8,969 over the last five years.

In addition to this "across the board" increase, GEO is proposing the allocation of an additional one percent to establish a health and welfare fund.

While the University's contract proposal provides for a 2.5 percent increase in wages, half of what the GEO is asking for, it does provide for the creation of the one-percent pool.

Swati Birla, a second-year student in the sociology graduate program and a member of the GEO staff, explained that this fund, to be paid for with state money, channeled through the University, will be used to "decrease disparity" caused by wage differentials across departments.

Birla explained that the fund would be administered by GEO under the current proposal, with money parceled out among students earning $18.25 per hour, the minimum rate of pay for graduate students, to help bring their standard of living closer to that of students in some of the other departments, where the rate of pay can be as much as $23 per hour.

The second proposal involves Memorandum of Understanding Number 6, or MOU 6, which pertains to diversity funding. GEO is bargaining for the release, by the University, of two semi-annual reports on fund allocation and diversity each year.

According to the GEO Web site, the reports will include a "detailed budgetary break down of the fund allocation for the previous fiscal year" and "a demographic description of the current graduate student body by race, class, gender, nationality, in-state out-of-state status, [and] field of study."

According to Birla, the semi-annual reports will be used to ensure "transparent and equitable distribution of funds."

Concerns about accuracy stem partially from the fact that funds are appropriated via the Development Office at UMass, rather than directly through GEO, and partially from the dissatisfaction expressed by GEO members with the University's definition of diversity. The current definition, according to Birla, makes funds available "to any person of color of talent."

In addition to the release of the semi-annual reports, GEO is proposing that the $500,000 diversity fund be increased to $1.1 million.

According to their Web site, GEO is also proposing that at least one fellowship be awarded in each department, and that these fellowships be well-publicized in recruitment information disseminated by the University.

The third proposal pertains to

CSC asks for student input

Members of the Chancellor Search Committee held meetings in the Campus Center yesterday to discuss what qualities students want in a new UMass chancellor.

By Frank Vetare

What do you want in a chancellor?

That – the question the Chancellor Search Committee (CSC) asked University of Massachusetts students this week.

The CSC held open meetings with graduate and undergraduate students on Monday, which were chaired by Trustee Jennifer O'Brien-Caras, a UMass alumna who graduated in 1980.

Fewer than 10 students attended the undergraduate meeting, held from 1:45-2:45 p.m. in the Campus Center. Those who went, however, were very vocal in what they were looking for in a new chancellor.

Concerns over Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) dominated the first part of the meeting, with students stressing the importance of the next chancellor's willingness and ability to work with students on increasing University support for student organizations.

Student cited the fact that the Student Union Ballroom could no longer be used for cultural dances as an example of the troubles campus RSOs faced.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts recently passed a law requiring a $5 million sprinkler system be installed in the Student Union, and while there are similar venues on campus, they carry heavy fees.

Campus graded on 'green' performance

By Ashley Colombo
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has improved its green practices and policies over the past year, according to the newly released College Sustainability Report Card 2008.

The report card gave UMass a "C" as its overall grade.

The 2nd annual report evaluated not only the green practices, but also the endowment investments of 200 leading public and private universities with endowment assets totaling over $343 billion.

Each school is graded on the administration, climate and energy change, food and recycling, green building, transportation, endowment transparency, investment priorities and shareholder engagement.

According to the report, UMass Amherst is among 45 percent of colleges "committing to fight climate change through cutting carbon emissions" in what is referred to as a "green groundswell."

The University received a "B" in climate and energy change, citing the new central heating plant set to be finished in 2008, that will provide electricity to most of campus. The plant is projected to help lower emissions using cogeneration as well as pollution control technology. The new plant will be located on the west side of the Mullins Center.

UMass also received "B"s in the categories of green building, transportation and food and recycling. The report mentions UMass'

$1 billion in capital granted to UMass

Massachusetts Governor Deval Patrick signed a bill earlier this month approving a 10-year, $2 billion higher education bond toward Massachusetts public colleges and universities.

The bill is part of the Public Higher Education Endowment Incentive Program, which tries to boost private donations by providing 50 cents in matching state funds for every dollar the public campuses raise.

The legislation approved by Patrick authorizes $1 billion of capital improvements toward the five campuses of the University of Massachusetts and $1 billion for improvements at all the other state and community colleges of Massachusetts.

"This administration is committed to providing our students the highest quality public education possible so that they are prepared to compete with their peers across the country and throughout the world," Gov. Patrick said. "If we ask our students to put forth their best effort to succeed then we must be willing to invest in the tools to help them – their laboratories, their classrooms and their libraries."

The bill has not yet authorized a specific amount of money toward the proposed projects, in order to allow flexibility in the

As the 2008 presidential election draws closer, many students at the University of Massachusetts do not know how and where to get the information they need on the candidates to cast an educational vote.

Enter Votegopher.com, a new Web site created by Harvard student William Ruben that's focused on delivering current election issues to a young audience.

Launched in early October, the Web site gives comparative stances on the political issues, individual views, and personal details of all of the candidates. It also provides recent news articles, videos, blogs, opinions and quotes pertaining to the election. The Votegopher.com team has been currently working to add sections that help people register to vote and to fill out absentee ballots.

Patrick backs future presence of UM facility in Springfield

By Jennifer Dennon
Collegian Staff

State official Daniel O'Connell visited the University of Massachusetts Amherst campus Monday to discuss University research and campus connections in Springfield.

Daniel O'Connell, state secretary of the Executive Office of Housing and Economic Development, met with campus officials to propose future campus relations in Springfield, research and development in the sciences, and the latest advances in clean energy development and technology.

O'Connell met with regional leaders and economic development officials to report on the network of connections linking UMass with schools, business, and research activities in Springfield. The meeting primarily focused on the education and economic relations between the University and Springfield.

Though Springfield already has higher education institutions, such as Western New England College, O'Connell believes UMass should establish a classroom presence in the city.

According to O'Connell, having a UMass facility in Springfield would increase educational opportunities for Springfield residents as well as bring in new retail businesses.

The addition of a UMass facility in downtown Springfield fits the backing of the administration of Gov. Deval Patrick.

"Good things happen to Massachusetts when our academic and research institutions get together," said O'Connell.

UMass's association in Springfield have proven successful in the past, most notably with the Pioneer Valley Life Science Institute, located in

Car seat saves child during plane crash

A 3-year-old girl found alive in the upside-down wreckage of an airplane survived because she was strapped in a car seat, rescuers said. They said they knew she was OK when she cried for her teddy bear.

Sunday's crash killed Kate Williams' pilot-grandfather, Allen D. Williams, 65, and another passenger, authorities said.

The plane was found nose down and flipped over in the icy water at the edge of a riverbank in the rugged mountains of southeast British Columbia.

"What saved her life was being strapped into that car seat," said Mike Plonka, a member of Golden's search-and-rescue team. "You could see that she was very scared. Her big concern at the time was her little teddy bear. She didn't want to leave without it.

"She was just pointing at it and calling it 'Baby,'" he said Monday.

The girl suffered head injuries but was listed as stable, hospital officials in Golden said. She was reunited with her parents.

Police said the Cessna 172 was on its way to Edmonton when it took off from Golden around 1 p.m. Sunday into low clouds and snow. Visibility was poor.

An hour later, the Search and Rescue Centre in Victoria picked up the plane's emergency transmitter signal from somewhere near the Blaeberry River.

A team using a hand-held beacon locator found the wreckage, and two military search and rescue technicians — Sgt. Scott Elliston and Master Cpl. Bruno Lapointe — landed nearby in a helicopter.

As they checked for survivors, they discovered the girl alive but surrounded by debris in the back of the plane. The two soldiers tried to remove her from the wreckage, but she made it clear she didn't want to leave without her teddy bear.

"I got her out and I handed her to Bruno. She was calling out for her teddy, hear. I picked up the teddy bear to give it to her but it was covered in snow. She wasn't too happy that it was covered in snow so I brushed it off," Elliston said.

Williams was CEO and founder of Edmonton-based A.D. Williams Engineering Inc. The passenger who was killed, Steven F. Sutton, was chief financial officer. The two had been attending a business retreat in Golden.

The cause of the accident was under investigation.

Bush has mental health challenged

Democratic presidential candidate Dennis Kucinich questioned President Bush's mental health in light of comments he made about a nuclear Iran precipitating World War III.

"I seriously believe we have to start asking questions about his mental health," Kucinich, an Ohio congressman, said in an interview with The Philadelphia Inquirer's editorial board Tuesday. "There's something wrong. He does not seem to understand his words have real impact."

Kucinich, known for his liberal views, trails far behind the leading candidates in most Democratic polls. He was in Philadelphia for a debate at Drexel University.

Bush made the remarks at a news conference earlier this month.

He said: "I've told people that if you're interested in avoiding World War III, it seems like you ought to be interested in preventing them (Iran) from having the knowledge necessary to make a nuclear weapon."

Kucinich said he doesn't believe his comments about the president's mental health are irresponsible, according to a story, posted on the newspaper's Web site.

"You cannot be a president of the United States who's wanton in his expression of violence," Kucinich said. "There's a lot of people who need care. He might be one of them. If there isn't something wrong with him, then there's something wrong with us. This, to me, is a very serious question."

Military casualties in Oct. lowest in nearly two years

By Kim Gamel
Associated Press

The monthly toll of U.S. service members who have died in Iraq is on track to being the lowest in nearly two years, with at least 36 troop deaths recorded as of Tuesday, but the military cautioned it's too early to declare a long-term trend.

Iraqi civilians, meanwhile, faced more attacks on Tuesday.

At least four mortar rounds slammed into a village near Saddam Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, killing a woman and wounding five other civilians, police said.

In Baghdad, gunmen in a speeding car tossed a hand grenade into a crowd of shoppers in eastern Baghdad, killing one person and wounding five, according to an officer in the capital. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to release the information.

At least 36 American service members have died so far in October, nearly a quarter from non-combat causes. Among them were three soldiers killed Tuesday when a bomb exploded as they patrolled southeast Baghdad, the military said.

It is the lowest number since 31 troops died in March 2006 and the second-lowest since 35 troop deaths in March 2005, according to an Associated Press count based on military figures.

That would be the second consecutive drop in monthly figures, after 65 Americans died in September and 84 in August.

In all, at least 3,842 members of the U.S. military have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003, according to the AP count.

Maj. Winfield Danielson, a military spokesman in Baghdad, pointed to a number of likely reasons for the decline, including a U.S. security push that has driven militants out of former safe havens and a change in strategy that has placed troops closer to the population. That, in turn, has caused a rise in the number of tips from residents about roadside bombs and other dangers.

He also singled out the ceasefire call by radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who in August ordered his fighters to cease attacks against U.S.-led forces and other Iraqis for up to six months. Danielson said Iraqi forces also were increasingly taking charge of security operations.

He welcomed the lower numbers but stressed it was too early to say it was a downward trend.

"Have we turned a corner? It might be a little too early to say that," he said. "It's certainly encouraging."

In August, the U.S. Army expressed concern that repeated deployments and tours of duty that have been stretched to 15 months were putting increasing pressure on military families and creating record suicide rates among soldiers.

All-freshman dorms, image of UMass campus discussed

Aaron Buford, president of the Student Government Association, spoke of the role that RSOs play in maintaining student tradition at U Mass.

"The RSOs are so fundamental to how our experiences are going to be enriched here on campus," he told the committee.

Discussion over dormitory life, especially the practice of all-freshman dorms, played a large role in the meeting. Students present were very vocal in their opposition to these programs and questioned why student input had not been sought before the implementation of the residence hall programs. The issue underscored for the students the need to establish good relations between the student body and the chancellor's office.

Brad DeLharnett, president of the UMass Republican Club, also cited the all-freshman dorms when stating that one of the new chancellor's duties should be to change UMass's image as a party school.

"Southwest has been a huge problem for the University historically with so many freshmen living there," he said.

Other students agreed, stating that some of the irresponsible and harmful behavior that many college freshmen fall prey to may, at least be toned down by contact with the more experienced upperclassmen.

Also discussed at the meeting was the need for the next chancellor to be adept at securing more funding, especially from the state, for the school. SGA members mentioned the increases in fees students faced due to a lack of state and private financial support.

Any prospective candidate for the position of the chancellor, the students said, would need to have both political tact and the willingness to work with everyone involved with UMass, not just the administration. Students also voiced the opinion that the next chancellor should be one from the area, as the political and social ties such a person would have could greatly benefit the school.

The graduate student meeting was also sparsely attended. The topics discussed centered mainly on the new chancellor's ability to value the graduate community on campus as highly as the undergraduate community. Specifically mentioned were issues with housing space for graduates.

The CSC reiterated throughout the meetings that it would continue to take suggestions and encouraged participation from anyone who had a stake in the campus. The CSC also mentioned its Web site, http://www.massachusetts.edu/umhers/search/, where students can submit a form with their input.

"I just want to assure you it's not a black hole," said Braceras, referring to the online submissions. "We will read them all."

Graduate fair held in Student Union

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

It's time to figure out what you're going to do the rest of your life: the Five College Graduate and Professional Schools Information Day 2007 will be hosted today in the Student Union Ballroom.

The graduate fair will be an opportunity for interested students to meet one-on-one with representatives from over 125 graduate programs, and view a wide range of other post-baccalaureate options, both national and worldwide.

The medical, dental, law, education and international relations fields will all be represented. The subjects of social work and theology will also be featured, as well as the emerging field of library science.

Faculty and students from American University, Brown, Boston University, Colombia, Georgetown, Harvard, Boston College, NYU, Northeastern and hundreds of other schools will be attending, along with representatives from the Peace Corps and the U.S. Army.

The event will run from 10:00 a.m. until 3:00 p.m., and is highly recommended for anyone considering enrolling in graduate school within a year or two.

Asked if they would use the Web site as a basis for their selection this year, all three UMass students agreed.

University seeks shortened contract cycle

subsidized child care. Initially, amid allegations of the facility's expired lease and need for renovations, GEO proposed the construction of a new child care center. Currently, their demands have been reduced to an increase in funding, from $60,000 to $75,000 per year.

The final item, in response to the University's proposal to eliminate insurance co-pay caps, calls for maintenance of the previous contract's health care provisions.

Birla, who was also one of nine members of the bargaining committee last year, says the previously described contention over the four areas of the forthcoming contract is further complicated by the University's proposal to shorten the contract term from three years to one. Birla explains further that this shortened contract cycle will result in GEO members "constantly negotiating."

Many members of GEO are already feeling this burden. "We feel like we've been at the bargaining table for too long," says Christopher Hamilton, a member of the GEO staff and a second-year student in the Social Justice Education graduate program. "We've made a huge move in their [the University's] direction by proposing a one-year contract."

Until negotiations are satisfactorily completed, the GEO will "continue ramping up the escalations," Hamilton said.

Edward F. Blaguszewski, director of news and information at UMass, was unwilling to comment on the status of bargaining efforts, citing University policy.

With regard to all contract negotiations, Blaguszewski explained, "[the University] believes it is most constructive to keep the negotiations between the parties and come to an agreement in that way."

As bargaining efforts approach the one-year mark, Blaguszewski was willing to express hope that the negotiations "come to a fruitful conclusion" and said the University is "looking forward to reaching that stage."

Members of the GEO, shown here at a demonstration earlier in the semester, have pledged to continue "ramping up the escalations" until negotiations with UMass are completed.

The University has demonstrated some flexibility recently, especially in proposing a 15-month contract mid-October, which represents a three-month extension from its initial proposal of a one-year contract.

The GEO Web site explains that this is "a great advantage" because it would allow the next contract to expire at the end of September, as opposed to during the summer, when members are less likely to be concentrated in one place.

Despite a favorable nod, the Web site nonetheless denounces the move as "more of a compromise on our part than the University's" which will not be enough to prevent GEO from continuing efforts "outside of the bargaining room."

Graduate students at UMass have been represented by GEO, a unit of UAW (United Auto Workers) Local 2322, since they voted in favor of unionization in November of 1990. The first GEO contract with UMass took effect after a 10-day strike in November of 1991. The most recent contract took effect July 1, 2004 and expired June 30, 2007.

The GEO Web site puts current GEO membership at around 2,500 students.

UMass one of many schools focused on recycling programs for paper, cans and cardboard, and is also among 70 percent of college campuses that purchases food from local farms. UMass buys 20 percent of its food from local farmers, as well as hosts "The Tastes of the World Chef Culinary Conference," an annual event highlighting chefs that use sustainable foods.

An 'A' was given to UMass in administration. The report card noted that President Jack Wilson had signed the Presidents Climate Commitment, along with the chancellors of the other UMass campuses.

UMass also has an advisory committee which oversees sustainable initiatives with staff, faculty, and student participation, according to the report card, and designated coordinators to lead sustainability efforts.

UMass, whose endowment totals $260 million, received an 'F' on endowment transparency and shareholder engagement, the two categories with the lowest overall grades of all the universities graded. The UMass report card states, "the UMass Foundation Web site offers annual reports that describe endowment performance and total assets, but does not provide detailed information regarding specific endowment holdings or shareholder voting records."

The title of College Sustainability Leaders was given to Harvard, Dartmouth, the University of Washington, Middlebury, Carleton, and the University of Vermont, all of which received an overall grade of 'A-.'

The Julliard School Howard University, Regent University, and Samford University were the only four schools to receive an 'F' as their overall grade.

Grades for each category were decided by "reviewing publicly available information, conducting surveys of appropriate school officials, and then assessing performance across 39 indicators in eight main categories," according to the Sustainable Endowments Institute.

The Institute is a project of Rockefeller Philanthropy Advisors.

The College Sustainability Report Card 2008 is published as part of the Institute's expansive efforts to "encourage discussion on sustainability in higher education." The entire report can be found at http://www.endowmentinstitute.org/sustainability.

budget in case of emergency projects that arise over the next 10 years.

Renovation and new building projects are in the works at every state and community college in the Commonwealth, as well as all five UMass campuses. The Board of Higher Education (BHE), the Board of Trustees of the University of Massachusetts and the Commonwealth's capital facilities agency all determined distinct projects that were prioritized as top capital improvements.

Since public education is a primary part of Patrick's political platform, especially higher education, this bill benefits all the students enrolled in the Commonwealth's public colleges and universities.

"The Board of Higher Education applauds the governor for his significant support of capital projects on our public college and university campuses," said Patricia J. Plummer, the BHE's chancellor. "We are particularly pleased to see that every single college and campus within the Commonwealth's public higher education system will benefit from this historic piece of legislation."

The administration of the UMass system has acknowledged the continuing financial support allocated by Patrick to the University, and has set aside $187.5 million over the next five years as part of the Public Higher Education Endowment Incentive Program.

"We commend the governor for his continued strong support for UMass and his understanding of the University's capital needs," said Jack M. Wilson, president of the UMass system. "The University of Massachusetts has developed an ambitious capital plan, because we know that investing in top-notch facilities across our campuses will allow us to continue to attract the best students and the best faculty.

"Today's announcement is an important step in meeting our capital needs, and we look forward to working with the Patrick administration and the legislature to continue to make critical investments in building upgrades and new facilities across our five campuses," he continued.

US Navy engages, sinks two pirate ships off African coast

By Edward Harris
Associated Press

A U.S. Navy destroyer helped sailors who retook control of their vessel Tuesday in a deadly battle with pirates after the North Korean-flagged ship was hijacked in the piracy-plagued waters off Somalia, the American military said.

The Navy also confirmed that other American warships sank two pirate skiffs late Sunday after answering a distress call from a hijacked Japanese chemical tanker and said U.S. ships were still monitoring that vessel.

In Tuesday's incident, a helicopter flew from the destroyer USS James E. Williams to investigate a phoned-in tip of a hijacked ship and demanded by radio that the pirates give up their weapons, the military said in a statement.

The crew of the Dai Hong Dan then overwhelmed the hijackers, leaving two pirates dead, according to preliminary reports, and five captured, the military said.

Three seriously injured crew members were taken aboard the Williams, the statement said. The captured pirates remained on the Dai Hong Dan, which the crew was returning to the port of Mogadishu, Somalia's capital.

"When we get a distress call, we help," said Cmdr. Lydia Robertson, spokeswoman for the U.S. 5th Fleet, told The Associated Press by telephone from Manama, Bahrain.

Defense Department spokesman Geoff Morrell said the incident didn't indicate the U.S. military was taking a more aggressive stance toward pirates off Somalia, but added that piracy in the Horn of Africa region is a concern because "you're talking about an area that has seen greater terrorist involvement."

Morrell said it was logical that the military would want to know "what is being transported on the high seas and who is out there operating and if they have nothing but the best intentions in mind."

A Navy spokeswoman, Lt. Jessica Gandy, said later that the American destroyer had not been shadowing the North Korean ship. She said it was not known what its cargo was.

Andrew Mwangura, program coordinator of the Seafarers Assistance Program, said an estimated 22 crew members were aboard the North Korea-flagged ship that gunmen seized late Monday in Somali waters. His group independently monitors piracy in the region. Workers at the Mogadishu port said the vessel had delivered a load of sugar from India.

The USS James E. Williams, a U.S. Navy destroyer, helped the crew of a North Korean vessel to repel pirates yesterday.

An international watchdog reported this month that pirate attacks worldwide jumped 14 percent in the first nine months of 2007, with the biggest increases in the poorly policed waters of Somalia and Nigeria.

Reported attacks in Somali waters rose to 26, up from eight a year earlier, the London-based International Maritime Bureau said through its piracy reporting center in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia.

The U.S. Navy said warships in a coalition monitoring the waters near Somalia were following the hijacked Japanese tanker Golden Nori and that four other vessels were still controlled by pirates near Somalia.

Robertson, the 5th Fleet spokesman, said coalition ships fired on and sank two pirate skiffs tied to the Golden Nori Sunday night. A Navy photo showed one of the skiffs burning after being hit by a gun aboard the USS Porter, a guided-missile destroyer.

Robertson could not confirm CNN reports Tuesday that the Japanese tanker was filled with highly flammable benzene. But she said, "We were aware of what was on the (Golden Nori) ship when we fired."

CNN said the USS Arleigh Burke, another guided-missile destroyer, was also involved in the operation and had entered Somali waters with the approval of the government. Robertson said she could not confirm the report because the operation was continuing.

Somalia has had 16 years of violence and anarchy and is now led by a government battling to establish authority even in the capital. Its coasts are virtually unpoliced.

Piracy off Somalia increased this year after Ethiopian forces backing Somali government troops ousted an Islamic militia in December, said Mwangura at the Seafarers Assistance Program.

During the six months that the Council of Islamic Courts ruled most of southern Somalia, where Somali pirates are based, piracy abated, Mwangura said.

At one point, the Islamic group said it was sending dozens of fighters to crack down on pirates. Islamic fighters stormed a hijacked United Arab Emirates-registered ship and recaptured it after a gunbattle in which pirates — but no crew members — were reportedly wounded.

Force-feeding tolerance

Ben Duffy

Vincent and Pauline Matherick fought the law, and the law won. The English couple took a stand against a new "anti-discrimination" law in Britain, and now they will lose their 11-year-old foster son.

The Mathericks have cared for the 11-year-old for two years and have taken care of 28 children since volunteering for foster care in 2001. After the British government passed the Sexual Orientation Regulations in 2006, they found themselves morally unable to continue raising children within the foster care system. The retired couple will now be allowed custody of any more children.

The reason? The Mathericks would not sign a pledge stating that they would sit their 11-year-old down and tell him that homosexual relationships are as acceptable as heterosexual relationships.

Mr. and Mrs. Matherick refused on the grounds that it violates their religious beliefs to teach that sodomy is acceptable behavior. Religious beliefs? What on earth would make the Mathericks believe that religious beliefs are sacred enough to warrant the respect of the government?

"We have never discriminated against anybody, but I cannot preach the benefits of homosexuality when I believe it is against the word of God," said Mr. Matherick.

The social services department denied Mrs. Matherick's request that the child remain with them until a permanent home could be found. The child will be place in a social services hostel instead.

When I have children, I don't plan to tell them that homosexuality is morally acceptable, because I don't think it is. But I better not say that too loudly, lest the Thought Police arrest me and charge me with a "hate crime."

Let's get something straight – having a moral or religious objection to a certain type of sexual behavior is not "discrimination," "homophobia" or "hate," and it certainly isn't grounds to take foster children away from a loving family.

It's never enough for the homosexual lobby to do what they do "behind closed doors," as they like to put it. No, the whole world has to approve of it, too. Everyone from the mayor to the parish priest has to celebrate their deviant sexuality.

The Mathericks have to tell their foster son that it's perfectly OK to sleep with men, even if the Mathericks themselves have a moral objection to it. That's what the government has demanded, and it's "discrimination" not to acquiesce.

Apparently, Tinker v. Des Moines doesn't apply when homosexuals are involved.

Militant homosexuals are seeking to criminalize all opposition to their lifestyle under the fallacy that anyone who disapproves of what they do is "discriminating."

In order to combat the phantom menace of devout Christians, the homosexual movement has appointed itself the deputies of the Thought Police, Speech Police, and Religion Police.

It is now illegal in Saskatchewan, Canada, to print Bible verses in the newspaper if homosexuals find those verses offensive. Hugh Owens of Regina, Saskatchewan, took out an advertisement in the newspaper in response to a recent gay pride parade.

World Net Daily explains, "The ad's theme was that the Bible says no to homosexual behavior. It listed the references to four Bible passages, Romans 1, Leviticus 18:22, Leviticus 20:13 and 1 Corinthians 6:9-10 on the left side. An equal sign was placed between the verse references and a drawing of two males holding hands overtaid with the universal nullification symbol – a red circle with a diagonal bar."

Three gay men brought Owens and the newspaper to court, claiming that they had violated the Saskatchewan Human Rights Code. They were found guilty and forced to pay $1,500 (Canadian) to the men. I wonder – are the rights of free speech, free press, and free exercise of religion contained in the Saskatchewan Human Rights Code? Guess not.

Saskatchewan appears to recognize only the right of two consenting adults to sodomize each other, but not the rights of other adults to disapprove of it.

The trend is coming to our country as well. Tyler Chase Harper, a San Diego high school student, wore a T-shirt with the words "Homosexuality is shameful" and "Romans 1:27" to school on the same day that another student group was holding a vigil to protest harassment of homosexual students.

Harper was unlawfully punished. I guess his high school had never heard of Tinker v. Des Moines, the landmark 1969 Supreme Court case that addressed free speech in public schools.

The case concerned two high school students who wore black armbands to school to protest the Vietnam War. The majority opinion stated: "Students do not shed their constitutional rights at the schoolhouse gate, and therefore are entitled to the free expression of their views as long as there is no substantial or material interference of the educational process."

Harper brought his case to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals and lost. He is now waiting to hear if the Supreme Court will consider his case.

Apparently, Tinker v. Des Moines doesn't apply when homosexuals are involved. The rest of us have to grow a thick skin and accept that other people are legally allowed to express viewpoints that we might fervently disagree with.

When homosexuals object to something, everyone else's rights go flying out the window. The gay rights movement, in their quest for "rights," have become one of the greatest threats to civil liberties.

A message that should have been heard

Parisa Sarani

It was 6:30 p.m. when I reached the Stockbridge Hall to see Dahr Jamail speak about his book "Beyond the Green Zone: Dispatches from an Unembedded Journalist in Occupied Iraq."

Right away, the first disappointment of the night hit me when I saw a small and scattered crowd of students and local residents waiting outside and in the lobby.

There have been countless protests and peace rallies here at UMass. Yet indeed, it hasn't been enough, and I'm afraid that it's getting late.

Where was the overwhelming crowd I had wished for?

By 7:15 p.m., the crowd settled down and a CAN (Campus Antiwar Network) representative who constantly mispronounced "Iraq" spoke about the numerous speak-outs and accomplishments of the network. I wonder if it's even important to be an advocate of peacemaking in a country while pronouncing its name incorrectly.

Finally Jamail came, and greeted the audience. The independent journalist, who traveled to Iraq for eight months and has covered the Middle East for four years, began to speak about his anger of how little coverage the situation in the Middle East gets, and how vague that coverage is.

He quoted facts, read off the death counts and pointed out various necessities that were not being supplied to Iraqi civilians and the troops. For example, he mentioned that hospitals face critical shortages of medicine, supplies and equipment. In addition, hospital raids by U.S. military forces prevent doctors from providing care.

He added that clean water is scarce, raw sewage is common, and diseases, including diarrhea, typhoid, cholera and hepatitis, pose a growing threat to public health.

Blah, blah, blah. Who wants to know about all these depressing facts?

But Jamail was there, when all was said and done, to sell his book. So, he began to read. Jamail recounted stories of endless lines for gasoline. Sometimes waiting for two days is the only option Iraqis have, in a time that electricity in much of the country is available for only three hours a day.

People were quiet at that moment; no one was moving. Some couples were holding hands; those with tougher skins comforted those startled by Jamail's claims. And by the time he moved on to the next passage about a child whose chest was blown wide open by a sniper, I could hear sniffles from behind and around me. No one was breathing when he read that while the doctors were trying to sew the child up – without any anesthesia – the child was vomiting on the hands of the doctor, the nurses holding him.

"Only if the entire school, this town, the entire state of Massachusetts, and the whole nation were hearing these, there would be no war today," I thought to myself.

I wish I had seen a full house in that auditorium. I wish there were lines after lines of students, faculty, and residents who were there because they want to know how disturbing the war is. Why wasn't this event better advertised? Is it because there was no free pizza or extra credit for the students?

Dahr Jamail is not professionally trained to be a journalist. I hope this wasn't the reason that he did not get big publicity for coming to UMass among the communication and the journalism departments.

There have been countless protests and peace rallies here at UMass. Yet indeed, it hasn't been enough, and I'm afraid that it's getting late. It's important to appreciate all those who take the time to participate in any type of such activities or those who are directly involved. Even last week, those who had come to see an independent journalist speak about his first-hand experiences in the combat zone are worthy of praise.

Yet, my mind sets on those who for some reason weren't there. I don't want to believe that their absence also means that they are not aware of the disturbing facts or that they are not doing anything to stop the invasion. I just fear that – in contrast to all those big numbers of dead and injured American soldiers and Iraqi people – our numbers are small. Student movements throughout history, and especially during the war in Vietnam, have attested to be very influential.

Unembedded war journalist Dahr Jamail recently spoke at the University about the American media's coverage of the war in Iraq. However, his message has not been heard by the community at large.

Let's not forget how opposition to Vietnam War began slowly and in small numbers in 1964 on various college campuses in the United States. CAN is a great example of what some students have done by organizing meetings and a few speak-outs throughout the campus.

Similar to Jamail's statements at the end of his speech, I don't want to bombard my reader with a bunch of depressing information. I have hope and am confident in the awareness all my fellow UMass students. I have faith in their ability, attentiveness and in their power to stand up for peace and justice.

We are lucky to be able to live and study in such place where most sides of social and political issues are represented. The only requirement is to take notice of what is happening, and take measures to stop it.

A LACK OF ACCOUNTABILITY

Dear Editor:

The UMass Office of the Bursar irresponsibly sent an e-mail to thousands of students Oct. 26 warning that "failure to pay your 2007 fees has resulted in registration hold."

Knowing there's a $50 fee for not paying on time motivated me to go look into my file for my stub that proved I had paid on time. I wrote to the Bursar's office saying there was a mistake, and they replied with an apology.

I'm still angry. I spent about 15 minutes into clarifying this thing with them. I wonder how many collective hours we have lost today due to this incident. Their e-mail said, "If after reviewing your information, you still have questions regarding your outstanding balance, please contact the Bursar's office." I say: They should review their information first and when they are sure they got it right, then they can proceed to send warnings.

DEFENDING 'POWER AND CLASS'

Dear Editor:

Re: "Minutemen Come Marching Home," Brian Wood: Arts & Living, Oct. 26, 2007

In a review of the Multibands Concert, Mr. Wood committed a serious disservice to the marching band. I am absolutely amazed that a student would not know the name of the largest group on campus, a group that has carried this name for over the last 30 years!

Shame on you and your editor for allowing this to be printed. This was an act of lazy journalism. "Pride and Glory of New England," indeed, maybe you should have done a moment of research if you weren't sure.

You have done a great disservice to one of the hardest working institutions on campus. If you feel any remorse, why don't you spend a week at band practice (Monday through Friday 4:40 p.m. behind the Mullins Center) and then spend the next game day, Nov. 10, with them (report at 8 a.m. at the same location, plan on being dismissed at approximately 5 p.m.).

Maybe spending that much time with the band will help you understand why they have the right to call themselves "The Power and Class of New England."

Please use a recent picture of the band uniforms in future issues, they have only been wearing them for about four or five years now.

NUANCED UNDERSTANDING

Dear Editor:

Re: "No War on Terror for Turkey," Ed Op Oct 29, 2007

Ted Rogers is living proof that being a college student does not bestow nuanced understanding. His column demonstrates a clear lack of subtlety and geopolitical reality.

Let me dispense with an agreement: Yes, the PKK are, indeed, terrorists against the Turks. On that, Rogers and I will agree. However, the agreement stops there. Unlike al-Qaida, religious fanatics whose goal is the creation of a global Islamic caliphate, the PKK are Kurds, fighting for a homeland for their ethnic group.

While we can disagree with their use of violence to do the same, one must wonder where Rogers stands on the Palestinians' use of violence against Israel. Does he deplore the use of homicide bombings against soft targets such as pizza parlors? Or does he accept and condone the Palestinians fight to establish their homeland on one hand, while condemning the PKK on the other? Consistency, or double-standard, Mr. Rogers?

Rogers acknowledges that Turkey is an Islamic country, but with strong secular leanings and a Democratic government. They are also an ally in our fight against al-Qaida, allowing us to use their territory for crucial logistics support in Iraq. Indeed, it has been floated that the Democrats' recent push to vote to condemn the (admitted) Armenian genocide had more to do with annoying Turkey, and thus endangering the Iraq war effort, than in actual moral outrage.

The timing is too convenient; annoying Turkey to the point of their ceasing to allow our use of their facilities would impair our soldiers in Iraq. Thus is the practical also ignored by Rogers. Full pursuit of the PKK by Turkey would rile up the Kurds in Iraq, currently the model for progress, rebuilding, and success in that country – even as Anbar province serves as a model for Sunnis and Shiites coming together. But then, Iraq is what it is all about, really. Anything that can be used to disrupt our soldiers and snatch defeat from the jaws of victory in Iraq is the key.

If Turkey's pursuit of the PKK into Iraq – supported by Rogers – destabilizes the Kurdish part of Iraq, that's a win for the Left. If the Democrats' push to condemn Turkey annoys them and they cut off our supply lines, that's a win for the Left. Liberals cannot stand the idea of victory. Nor can they think things through past their template of wanting power.

Like the good little narcissists they are, nothing matters except that they feel good about what they do – damn the nuance, the reality, and the consequences to others.

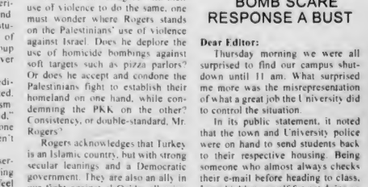
BOMB SCARE RESPONSE A BUST

Dear Editor:

Thursday morning we were all surprised to find our campus shutdown until 11 am. What surprised me more was the misrepresentation of what a great job the University did to control the situation.

In its public statement, it noted that the town and University police were on hand to send students back to their respective housing. Being someone who almost always checks their e-mail before heading to class, I was kicking myself for not doing so yesterday.



Unfortunately, I found myself running late and rushed to get to my 8 a.m. class in Herter Hall. Though I did find myself in a web of police cars in sight, I could not see one officer. Another student and I walked right into Herter Hall, no sign on the door and no officer in nearby to keep us from entering a "cordoned off" building.

A few more students from off campus joined, in addition to our graduate TA. It wasn't until I called someone to check my e-mail (in case the class was canceled for some reason) that we even knew that the building we were in may be in some sort of danger.

The police presence was lacking and this has undoubtedly hurt my faith in safety at UMass. If the administration thinks things were handled appropriately, I know a few people who would have wished to have seen at least a sign warning them of the potential danger in their eagerness to make an 8 a.m. class. If the dormitories had informational signs, at the very least the buses and bus stops should have had them, too.

Halloween: To slut or not to slut?

A tasteless tradition

Stephanie Luke

After years of lackluster costumes, including pirate, jester, clock and insect (thanks, Mom), I took a Halloween costume hiatus throughout adolescence. As a college student now, I find myself surrounded by a perplexing Halloween costume phenomenon – that is to say, the enormous popularity of the "slutty" costume among women.

I am astonished every year as girl after girl parades her body in any sort of mundane costume. It gets ridiculous after a while – there is the ever-popular Playboy Bunny, but also popular is Slutty Nurse, and Slutty Cat, and then Slutty Dorothy from "The Wizard of Oz."

I do not understand the concept of a "sexy angel." Researching this topic online was ridiculously easy – just clicking on the "Adult Costume" link on a costume site (eschewing the "Sexy Adult Costume" link) returned results that looked less like conventional costumes and more like strange fetish costumes.

The disparity between women's and men's costumes is quite vast. Upon clicking on the "Sexy Adult Costume" link, I found only several male "sexy" costumes, including Sexy Policeman and Sexy Caveman. Yes, nothing is sexier than moving violation tickets and grunting. Obviously, the commercial focus of slutty costumes is on women.

Quite a large number of young women on this campus will be "strutting their stuff" this Halloween, which begs the obvious question – why? What is it about a fall harvest and death festival that brings out the inner temptress in women? I cannot wrap my head around the idea of Halloween being "just an excuse for girls to dress slutty." Why do girls need that excuse? I believe that they are merely trying to gain male attention, by dressing in a way that they assume men find attractive. However, have you ever heard a guy admire a girl's fishnet stockings?

I'm not saying it's morally wrong to dress provocatively. I'm saying it's misguided. When doing so, one has to think about the social implications of what one is wearing – how people react to the outfit and how this reflects on the wearer.

Are college girls trying to submit to the sexual fantasies of heterosexual men? Do these girls find that empowering? These girls are unknowingly bowing down to our media culture's concept of sexuality being a young woman's greatest asset. Basically, I think this practice is disgusting and rather immature. Why buy into a belief that reduces women to their physical attributes?

I also noticed that many girls' costumes reflected the theme "innocent turned slutty," such as Slutty Alice In Wonderland and Slutty Little Bo Peep. This is a direct representation of the mixed message that our media often portrays – women must be pure, but sexy.

Not only do sexy costumes support the objectification of women's bodies, but they are highly unimaginative. Somehow, taking a common costume and sexualizing it makes it an interesting costume. I think this is ridiculous. Is "Sexy Witch" the most creative costume a typical college girl can come up with?

Being on and off campus this weekend, I witnessed a great number of Sexy Insects and Sexy Schoolgirls. The trend this year seemed to be stilettos with thigh-high tights. I was mostly struck with the impracticality of the slutty outfits. First, the inclement weather made the skimpy outfits uncomfortable and out of place. I saw a Slutty Nurse and a Slutty Mermaid shivering outside a bar in the wind and pouring rain. Later that night, I saw a Slutty Maid and a Slutty Little Bo Peep stumbling along, in each other's arms. Their stilettos and levels of intoxication made walking quite the challenge. Why wear Slutty if there is a forecast of rain and drunkenness?

Not only do sexy costumes support the objectification of women's bodies, but they are highly unimaginative.

This sort of unnecessary display of the flesh makes me long for the unashamedly scanty yet extravagant costumes of Carnivale of Rio De Janeiro and parts of the Caribbean. The women in these outfits might even be completely topless, but the amount of ingenuity and imagination that goes into a six-foot-wide set of sparkly peacock feather wings is undisputed.

I'd like to speak directly to the ladies who use this holiday to exhibit their cleavage, midriffs, thighs, or butt. Please, please, cut down on the "sexy" costumes. Think about why you're dressing this way, and if that's really who you want to be. There are ways to look good without sexualizing conventional costumes and playing into the commoditization of women's bodies in our media. Try to get attention for the creativity and novelty of your costume, instead for the skimpiness and tastelessness.

Sex it up for the U.S. dollar

C.A. Chase

Halloween is a holiday with much to give the more paranoid-minded pause: kids running around alone at night, questionable Halloween parties, razors in your candy apples and sexy costumes. The latter issue is usually framed as an aesthetic-cum-feminist/moral conundrum. Is it degrading to women? Sure.

However, women are objectified on a daily basis, and one day of outrageous costuming is just a small symptom of a larger disease. Furthermore, of all issues we have to deal with, given poverty, death, and disease, whether or not sexy nurses are a class malfeasance is hardly relevant. The eyebrow-raising variety of slutty costumes (nurse, French maid, slinky witches, sexy sheriff, vampy vampires, etc.) really isn't something that should be discouraged. In fact, we need slutty, distasteful Halloween costumes to help maintain the U.S. dollar hegemony and to help normalize Sino-U.S. relations.

We need slutty, distasteful Halloween costumes to help maintain the U.S. dollar hegemony.

The U.S. economy is faltering, and we need to preserve our economic dignity. Therefore, we cannot afford to anger our trading partners. If our economic dignity comes at the cost of other dignities, well then so be it. I would much rather have stable trade relations than personal dignity, anyway.

And this is something that is more important than dignity. According to a recent article in The Guardian, entitled "China replaces U.S. as spending force," China trumps the U.S. as the main player in economic growth during "uncertain and potentially difficult" times, according to the International Monetary Fund's report on Oct. 17.

The IMF, which has bi-yearly financial forecasts, stated that the global economy has become increasingly dependent on China. Along with Russia and India, China alone accounted for "one half of global growth over the past year." This is compounded by the IMF's prediction that the U.S. economy will have two years of negative growth.

What is the costume-China connection? Most clothes are made in China, and slutty clothes in general – slutty Halloween costumes in particular – are a subset of "most clothes." Therefore, it logically follows that most slutty Halloween costumes are from China. We have a trade deficit with China. Should we really anger the sleeping dragon that clutches our economy in its claws?

According to The Washington Post, China – which is a huge creditor and investor to America – is distancing itself from us because of our shaky economy, while it rakes in cash by saturating the global market with cheap goods.

"As China's manufacturing industries flood the world with cheap goods, the Chinese central bank has invested roughly three-fourths of its growing foreign currency reserves in U.S. Treasury bills and other dollar-denominated assets. The new policy reflects China's fears that too much of its savings are tied up in the dollar, a currency widely expected to drop in value as the U.S. trade and fiscal deficits climb," reported The Post.

Sniping about manufacturers making French maid costumes is really missing the point. If trade with China collapses, then the U.S. dollar and the U.S. economy is in trouble, something that is much more concrete than parsing the sociological meaning behind corsets and fishnet stockings.

According to an Asia Times article entitled "the US-China trade imbalance," China has "double-digit" GDP growth and is "the world's second-largest creditor nation." The U.S. dollar hegemony is shaky, and "with $69 billion in net outflows, China was the world's third largest net capital exporter. In 2004." And they have nukes!

You don't have to crack open a fortune cookie to see that this forecasts trouble.

If you don't want to dress up in a skimpy pirate outfit, then you don't have to. Tape some purple balloons to your shirt and go as a bunch of grapes. If you're looking for creative and non-décolletage-friendly outfits, then layer a slutty Alice in Wonderland costume with a slutty eggplant costume.

We borrow over $700 billion every year, and a large portion of that is from China. Would it kill us to swallow our moral qualms about running around in gothic-cum-slutty black corsets, in order to placate our bankers? According to the Foundation for Teaching Economics, "China may be THE player in international clothing markets," and we imported over $77 billion worth of clothing.

Furthermore, if college students walking around campus in Playboy Bunny costumes is found to be morally and aesthetically offensive, then what's to say that girls' regular, everyday low-cut shirts and guys' T-shirts plastered with crude innuendos aren't a sign of moral turpitude, and shouldn't be worn?

What would happen to our favorite creditor nation? The issue of scandalously clad girls on Halloween is more than just a question of objectification, it is a matter of lessening the blows to a declining American economic hegemony, and keeping the dollar afloat is just more important than decrying thigh-high boots and bunny ears.

It's the slutty economy, stupid.

An undying love for the living dead

Haley Navarro

I've never been one for horror movies. Up until college, I thought "The Sixth Sense" was the scariest movie I'd ever seen. I don't do psychos with chainsaws. I don't do deranged husbands in the cupboard under the sink. I don't do witches or apparitions. I do, however, adore zombies.

The whole idea of coming undead terrorizes me. Typically in zombie movies, the beginning starts out with someone (being a zombie treat) infected), and attacking one of the minor characters. The movie then progresses to more and more people becoming zombies, and the human count drops as the group of survivors search for a safe place. Then the zombies usually try to enter the "safe place," and zombie fights ensue. It's really very entertaining, even if it's played out. The end of the movie is usually a helicopter or team of military officials saving whatever survivors are left out of their sanctuary.

Some zombie movies stray a little ways from the above description, but they share the common idea of zombie mythology. Which, I guess is the same for all horror movies. All of the zombie rules seem to stay the same, though. If a character gets bitten, they become a zombie. They don't become zombies until they die, in which case, they "return" in their zombie state, (hence: the term "living dead").

Zombies have no common sense or thought process – they only know that they want to eat and kill live human beings. They sometimes walk with their arms in front of them, but usually their arms just hang lifelessly at their sides. However, in most zombie movies, they are able to use their arms to gain access to the living.

To kill a zombie, one must shoot or hit it in the head to dislodge the brain. In some movies, the zombies come from radiation or a virus. In others, it doesn't specify. Simple enough.

A zombie is defined as being a dead person whose body has been reanimated. The whole zombie idea originated in the voodoo in the Afro-Caribbean, more specifically in Haiti. In the legend, a zombie was a person who had their soul stolen, and possibly had a person controlling them. There have been books about zombies since the 17th century, but they didn't really have any effect on our knowledge of this. The first book to really expose this idea to Western culture was "The Magic Island" by W.B. Seabrook. This book was printed in 1929. The first zombie movie to ever be created was in 1932, which took place in Haiti, and thus spawned an ongoing cinema production.

Zombie movies have been typically thought to take a satirical tone on politics.

George Romero is thought to be kind of the father of zombie movies with the original "Dawn of the Dead." With all of the zombie movies I've seen, "Planet Terror," (as a part of "Grindhouse,") was the best take on zombies yet. Not only because Rose McGowan hobbles around on an M4 Carbine; or because Fergie bites it bad, but because the movie kind of reinvented some of the rules.

The military officials behind the toxic spill which causes zombies turn out to be zombies themselves, and wear masks hooked to tanks which keep them from showing any side effects. The zombies seem to be more conscious in the plot, which makes them that much more scary, not to mention that since it's not a serious movie, it makes it that much more enjoyable to watch. It's not as humorous as "Shaun of the Dead," in that aspect, but more of a satire of previous zombie movies' undertones of social commentary.

Zombie movies have been typically thought to take a satirical tone on politics. Not only that, but they take an educated guess about what an apocalypse might be like. Realistically, if the end of the world was going to come – if existence itself were to near its end – I would want to go out fighting, and hopefully, some sort of aircraft would save me at the last minute.

Maybe that's why I'm not so much scared of these themes – because they aren't realistic, but they make fun of something serious. If corrupt politicians are theoretically going to try to end existence as it's always once again I'd fight for it. This is what separates my interest in typical horror movies from zombie movies. I don't really find any underlying meaning in useless massacre.

So many movies have done different angles of these ideas, but "28 Days Later" really doesn't cut it in my book. All the tones and themes are there, but it isn't really a "zombie movie" per se. People will argue this with you for hours. I usually just have this attitude: If they aren't "zombies" then I'm not "interested."

Scrambling for a costume? Just look around you

Dan Nicastro

As the wise, vampire-slaying Buffy Summers once quipped, Halloween is "come-as-you-aren't night." It's a time when people are expected to step out of their daily routine and assume the qualities and characteristics of a character with whom they share very few traits. Really, it's like an intense psychological experiment which promises its participants free candy.

While people generally try and prepare a costume in advance, I'm sure many are at this moment ripping through all of their belongings, trying frantically to piece together a costume which is scary, funny, original, and most importantly, cheap. If you're reading this and thinking "Wait, today is Halloween?" then I have some suggestions.

People have always dressed up like politicians because they're pretty terrifying people with a pretty terrifying job. While the prospect of acting like Hillary Clinton for a night may send many people screaming, it's a tired concept.

However, since George W. Bush has redefined our conception of horror, the prospect of dressing up like a presidential candidate just doesn't terrify the American public like it would have eight years ago.

There's still hope, however. Instead of dressing up like one of the candidates themselves, dress up as a citizen living in the United States of 2008 where one of the candidates has been in office for a year.

For example, if you want to dress as a citizen of the Bush-Giuliani-Ted Nugent years, make sure to quilt your clothing with the words "9/11. Never Forget." If you're in ideal mood and are dressing up as a citizen of the Dennis Kucinich-led United States, carry around anything that thwarts the U.S. Constitution, a pot of gold, and a snowball stuffed in the depths of hell in your deep, deep pockets.

People have always dressed up like politicians because they're pretty terrifying people with a pretty terrifying job.

Here's a costume for the daring: dress up as a physical representation of the United States. Your costume is not only topical, it costs next to nothing. First, find and rip a perfectly good T-shirt into small shreds. Next, strip down and use the frayed remnants of clothing to cover only your shame. When the police come to arrest you for indecent exposure, tell them that you would protest this arrest under your First Amendment right to free speech, but the only Constitutional provision you have left on your body are the Second and Third Amendments.

If national politics isn't really your thing, there are dozens of costumes simple to DIY. If you're looking for something cheap and easy, buy a few rolls of red duct tape and begin to wrap yourself up. Once you're so encased in red tape you can barely move, bang a pike and that reads "Whatmore" over your neck and start partying. Make sure to be true to character, though. If one of your friends asks you a question, make sure to refer their query to six other people standing in your immediate vicinity. You'll know you've been successful when your friends become so enraged at your constant deflections that they begin wildly screaming obscenities and yelling that "it's not funny anymore."

The next costume is great for those who have been screwed by UMass in the past and those who enjoy alcohol. Wear the nicest clothes you own and tell friends you've come to their party as SPIRIT. At the beginning of the night, stay completely professional and work the room like a pro, engaging all of your friends in stunning, flashy conversation. Everyone at the room will think you're a hard-working, intelligent person who is a huge asset to the party. Then, start drinking. As the night continues, start slurring your speech and begin telling any friends who have ever owed you money about their failure to pay you this week's much better if they've already paid you back. By the end of the night, you'll be drunk, naked and everyone will shake their heads, wondering where you went wrong.

Let's not forget about couples costumes. While wearing rags, white clothing, find a dirty pile with your significant other and roll around until covered in grime. When you show up to a party, one of you can be "New Dirt" and the other can be "Really Annoying Construction Site." You may get questioned looks from friends who can't figure out the difference between your two costumes, but it will be all worth it. For added effect, place yourself in high traffic areas and force everyone at the party to awkwardly reach around you for food, or to see the television.

So there you have it. I hope these suggestions treat you well and you are able to cheaply piece together a costume in time for tonight. However, if none of these work for you, just go dressed as yourself and tell people you're going as a butter college student who doesn't like Halloween. I've heard worse costumes.

Dan Nicastro writes on Wednesdays. He will be dressed like Sgt. Nicholas Angel of the National Police and can be reached at dnicastr@student.umass.edu.

THE BATTLE IS SET TO BEGIN

POPULAR ZOMBIE GAME COMES TO CAMPUS TONIGHT

BY STEPHANIE MCPHERSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Close your curtains. Lock your doors. And whatever you do, do not go outside without your socks. Because starting at midnight on Halloween, many University of Massachusetts students' worst fear will be realized: zombies will invade.

Obviously, people aren't really becoming the undead, but the excitement and preparations surrounding the event Humans vs. Zombies (HvZ) sure feels like it. People can now execute those long-gestating plans of anti-zombie combat.

"A lot of people think about that sort of thing, I've noticed, and most people I talk to are more than ready to discuss escape routes and their weapon of choice against the undead masses," said Dante Ciliberti, one of the co-organizers of UMass's Capture the Flag Registered Student Organization that is hosting the game.

Because that's what "Humans vs. Zombies" is – a huge, intricately-organized, campus-wide game of tag. But the premise is more interesting than a simple "Tag, you're it," and participants have many more defenses than simply touching the ground and naming a TV show.

Humans vs. Zombies was created in 2005 by two students at Goucher College in Baltimore, Md. Brad Scappington and Chris Weed had no idea the game designed for their small college would become so popular, on and off the Goucher campus.

"It's turned into a huge phenomenon," said Weed in a documentary on Goucher's fourth HvZ game.

Participants of Humans vs. Zombies are encouraged to wear bandanas and carry marshmallows at all times to battle zombies.

Since its conception, Humans vs. Zombies has invaded campuses country-wide, from the University of Pittsburgh to Cornell, and from Tennessee Technological University to UMass, according to the Humans vs. Zombies UMass Wikipedia page.

The game is in its second attempt at UMass. With plans falling through last year, HvZ has strong leaders this fall in the co-founders of the Capture the Flag RSO, Ciliberti and Devin Ashe, both UMass seniors.

The duo based the rules for the UMass game off of the original guidelines laid down by the Goucher founders. First of all, to play, students have to be registered by the start of the game at midnight on Halloween. They can do so by clicking the link provided by the HvZ Facebook group. Interested students can register right up until the game begins.

The game starts with one or very few zombies – those who are doomed from the get-go. When HvZ 2007 officially begins, the original undead will be notified via e-mail, and the zombie feast will commence. The long-term goal is survival. Humans have to outlive the zombies, and zombies have to continue snacking on humans until all players are walking corpses.

No real cannibalism will occur, of course. Zombies, who are identified by a bandana on their heads, must tag the humans, who wear their bandanas on their arms. Once a human is tagged and converted into a zombie, they have to join their new teammates in sporting the bandana on their heads. They must also turn in the ID badge they are given at the beginning of the game, so their attacker can upload their information to the game's Web site. This ensures that all players know who the enemy is.

The humans are not completely helpless in their fight for life. There are certain munitions the humans can employ to "stun" a zombie for 15 minutes, rendering their "biting" abilities useless for that time. No human should be caught dead without a balled up sock or some marshmallows to hurl at approaching zombies. If a zombie doesn't "eat" or tag a human in 48 hours, that zombie "dies" and is out of the game. A team wins either when all humans have been converted, or when all zombies have died of starvation.

Humans vs. Zombies is no short game of tag. It can last from a few days up to a few weeks. So as not to interrupt classes, there are a number of designated safe zones. These include, but are not limited to, academic buildings, the W.E.B. DuBois Library, inside PVTA buses, sports practices and "places of work (as long as the player is on the clock)," according to UMass Wiki.

In order to succeed in Humans vs. Zombies, players will have to band together.

"Most people who try to go solo end up becoming part of the zombie horde," said Ciliberti. He is hoping HvZ will prove to be a team-building experience, as well as a zombie movie come to life.

As in any battle, strategy is essential for both teams. This is clearly evident in the Goucher documentary, and UMass humans have gotten a head start. According to Ciliberti, teams have already begun to organize and plan their courses of action.

"Apparently," he said, "they run nightly practice drills in the hall."

The Humans vs. Zombies Facebook group currently has about 550 members, and Ciliberti is hoping at least 450 more people will officially register to play. With that large of a number, it will unite people who wouldn't otherwise have met.

"I'm guessing that HvZ will bring a lot of friends together at UMass, just like it has at other schools," Ciliberti said.

Alex Silber, a sophomore at UMass, is excited to battle the zombies. "What I like about the game [is] the fact that we work together to destroy evil," he said.

The Humans vs. Zombies forum, which can also be accessed through Facebook, echoes the excitement of Silber. The posts are filled with confident claims of being able to hold off the zombies, should one find oneself the last human alive. The forum also has sections to discuss strategy, but beware – just because zombies are undead, it doesn't mean they can't read.

So when the clock strikes midnight on All Hallows Eve, tie your bandanas, grab your marshmallows, and get ready for an epic fight for survival and dominance between humans and zombies.

ANCIENT HORROR STORIES STILL INSPIRE

BY JORDAN HUSKINS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

According to UMass classics professor Deborah Felton, there's definitely more to Halloween then the well-known ghost stories of American culture.

In her courses on Greek Mythology and Magic and Witchcraft in the Ancient World, Felton discusses the ancient ghosts, witches, vampires, werewolves and zombies of Greece and Rome with students. She has also written a novel titled "Haunted Greece and Rome: Ghost Stories from Classical Antiquity."

"My first novel is part anthology, part analysis, and focuses mainly on ghosts and apparitions. No one has really discussed ancient ghost stories to such an extent before," said Felton.

When asked how she became interested in ancient ghost stories, Felton says it was more or less by accident.

"I was a grad student at the University of North Carolina, and I had to read an ancient Roman ghost story by Italian author Pliny in my Latin Composition class. We were reading it solely for grammar purposes, but I was much more intrigued by the story," she said.

Felton began intensely researching other ancient ghost stories afterward, but says that the untitled story by Pliny has been her favorite so far. The story is of a haunted house in Athens and a philosopher named Anthendorus who comes upon it and finds a ghost inside.

"Oddly enough, pretty much all ancient ghost stories rarely have titles," said Felton.

Ancient Greek and Roman stories are quite similar to those popular in America, especially in the recurring theme that ghosts tend to haunt places in the world as a result of improper burial. This is usually a result of a murder, a hasty burial, or a person dying unnoticed.

When asked if there were any unique elements to ancient ghost stories, Felton said, "Well, I don't think they're any scarier. The settings are certainly different, and all ghost stories tend to follow the same universal narrative plotline. If you take out words like 'Athens' in the stories, they read almost exactly like traditional American stories," she said.

"I do think that ancient ghost stories have a little more humor in them, though."

Exactly where the ancient stories of Greece and Rome came from is unknown. Historians do know that they came as a result of people's beliefs. "Religion played a huge part in it. People tended to speculate about where spirits went after death, and still do today for that matter," Felton said.

She said it is hard to say whether ancient Romans and Greeks actually believed in ghosts.

"No one can really say with certainty whether the majority of ancient Romans and Greeks actually believed in ghosts. Most likely some did and some didn't, just like today."

In another interview with Eternally cool.net, Felton said there are no known haunted sites in Greece and Rome. The ancient stories don't get any more specific then mentioning "a house" or "a bath." Felton also said the tradition of creating and telling ghost stories still continues today in Greece and Rome, as well as many other countries.

"The stories tend to circulate into society over time. Stories from over 2000 years ago are still being told and retold today," she said.

Professor Felton is currently working on a second novel that will be titled "Things That Went Bump in the Night: Strange Stories from Ancient Greece and Rome."

"It's still in its early stages, but my goal is to make it a more interesting read then my first novel," she said.

The book will be more of an anthology than an analysis and will touch on more supernatural stories and expand on different creatures, such as vampires, zombies and werewolves.

TOP 10 HORROR MOVIES OF ALL TIME

BY KEVIN KOCZWARA
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The idea of renting a movie may seem out of date and obsolete, but with movies like these good horror never dies. These movies are some that have replay qualities and are all classics in a genre that is widely misunderstood.

"RABID" (1977)

Director David Cronenberg is known for his gore and bloodshed and this movie is no different. The movie is a Cronenberg classic dealing with zombies and the dead attacking the living.

"Rabid" showcases his talents with a plot revolving around Rose (Marilyn Chambers). Rose has to have surgery after a motorcycle accident. After the surgery she ends up developing a hunger for blood. After Rose's victims are bitten they become zombies who attack unsuspecting people in the city where the movie takes place.

"LIFEBOAT" (1944)

A Hitchcock movie written by John Steinbeck. The film is not so much a horror movie as it is a thriller. It's relatively unknown movie and one of Hitchcock's best.

True to its title, the movie takes place on a lifeboat. The characters' ship had been sunk by a German U-boat. The struggle to stay alive is problem number one. But when they pick up a German who was on a U-boat the tension thickens. With each person on the boat questioning one another it becomes a survival-of-the-fittest type of story. Making it to land is the ultimate goal of the survivors, but how and who will lead is a totally different issue. When people are the verge of death the worst comes out of them.

"THE THING" (1982)

Remaking classic movies rarely works, but this one is an exception. "The Thing" is directed by horror and B-movie master John Carpenter. It stars Kurt Russell and takes place in Antarctica.

The movie revolves around an alien that moves through blood and tries to imitate anything it has touched. The men in the laboratory in Antarctica try to find the alien before it kills them off one by one but never know for sure who has been infected.

The special effects may seem dated, but they're still fun to watch and marvel at for a movie that had a small budget for what is on the screen.

"PSYCHO" (1960)

The movie that didn't just cement Hitchcock in the history of cinema as the greatest suspense director – maybe the greatest director – of all time, but also one that created the most controversy for him.

"Psycho" was made by Hitchcock to prove that the movie industry could make great movies for a small budget. Hitchcock was intrigued to as how so many horrible, cheaply made movies were making such large sums of money at the box office. So he went out and spent a million dollars and created a classic.

"BLUE VELVET" (1986)

David Lynch's view of the perfect middle-American town with a dark underlying story. David Lynch received a lot of flak and yet just as much praise in many reviews for the movie due to its content and the contrasting worlds that the story takes place in.

"Blue Velvet" is a story of a boy who lives in a perfect town and one day on his way home from the hospital finds an ear. After that he discovers a world that is darker than anything he has or ever will see in his life. A world of sex, drugs, violence and murder is discovered and absorbs his world.

"HALLOWEEN" (1978)

The movie that introduced the world to cheaply-made slasher films that would reign over the 1980s. The movie's simple plot is its greatest strength. With a character like Michael Myers, who is an unexplained killer out on the town killing innocent teenagers on Halloween, John Carpenter tapped into a nerve on the horror market.

Not only did the movie introduce the world to Jamie Lee Curtis, it introduced John Carpenter to the world as a director who could make great movies for little to no money and to his simple stories.

"NIGHT OF THE LIVING DEAD" (1968)

This is George A. Romero at his best. "Night of the Living Dead" is a zombie movie with more political undertones than most political movies have. The movie's social commentary on racism is so strong that Romero received a lot of complaints from many movie critics of the time.

"Night of the Living Dead" also put the zombie movie genre on the map as a major type of movie.

The black and white film strengthens the story because it forces so much focus on what is happening with the story and the characters and not on special effects. The zombies are frightening and the scenes of them eating their infected are terrifying.

"AUDITION" (1999)

Japanese horror is now driving cinema in America. With remakes of "The Grudge," and "The Ring," Japanese horror movies are becoming a staple of Hollywood. "Audition" is a movie by Takashi Miike, who is known as a director who never holds back when it comes to violence, sex, gore and drugs.

"Audition," however, does restrain itself from these things for the most part. It is a movie that takes a person into the inner workings of a relationship and then into the mad world of a crazy woman out for justice. The movie builds with tension and confusion from the audience for about an hour and a half. Then the ending comes and it is a powerful 20-minute sequence that can turn even the strongest of stomachs.

A man loses his wife, then years later is convinced to go back on the dating block. A friend assists him in the search process because it has been a long time since the widower has been on a date or tried to pick anyone up. His friend happens to be a movie producer and uses auditions for fake movies to pick up girls and get to know them fast. Well, the girl picked here isn't any ordinary girl.

"VIDEODROME" (1983)

A movie that will make you scared of television – now that's a great concept. Cronenberg's warning to people that television is more than entertainment, that television can control the mind, is one that can terrify even the most avid TV viewers. This movie hits home hard nowadays more than back in 1983. With the creation of the Internet, spyware, and Google this doesn't seem so far off.

The scares in the movie come from the fact that James Woods's character becomes consumed by a television show called "Videodrome" while searching for new shows for his very own TV network. His life is consumed by a violent TV show with content that's far too graphic for any real TV network. The show begins to eventually take over his mind and creates terrifying illusions.

"EVIL DEAD I AND II" AND "THE ARMY OF DARKNESS"

Sam Raimi's three classics, all starring Bruce Campbell as Ash, are horror movies and comedies all wrapped into a wonderful ball of fun. The stories revolve around Ash, yet each has its own story and each has its own way of telling the story.

"Evil Dead" (1981) is the most straightforward horror film in the trilogy. The story is about a group of people who decided to spend a weekend away in a cabin. The cabin and the surrounding forest hold secrets of an evil waiting for the unsuspecting travelers. The movie revolves around ancient Egypt's Book of the Dead and the dead that rise to attack the travelers.

The movie is gruesome, gory and violent, yet beautifully shot. The movie cost next to nothing to make, which is hard to believe with some of the unique effects and shots that are a staple of Sam Raimi's style.

Where "Evil Dead" leaves off "Evil Dead II" (1987) picks up, except with a humorous side. This movie bridges the horror movie with the comedy. It is so over the top that it doesn't try to be a straight horror movie, but is not so silly that it is a comedy. It still has its fair share of screams, but when Bruce Campbell is wielding a chainsaw instead of his hand it becomes ridiculous and so funny all at once.

"Evil Dead II" also has many more monsters. There are now monsters – not just zombies. There is also a group of people who try to rescue the travelers from the first movie, whom they discover to be dead, except for Ash. They soon learn it was a bad idea to go into the woods and accuse Ash of murder because he is the only person who can save them.

"Evil Dead II" leaves a bridge for the audience into a third movie. At the end of the movie Ash is sucked into a portal that sends him to the Middle Ages and that is where "Army of Darkness" starts.

This flick (1992) hides nothing about the ridiculous nature of a movie that features a man going back in time to the Middle Ages with a chain saw for a hand after being attacked by zombies.

"Army of Darkness" is over the top with horrible dialogue and special effects. This makes the movie enjoyable because it embraces the fact that it is full of bad jokes and effects. The Book of the Dead returns for its third and final chapter as well when Ash tries to escape by using the book but forgets the words he was suppose to say when he was to remove it from an alter. The evil Dead then come after him for a third time.

Kevin Koczwara can be reached at kkoczwar@student.umass.edu

Michael Myers in "Halloween" gave movie fans a new slasher film franchise to enjoy in the 1980s. "Halloween" also stared Jamie Lee Curtis in her first leading role.

Alfred Hitchcock created the movie "Psycho" because he wanted to see how low-budget movies were becoming box office successes. "Psycho" was created only for $1 million.

The "Evil Dead" triology is famous for its bad jokes and poorly-executed special effects. In each of the three films the character Ash tries to save mankind from zombies and monsters alike.

11 floors of fear in Southwest

Washington Tower redone for Halloween

BY KERI LETOURNEAU
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Washington Tower of Terror will be held today, Halloween, in the Southwest dormitory and will feature 11 floors worth of haunting spectacles and scary sights.

The idea was created by Residential Assistant Michael Richetti and came out of a need for a building-wide event involving the residential staff as well as the residents themselves.

"If we had a haunted tower, this would give residents an alternative reason not to go out during Halloween solely to get intoxicated," said Richetti.

"I might be running around stark-naked on a sugar high, but at least I'll be in the dorm," said a resident. "At least it's a whole lot safer."

The event is generously funded by Vice Chancellor Mike Gangano and Southwest Area Director Jean MacKimmie and will be used to create a sense of community within the dormitory.

"We want to build a better image of Southwest," Richetti said. "It isn't just the riots and the people they're led by. It's a community of people and this event will represent a more positive image."

A teaser flyer campaign implemented last week with the tagline, "Take in the sights and screaming," has sparked student interest in the heavily guarded terrors awaiting them.

The plan is to turn the lounges on every participating floor into a different Halloween theme where RAs and residents will take turns trying to scare those brave enough to walk through.

"You'd be surprised what we can do with a lounge," Richetti said. "I know one resident is doing a surreal vision of Candyland while others are doing graveyards, haunted pirate ships, and something called 'carnevil.'"

The festivities start at 6 p.m. in the Washington lobby and run till 8:30 p.m. Every Washington resident is welcome to come and may sign in two friends to join in the fun. Costumes are encouraged but face masks and face paint will not be allowed for security reasons. Participants will be put into groups and will ride up to the 22nd floor and work their way down the tower.

"I feel this is really going to make Washington the best in the West," said RA Mike Heberlein. "We put a lot of work into it."

"Washington has always had really good events but it sounds like they really outdid themselves this time," said a resident. "It's kind of ridiculous, but in a good way."

After the haunted tour will be a Halloween dance party from 8:30-11:30 p.m. on the fifth floor. There will be food from Wings and Sugar Jones, as well as a costume contest, prizes, gift certificates and good music.

"I don't want to go out and party when I have to wake up for an early class. At the same time, I feel left out when I see all the cute little who-es going out to play. If I can stay in my dorm and still party with people and have a good time, I'm in," said MacKimmie.

The posts are filled with confidant claims of being able to hold off the zombies, should one find oneself the last human alive. The forum also has sections to discuss strategy, but beware – just because zombies are undead, it doesn't mean they can't read.

So when the clock strikes midnight on All Hallows Eve, tie your bandanas, grab your marshmallows, and get ready for an epic fight for survival and dominance between humans and zombies.

ANCIENT HORROR STORIES STILL INSPIRE

BY JORDAN HUSKINS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

According to UMass classics professor Deborah Felton, there's definitely more to Halloween then the well-known ghost stories of American culture.

In her courses on Greek Mythology and Magic and Witchcraft in the Ancient World, Felton discusses the ancient ghosts, witches, vampires, werewolves and zombies of Greece and Rome with students. She has also written a novel titled "Haunted Greece and Rome: Ghost Stories from Classical Antiquity."

"My first novel is part anthology, part analysis, and focuses mainly on ghosts and apparitions. No one has really discussed ancient ghost stories to such an extent before," said Felton.

When asked how she became interested in ancient ghost stories, Felton says it was more or less by accident.

"I was a grad student at the University of North Carolina, and I had to read an ancient Roman ghost story by Italian author Pliny in my Latin Composition class. We were reading it solely for grammar purposes, but I was much more intrigued by the story," she said.

Felton began intensely researching other ancient ghost stories afterward, but says that the untitled story by Pliny has been her favorite so far. The story is of a haunted house in Athens and a philosopher named Anthendorus who comes upon it and finds a ghost inside.

"Oddly enough, pretty much all ancient ghost stories rarely have titles," said Felton.

Ancient Greek and Roman stories are quite similar to those popular in America, especially in the recurring theme that ghosts tend to haunt places in the world as a result of improper burial. This is usually a result of a murder, a hasty burial, or a person dying unnoticed.

When asked if there were any unique elements to ancient ghost stories, Felton said, "Well, I don't think they're any scarier. The settings are certainly different, and all ghost stories tend to follow the same universal narrative plotline. If you take out words like 'Athens' in the stories, they read almost exactly like traditional American stories," she said.

"I do think that ancient ghost stories have a little more humor in them, though."

Exactly where the ancient stories of Greece and Rome came from is unknown. Historians do know that they came as a result of people's beliefs. "Religion played a huge part in it. People tended to speculate about where spirits went after death, and still do today for that matter," Felton said.

She said it is hard to say whether ancient Romans and Greeks actually believed in ghosts.

"No one can really say with certainty whether the majority of ancient Romans and Greeks actually believed in ghosts. Most likely some did and some didn't, just like today."

In another interview with Eternally cool.net, Felton said there are no known haunted sites in Greece and Rome. The ancient stories don't get any more specific then mentioning "a house" or "a bath." Felton also said the tradition of creating and telling ghost stories still continues today in Greece and Rome, as well as many other countries.

"The stories tend to circulate into society over time. Stories from over 2000 years ago are still being told and retold today," she said.

Professor Felton is currently working on a second novel that will be titled "Things That Went Bump in the Night: Strange Stories from Ancient Greece and Rome."

"It's still in its early stages, but my goal is to make it a more interesting read then my first novel," she said.

The book will be more of an anthology than an analysis and will touch on more supernatural stories and expand on different creatures, such as vampires, zombies and werewolves.

TOP 10 HORROR MOVIES OF ALL TIME

BY KEVIN KOCZWARA
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The idea of renting a movie may seem out of date and obsolete, but with movies like these good horror never dies. These movies are some that have replay qualities and are all classics in a genre that is widely misunderstood.

"RABID" (1977)

Director David Cronenberg is known for his gore and bloodshed and this movie is no different. The movie is a Cronenberg classic dealing with zombies and the dead attacking the living.

"Rabid" showcases his talents with a plot revolving around Rose (Marilyn Chambers). Rose has to have surgery after a motorcycle accident. After the surgery she ends up developing a hunger for blood. After Rose's victims are bitten they become zombies who attack unsuspecting people in the city where the movie takes place.

"LIFEBOAT" (1944)

A Hitchcock movie written by John Steinbeck. The film is not so much a horror movie as it is a thriller. It's relatively unknown movie and one of Hitchcock's best.

True to its title, the movie takes place on a lifeboat. The characters' ship had been sunk by a German U-boat. The struggle to stay alive is problem number one. But when they pick up a German who was on a U-boat the tension thickens. With each person on the boat questioning one another it becomes a survival-of-the-fittest type of story. Making it to land is the ultimate goal of the survivors, but how and who will lead is a totally different issue. When people are the verge of death the worst come out of them.

"THE THING" (1982)

Remaking classic movies rarely works, but this one is an exception. "The Thing" is directed by horror and B-movie master John Carpenter. It stars Kurt Russell and takes place in Antarctica.

The movie revolves around an alien that moves through blood and tries to imitate anything it has touched. The men in the laboratory in Antarctica try to find the alien before it kills them off one by one but never know for sure who has been infected.

The special effects may seem dated, but they're still fun to watch and marvel at for a movie that had a small budget for what is on the screen.

"PSYCHO" (1960)

The movie that didn't just cement Hitchcock in the history of cinema as the greatest suspense director – maybe the greatest director – of all time, but also one that created the most controversy for him.

"Psycho" was made by Hitchcock to prove that the movie industry could make great movies for a small budget. Hitchcock was intrigued to as how so many horrible, cheaply made movies were making such large sums of money at the box office. So he went out and spent a million dollars and created a classic.

Alfred Hitchcock created the movie "Psycho" because he wanted to see how low-budget movies were becoming box office successes. "Psycho" was created only for $1 million.

"BLUE VELVET" (1986)

David Lynch's view of the perfect middle-American town with a dark underlying story. David Lynch received a lot of flak and yet just as much praise in many reviews for the movie due to its content and the contrasting worlds that the story takes place in.

"Blue Velvet" is a story of a boy who lives in a perfect town and one day on his way home from the hospital finds an ear. After that he discovers a world that is darker than anything he has or ever will see in his life. A world of sex, drugs, violence and murder is discovered and absorbs his world.

"HALLOWEEN" (1978)

The movie that introduced the world to cheaply-made slasher films that would reign over the 1980s. The movie's simple plot is its greatest strength. With a character like Michael Myers, who is an unexplained killer out on the town killing innocent teenagers on Halloween, John Carpenter tapped into a nerve on the horror market.

Not only did the movie introduce the world to Jamie Lee Curtis, it introduced John Carpenter to the world as a director who could make great movies for little to no money and to his simple stories.

"NIGHT OF THE LIVING DEAD" (1968)

This is George A. Romero at his best. "Night of the Living Dead" is a zombie movie with more political undertones than most political movies have. The movie's social commentary on racism is so strong that Romero received a lot of complaints from many movie critics of the time.

"Night of the Living Dead" also put the zombie movie genre on the map as a major type of movie.

The black and white film strengthens the story because it forces so much focus on what is happening with the story and the characters and not on special effects. The zombies are frightening and the scenes of them eating their infected are terrifying.

"AUDITION" (1999)

Japanese horror is now driving cinema in America. With remakes of "The Grudge," and "The Ring," Japanese horror movies are becoming a staple of Hollywood. "Audition" is a movie by Takashi Miike, who is known as a director who never holds back when it comes to violence, sex, gore and drugs.

"Audition," however, does restrain itself from these things for the most part. It is a movie that takes a person into the inner workings of a relationship and then into the mind world of a crazy woman out for justice. The movie builds with tension and confusion from the audience for about an hour and a half. Then the ending comes and it is a powerful 20-minute sequence that can turn even the strongest of stomachs.

A man loses his wife, then years later is convinced to go back on the dating block. A friend assists him in the search process because it has been a long time since the widower has been on a date or tried to pick anyone up. His friend happens to be a movie producer and uses auditions for fake movies to pick up girls and get to know them first. Well, the girl picked here isn't any ordinary girl.

"VIDEODROME" (1983)

A movie that will make you scared of television – now that's a great concept. Cronenberg's warning to people that television is more than entertainment, that television can control the mind, is one that can terrify even the most avid TV viewers. This movie hits home hard nowadays more than back in 1983. With the creation of the Internet, spyware, and Google this doesn't seem so far off.

The scares in the movie come from the fact that James Woods's character becomes consumed by a television show called "Videodrome" while searching for new shows for his very own TV network. His life is consumed by a violent TV show with content that's far too graphic for any real TV network. The show begins to eventually take over his mind and creates terrifying illusions.

"EVIL DEAD I AND II" AND "THE ARMY OF DARKNESS"

Sam Raimi's three classics, all starring Bruce Campbell as Ash, are horror movies and comedies all wrapped into a wonderful ball of fun. The stories revolve around Ash, yet each has its own story and each has its own way of telling the story.

"Evil Dead" (1981) is the most straightforward horror film in the trilogy. The story is about a group of people who decided to spend a weekend away in a cabin. The cabin and the surrounding forest hold secrets of an evil waiting for the unsuspecting travelers. The movie revolves around ancient Egypt's Book of the Dead and the dead that rise to attack the travelers.

The movie is gruesome, gory and violent, yet beautifully shot. The movie cost next to nothing to make, which is hard to believe with some of the unique effects and shots that are a staple of Sam Raimi's style.

Michael Myers in "Halloween" gave movie fans a new slasher film franchise to enjoy in the 1980s. "Halloween" also stared Jamie Lee Curtis in her first leading role.

Where "Evil Dead" leaves off "Evil Dead II" (1987) picks up, except with a humorous side. This movie bridges the horror movie with the comedy. It is so over the top that it doesn't try to be a straight horror movie, but is not so silly that it is a comedy. It still has its fair share of screams, but when Bruce Campbell is wielding a chainsaw instead of his hand it becomes ridiculous and so funny all at once.

"Evil Dead II" also has many more monsters. There are now monsters – not just zombies. There is also a group of people who try to rescue the travelers from the first movie, whom they discover to be dead, except for Ash. They soon learn it was a bad idea to go into the woods and accuse Ash of murder because he is the only person who can save them.

"Evil Dead II" leaves a bridge for the audience into a third movie. At the end of the movie Ash is sucked into a portal that sends him to the Middle Ages and that is where "Army of Darkness" starts.

This flick (1992) hides nothing about the ridiculous nature of a movie that features a man going back in time to the Middle Ages with a chain saw for a hand after being attacked by zombies.

"Army of Darkness" is over the top with horrible dialogue and special effects. This makes the movie enjoyable because it embraces the fact that it is full of bad jokes and effects. The Book of the Dead returns for its third and final chapter as well when Ash tries to escape by using the book but forgets the words he was suppose to say when he was to remove it from an alter. The evil Dead then come after him for a third time.

The "Evil Dead" trilogy is famous for its bad jokes and poorly-executed special effects. In each of the three films the character Ash tries to save mankind from zombies and monsters alike.

11 floors of fear in Southwest

Washington Tower redone for Halloween

BY KERI LETOURNEAU
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Washington Tower of Terror will be held today, Halloween, in the Southwest dormitory, and will feature 11 floors worth of haunting spectacles and scary sights.

The idea was created by Residential Assistant Michael Richetti and came out of a need for a building-wide event involving the residential staff as well as the residents themselves.

"If we had a haunted tower, this would give residents an alternative reason not to go out during Halloween solely to get intoxicated," said Richetti.

"I might be running around starknaked on a sugar high, but at least I'll be in the dorm," said a resident. "At least it's a whole lot safer."

The event is generously funded by Vice Chancellor Mike Gargano and Southwest Area Director Jean MacKimmie and will be used to create a sense of community within the dormitory.

"We want to build a better image of Southwest," Richetti said. "It isn't just the riots and the people they're led by. It's a community of people and this event will represent a more positive image."

A teaser flyer campaign implemented last week with the tagline, "Take in the sights and screaming," has sparked student interest in the heavily guarded terrors awaiting them.

The plan is to turn the lounges on every participating floor into a different Halloween theme where RAs and residents will take turns trying to scare those brave enough to walk through.

"You'd be surprised what we can do with a lounge," Richetti said. "I know one resident is doing a surreal vision of Candyland while others are doing graveyards, haunted pirate ships, and something called 'cannibal.'"

The festivities start at 6 p.m. in the Washington lobby and run till 8:30 p.m. Every Washington resident is welcome to come and may sign in two friends to join in the fun. Costumes are encouraged but face masks and face paint will not be allowed for security reasons. Participants will be put into groups and will ride up to the 22nd floor and work their way down the tower.

"I feel this is really going to make Washington the best in the West," said RA Mike Hebetrein. "We put a lot of work into it."

"Washington has always had really good events but it sounds like they really outdid themselves this time," said a resident. "It's kind of ridiculous, but in a good way."

After the haunted tour will be a Halloween dance party from 8:30-10:30 p.m. on the fifth floor. There will be food from Wings and Sugar Jones, as well as a costume contest, prizes, gift certificates and good music.

"I don't want to go out and party when I have to wake up for an early class. At the same time, I feel left out when I see all the cute little wh--es going out to play. If I can stay in my dorm and still party with people and have a good time, I'm in," said MacKimmie.

Finale should impress

A-10 heavyweights Charlotte, Saint Louis meet in final week

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

The Atlantic 10 schedulers could not ask for a better way to end the season. The top two teams, Saint Louis and Charlotte, play Saturday at SLU. Charlotte's win would secure the No. 1 seed in the A-10 tournament and the regular season championship.

The final game seems fitting, considering the success of both teams in past years.

More than half of the Billikens' roster played on one of two A-10 championship teams. Their experience can explain their undefeated home record, starting with wins over Southeast Missouri State and Army in the Joys for Tots Tournament.

Rhode Island scored the only goal in St. Louis allowed in conference play to send the game to overtime. Even with URI ending the opponents' scoring drought in the River City, the Billikens responded with an overtime goal by Junior Molly Hartman.

The 49ers lead SLU (10-4-2, 7-1-2 A-10) with a 5-4-2 all-time record, but the Billikens have them beat in recent history. SLU is 3-1 against Charlotte (13-4-1, 8-1-1 A-10) at home and won the past two matches.

In the last meeting, the Billikens edged the 49ers, 2-1, in 2005. It was their first meeting since Charlotte's win in 2003 when they both played in Conference USA.

However, beating the 49ers is no easy task. They are currently the No. 1 team in the A-10, going undefeated in conference play until Sunday when they dropped a decision to URI, 1-0, for the first loss in six weeks.

Charlotte has three players with double-digit points this season with senior Lindsey Ozimek and freshmen Sam Huecker and Whitney Weinraub. No Billiken matches Weinraub in goals scored, who ties for seventh in the conference, with six goals.

COLLEGIAN FILE/MEGAN KEARNEY

Freshman Megan Minnix of the Charlotte 49ers earned A-10 Rookie of the Week honors.

The 49ers sport better statistics than the Billikens on both sides of the ball, outscoring them, 37-24. Charlotte also leads the conference in defense, allowing six fewer goals than SLU's 17. It is one of only three teams allowing under a goal per game with another conference-leading 0.61 GAA.

Playoffs up in the air

The regular season is far from over, regardless of the A-10 tournament being in the last week of the season.

Duquesne in particular is the only team in the tournament that could take the A-10 regular season championship away or be the last seeded team in the tournament.

The Dukes (10-5-0, 7-2-0 A-10) can steal the A-10 with victories over Fordham Nov. 2 and La Salle Nov. 4, with an SLU victory. If Charlotte wins, Duquesne still has a chance at a bye next week by beating Fordham.

Losses to both teams could knock the Dukes down to the sixth spot if Fordham and either URI or Richmond win both matches this weekend. Dayton beat Duquesne, 2-1, in overtime Oct. 12, giving it the tiebreaker if the Dukes lose both games.

The A-10 still has two spots available for four teams. One of the decisive games this weekend is Nov. 4, when URI (11-5-2, 5-3-1 A-10) plays Richmond (6-10-2, 5-3-1 A-10) in the final game of the season for either team.

Regardless of how the rest of the week plays out, it is improbable that the losing team from this match still sneaks into the playoffs.

Penalty kill woes

on both the man-advantage and the penalty kill.

Cahoon rotates four lines and plans to for the foreseeable future. However, an injury to sophomore center Brett Watson has changed things for the Minutemen. Cahoon considers Watson his best defensive forward, and his absence forced Cahoon to use another player on the penalty kill and give junior Jordan Virtue and freshman Michael Lemcomte more ice time against Providence last weekend.

Watson's absence in crucial game situations cost the Minutemen against the Friars. PC scored three power-play goals in the pair of games and another late in Saturday's contest with the goaltender pulled.

"We have to get thorough. We're a work in progress and will continue to be a work in progress," Cahoon said following Saturday's tie with the Friars. "[With the extra man on], how much ice time do you think someone like Brett Watson is getting in those situations? He's our best defensive forward, barring none and when we don't him available, it shows itself. The other guys out there are very capable of doing a good job, but our absolute best guy isn't there."

Three in a row

Senior forward Matt Burto assisted on Lecomte's goal on Saturday to push his point-scoring streak to three games. Lecomte won the faceoff over to Burto on the left wing. Rather than take the shot, Burto chipped the puck through the net to the freshman who beat PC goaltender Chris Mannix.

He scored UMass's lone goal Friday against the Friars when he tapped in a Jordan Virtue rebound.

Burto's presence in the UMass lineup gives Cahoon a talented winger who can stabilize a line with his smart play and also consistently create scoring chances for the Minutemen … Sophomore goaltender Dan Meyers did not dress for the second straight weekend (groin injury) … Fenton is the lone UMass forward to play in all six games without scoring a goal, although he has three assists … UMass is outside the USA Today/USA Hockey Magazine poll for the first time this season, but is No. 20 in the USCHO/CSTV poll … Freshman Brian Keane leads UMass with a plus-3 rating in his five games played … UMass killed off 83 percent of its penalties last season, but is at 77 percent (20-of-26) after six games this year.

to leave a game with an injury since the season opener.

In addition, senior Christina Nunes went down with an MCL injury in the preseason and classmate Tina Rodriquez has been recovering from an ACL tear she suffered Oct. 1, 2006, against La Salle.

Rudy said Visconti was in a great deal of pain when she left during halftime and that she is likely out of the rest of the season.

Gould's back

One of the only positive aspects of Sunday's game for the Minutewomen was sophomore Meghan Gould's return to action. The midfielder had not seen playing time since suffering a concussion Oct. 11 in a game against Rhode Island.

While going up for a header, Gould knocked heads with a URI player. She continued to play for a few minutes, but Rudy took her out when he sensed something was wrong.

After attending to Gould, Kathy Boyd, the team's athletic trainer, determined Gould had suffered a concussion.

She played the last 18 minutes against the Billikens and Rudy said she did well, especially considering the length of her absence.

The only thing that remains in question, he added, is whether her game fitness has decreased because of her time on the bench.

Luckey holds her own

Rudy was very pleased with the performances of goalkeeper Lauren Luckey. The sophomore goalkeeper has taken over the netminding responsibilities since redshirt senior Kristin Walker went down with a knee injury Oct. 19 against the Rams.

According to Rudy, Walker fully or partially tore her MCL in a collision with a Fordham player and is gone for the remainder of the collegiate career.

"(Luckey) did very well. She made two or three really good saves, she boxed the ball, her foot distribution was good, her punts were good," Rudy said. "It's good that she's getting an opportunity and it's one against quality teams."

Luckey has played in 10 games this season and has seen just over 358 minutes, allowing six goals for a goal-against average of 1.51. She also has 38 saves for a saves percentage of .864.

Hamel gets two starts

With so many starters riddled with injuries, freshman Ashley Hamel made her first two collegiate starts over the weekend. She notched, one shot on goal Sunday and one shot Friday.

Hamel, normally a forward, played in the midfield both games and has registered eight shots (two on goal) and one assist in 651 minutes this season.

Terriers off to worst start in 31 years

Beantown Bust

The Boston University Terriers are off to the team's worst start in 31 years. However, in that season, the Terriers recovered from the rough start and reached the national semifinals with an overall record of 22-11-1. BU has had to use all its players this season, in trying to find a consistent trend that will produce positive results.

Opponents have scored four or more goals in four consecutive games against the Terriers. BU has not had this problem since they surrendered 23 goals in the first four games of the 1998-99 season. The Terriers are last in the conference in scoring offense, scoring one goal in one conference game. By the numbers, BU's offense has crumbled late in games, giving up 12 goals in the third period alone.

Senior netminder Karson Gillespie has a 4.36 goals-against average in three games. Sophomore Brett Bennett has a .020 percent advantage over Gillespie in save percentage (.849) but Bennett has also started in one game fewer than Gillespie.

Junior forward Jason Lawrence notched a power-play goal in each of the Terriers' games against No.4 Michigan this weekend. With three goals on the season, Lawrence is BU's leading scorer and also leads the team in points, with four. Lawrence has also been the most efficient with his scoring. He has scored on 30 percent of the shots he has taken this season.

No 'I' in Team

A host of different players have contributed to UMass-Lowell's success this season. Last weekend alone, 15 different River Hawks tallied at least one point.

Sophomore defenseman Barry Goers tallied three assists. Goers ranks second among all league defensemen in scoring, with five goals in three games. He is on a three-game streak in which he has scored at least one point. Goers has already set a career high in points with five (one goal, four assists).

UMass-Lowell(2-0-1, 0-0-1 Hockey East)and New Hampshire(3-0-0, 1-0-0 Hockey East) are the only remaining undefeated teams in the conference and one of only six Division 1 teams who have yet to lose a game.

The River Hawks' young players for the River Hawks have already made an impression. Four freshmen recorded their first-career points in Friday's victory alone. Defenseman Maury Edwards leads all River Hawk freshmen in scoring with one point per game.

Sophomore forward Frank Stegnar has been consistent in scoring points for UMass-Lowell as well. Dating back to last season, Stegnar is on a four-game point streak.

The River Hawks have played one game against a conference opponent this season and they will take a week off before facing BU and Merrimack … The Vermont Catamounts have sold out a record 60 home games at Gutterson Fieldhouse … The Northeastern Huskies are averaging 10.3 penalty minutes in Hockey East games, after ranking third in the conference in that category in each of the last two seasons … Providence junior forward Kyle Laughlin recorded at least one goal in each of the Friar's previous four games … Main junior forward Chris Hahn has three goals on the season, tying a career high … The Black Bears are 3-0-0 this season when scoring the first goal.

Gators, Buckeyes, Wildcats unranked

fered a similar fate. Florida lost key players to the NBA, including juniors Joakim Noah, Al Horford, Corey Brewer and Taurean Green, along with senior forward Chris Richard.

On top of this, head coach Billy Donovan signed a contract to coach the NBA's Orlando Magic in June, but changed his mind and returned to the Gators five days later. Florida brought in a much-touted recruiting class, led by McDonalds-All Americans Adam Allen, Nick Calathes and Jai Lucas.

With Greg Oden and Mike Conley Jr. off to the NBA, unranked Ohio State also needed to deepen its bench. The Buckeyes didn't have any trouble recruiting in state, signing guard Jon Diebler and forwards Kosta Koufos and Dallas Lauderdale. OSU will get its first test of the season when it meets No. 1 UNC in the Big Ten/ACC Challenge Nov. 28. Other big games for the Buckeyes include No. 22 Kentucky and No. 7 Tennessee.

Bruins an early favorite

Second-ranked UCLA returns four starters from its 2006 national-semifinalist team. The Bruins also scored a big recruit in center Kevin Love, one of the top prep players in the country. Love and guard Chace Stanback are the only freshmen for UCLA, a team littered with upperclassmen.

Junior guard Josh Shipp, junior forward Luc Richard Mbah a Moute and senior center Lorenzo Mata-Real will help Love get adjusted while head coach Ben Howland incorporates him into the starting lineup.

However, the Bruins will need to fill the gap left by junior guard Arron Afflalo, who went to the NBA. Afflalo averaged 15.8 points per game and 4.2 rebounds per game, and registered double-digit points in 34 of 39 games, including 10 games with 20 or more points.

The PAC-10 is filled with tough competition for the Bruins, who have big games against No. 21 Stanford, No. 10 Washington State, and No. 18 USC along with No. 17 Arizona and No. 13 Arizona.

UConn gets votes

The last time Connecticut earned a preseason ranking was prior to the 2001-02 season. UConn coach Jim Calhoun will look to junior forward Jeff Adrian to help propel the Huskies back into the national spotlight.

Adrian is averaging 9.7 points a game and 7.3 rebounds a game and was also named to the Preseason All Big-East Team. Center Hasheem Thabeet started as a freshman, averaging 6.2 points per game and 6.4 rebounds per game. The 7-foot-3 native of Tanzania led the Big East in blocked shots last year, and finished third in the nation.

UConn hosts No. 14 Gonzaga and travels to fifth-ranked Georgetown. They also play three consecutive Top-25 opponents – Indiana, Louisville and Pittsburgh – between Jan. 26 and Feb. 2.

Kansas State is among the surprise teams excluded from the Top 25. The Wildcats landed Rivals.com's number one recruit, Michael Beasley, and freshman Bill Walker is back from a torn ACL. Former KSU assistant coach Frank Martin replaces Bob Huggins, who took the job at his alma mater, West Virginia University. Huggins led the Wildcats to 23 wins, the team's most wins in 19 years. KSU also broke an eight-year postseason streak by getting to the second round of the National Invitation Tournament.

Kansas State will look for veteran leadership from senior guards Blake Young and Clent Stewart and forward David Hoskins. The Wildcats will be put to the test with matchups against 14th-ranked Texas A&M and No. 16 Texas.

UNC ranked first

North Carolina is ranked first in the preseason for the first time since 1987-88. The Tar Heels have junior forward Tyler Hansbrough, along with sophomore guards Ty Lawson and Wayne Ellington. Hansbrough, a candidate for the National Player of the Year award and a repeat All-American, averaged 18.4 points a game along with 7.9 rebounds per game last year. The trio will make up for the loss of Brandan Wright, who went to the NBA after his freshman year.

Season ending early following loss to 49ers

Freshman defenseman Alyssa Visconti is the latest Minutewoman to fall victim to injury.

Devastated by multiple injuries, UMass falls short of postseason

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

The Boston Red Sox's capture of a second World Series title in four years was possibly the only consolation for the Massachusetts women's soccer team over the weekend.

The Minutewomen, losing 2-0 at Saint Louis Sunday and 1-0 at Charlotte Friday, dropped to 8-6-1 (3-6 in the Atlantic 10), squashing their hopes of competing in the A-10 Tournament.

The Atlantic 10's six-team postseason bracket will not include UMass, which currently shares the 11th spot with George Washington with nine conference points.

Charlotte is tops with an 8-1-1 record (25 points) against A-10 teams. Saint Louis is next with at 7-1-2 (23 points). Duquesne and Dayton are tied with 21 points, though the Dukes are 7-2 while the Flyers are 6-2-3.

Fordham has 18 points with its record of 5-1-3, and Rhode Island and Richmond (16 points) currently share the sixth spot at 5-3-1.

UMass coach Jim Rudy said when a team is out of contention for a postseason shot but still has games remaining on it schedule, the mettle of the team is truly tested.

The Minutewomen finish their 2007 season with a home stand this weekend, facing Richmond at 2 p.m. Friday and GW at 11 a.m. Sunday.

"Now we define who we are. I've had teams in years past whose character was less than this team's[, the last weekend they didn't care. And so now we really find out the measure of who we are," he said. "Are we going to come and finish the season with dignity and with class or are we going to fold? And I would suggest the [former] is the answer."

Another one down

Just when Rudy thought no more of his players could get hurt, another Minutewoman fell victim to injury.

In the first half of Sunday's game freshman forward Alyssa Visconti obtained an upper-leg muscle pull. She was removed from the game at halftime and did not return. Visconti is the sixth member of the Maroon and White

Lecomte nets his first

Near game-winner spoiled by late PC goal

By Jon Meloni
Collegian Staff

Freshman Michael Lecomte scored his first career goal Saturday against Providence. The tally put the Massachusetts hockey team ahead with just over a minute left in the game. Although UMass did not hold the lead, Lecomte still enjoyed the moment.

"I thought I scored a goal last weekend [against U Mass-Lowell], but it got refused. But this one was pretty exciting because it was [before PC tied the game] a game-winning goal," Lecomte said. "It's too bad that we didn't win, but it was a pretty exciting goal."

With the score tied at two and the Minutemen on the power play, Lecomte had to win the faceoff for UMass to force a chance. Having a talented freshman able to win big faceoffs and score crucial goals will prove vital for the Minutemen.

UMass coach Don Cahoon praised Lecomte as a talented center in both ends of the ice, comparing him to departed captain Matt Anderson. Not only does he center a power-play unit, he also sees major ice time as a penalty killer for UMass.

Mix and match

Six games into the 2007-08 season, Cahoon is still in the process of determining the line combinations it hopes to ride to postseason success.

Freshman center Mike Lecomte scored his first collegiate goal against Providence Saturday night in a 3-3 tie. The rookie has played in all six games for the Mass Attack this season.

Junior center Cory Quirk and senior winger P.J. Fenton are the only two Minutemen who haven't moved from the spot they started the season at. However, two different players occupied the right wing spot on the line in the season's first three weeks.

Junior Chris Davis saw considerable time with the pair last season and his speed makes him a perfect compliment to Fenton and Quirk. Sophomore Will Ortiz is a similar player and has worked well on UMass's top line.

The main difference between Ortiz and Davis is the role each one plays on special teams. Ortiz sees time on the power play for the Minutemen while Davis works

Eagles claim early lead in HEA

Gerbe, Whitney and Co. sweep Merrimack, take first place

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

Although Merrimack was perfect in the win column as of last week, the Boston College Eagles again put a blemish on the Warriors' season. BC dropped Merrimack to the bottom of the conference standings with a weekend sweep.

Saturday's win was the 50th for the Eagles, in a series dating back to 1972. In 69 meetings, the Warriors trail the all-time series 50-17-2. BC (3-1-2, 2-0-1 Hockey East) is currently on an 11-game winning streak in the series.

The two teams will conclude the season series at BC's Kelley Rink. This doesn't bode well for the Warriors (3-2-0, 0-2-0 Hockey East), who have not won in Chestnut Hill in its last 19 road games.

Through three games played, freshman forward Joe Whitney leads the conference in points per game, with 2.67. Whitney has totalled a team-high 11 points – three goals and eight assists – so far this season. The Eagles also boast four other players among the league's top point scorers.

Freshman goalie John Muse has also been an important factor to BC's success. Starting all six games for the Eagles, Muse ranks among the top-five in the conference in goals against average (1.95 per game), save percentage (.924) and winning percentage (.833).

BC has the conference's top scoring offense, notching 14 goals in three games against Hockey East teams. Its scoring defense ranks second in the conference, with six goals in conference play.

The Eagles have been effective early and often during their games. BC has scored 86 percent of its goals during the first and second periods of play this season.

The sweep put the Eagles in first place in the conference and the tie narrowly puts BC past the Maine Black Bears (4-2-0, 2-0-0 Hockey East).

Wild Start

The New Hampshire Wildcats (3-0-0, 1-0-0 Hockey East) have yet to lose this season and their six goals allowed ranks second in the conference. Senior captain Mike Fornataro has scored a goal in each of the Wildcats' three games this year, the longest stretch of his career. The senior forward leads UNH with four goals this year, which ties him with BC junior forward Nathan Gerbe for second in the conference.

The Wildcats have scored four or more goals in each of their first three games. Three of the goals in each of New Hampshire's games came in the final period. UNH has not opened the season with three consecutive wins since the 2003-04 season.

Freshman Joe Whitney leads the Eagles with 11 points on three goals and eight assists, earning Hockey East Rookie of the Week honors for his efforts.

Forward James van Riemsdyk is third among all freshmen in the conference in scoring (one goal, one assist) during conference play.

Although the third period has been a successful time in contests for the Wildcats, the first period has been a problem for UNH, as opposing teams have scored four times in the opening period. However, the goalie platoon of senior Kevin Regan and sophomore Brian Foster has been productive otherwise.

Thus far in the season, Regan has allowed only four goals in almost 120 minutes of play, good for third in the conference, along with junior Chris Mannix of Providence. Foster allowed two goals in 60 minutes of play.

Tar Heels, Bruins top preseason basketball polls

Josh Shipp and the UCLA Bruins enter the 2007-08 season as the No. 2 team in the nation, according to the ESPN/USA Today preseason poll.

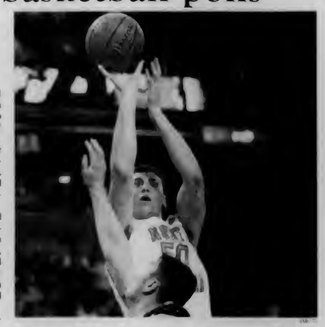
2006 finalists Florida, Ohio State left out of AP Top 25

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

As with every college season, the first 2007-08 ESPN/USA Today Preseason Top 25 Poll, released last week, had some surprises both on and off the list.

No. 1 Carolina, Duke and North Carolina State are the three teams representing the Atlantic Coast Conference, while six of the 25 teams ranked are in the Pacific 10 Conference.

Washington State and Southern Illinois are in the Top 25 – a first for both schools' histories – while Villanova, Louisville, Pittsburgh and Georgetown represent the Big East Conference in the poll. Kansas, Texas and Texas A&M from the Big Twelve Conference reached the Top 25, while Memphis is the lone team representing Conference USA.



Gators, Buckeyes Unranked

Two-time defending national champions Florida, along with championship runner-up Ohio State, are unranked in the ESPN/USA Today Preseason Top 25 Poll. This is the second time in three years a defending national champion is unranked in the preseason, and the first time both national finalists missed the Top 25 the following year since 1991-92.

The last team to go unranked after winning a national championship, North Carolina, who won it all after the 2005-06 season, lost four starters to the National Basketball Association's entry draft, including junior center Sean May and junior guards Raymond Felton and Rashad McCants.

This year's Gators have suffered a post-championship exodus of their own, losing four starters to the NBA draft, including junior forward Joakim Noah and sophomore guards Taurean Green and Corey Brewer.

See M. BASKETBALL on page 8

A year after reaching the Elite Eight, Tyler Hansbrough and the North Carolina Tar Heels are ranked as the top team in the land.

Education begins for SGA motion

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

Senators were called on to begin educating constituents on last week's vote to raise fees in the next year during last night's meeting of the undergraduate student senate.

"When we passed the motion to increase fees, we realized that there is a large need for education and input from our constituency," said Associate Speaker Kerry Shields.

Shields proposed the creation of an organization loosely made up of senators for the purpose of coordinating a series of "back-to-the-people" meetings with area governments over the next few weeks.

"We're going to try and coordinate them so they are issue-based around the SGA fees," Shields said. "We're going to find time to meet and create a curriculum and a time to have the [back-to-the-people meetings.]"

Shields' proposal came as the student senate voted again on the motion to increase fees as well as a number of other motions previously passed by the senate this semester. The second round of voting came as a result of procedural errors discovered during an assessment of the semester thus far, according to Speaker Carla Dominguez.

"For the sake of accountability and transparency, the leadership sat down and did a mid-semester review of the senate and the functions of the senate," Dominguez said. "We found a few errors that were done."

The motion raising the student activities fee by $3.25 per semester starting at the beginning of the next academic year passed a second time, with two senators voting no.

Senator Yannick Brooks, Chair of the Ways and Means Committee, told the 33 assembled that he had been working closely with Alan Brainerd to discuss procedures.

Brainerd is the director of finance and business services at the Center of Student Development.

According to Brooks, the budget deadline for the SGA agencies was "the closest thing coming up." Agency budgets are due before the end of the semester.

SGA president Aaron Buford came before the senate to ask for six senators, four from the ALANA [African, Latino/a, Asian Pacific Islander and Native American] Caucus, to join the SGA Coordinating Council. The council, a collaboration of every section of student government according to Buford, would need to be in place in order to appoint a new judiciary.

"It's really important that we formulate this group not only to form the judiciary, but just so that we have overlapping communication amongst the branches of student government," Buford said. "I think it's really important that we establish that."

Anti-war activist encourages reform

Hayden talk on movements

By Elyse Clifford
Collegian Staff

Tom Hayden aimed his Tuesday night lecture at the UMass Student Union at reminding students of the social movements during the 1960s, in which he played a momentous role as the author of the Port Huron Statement, the basis and inspiration for the ideology of student movements throughout the era.

Hayden, who was also the president of Students for a Democratic Society, began with a series of graphs illustrating the battle between reformists and the "Machiavellian Order."

One such battle was depicted by a timeline that he feels applies to every social movement in recent history. It begins when a movement is initiated in the margins of society, moves into mainstream culture and develops into actual reform, where it is repressed but sometimes accommodated by the Machiavellian powers. He said in reaction to reformations, a counter-movement is ignited that aims to weaken the reform.

He said that eventually all movements must be demobilized but stressed several times throughout his lecture, "the battle is then fought in people's minds, memories and museums."

Hayden believes that the government has worked hard to distort the memory of the 1960s by emphasizing the prodigal drug use and by reinforcing a stereotype of debauchery in the radical movement members. However he believes this couldn't be more wrong, saying, "the '60s ended because the '60s succeeded."

He also told the audience that "movements begin with handfuls of dedicated people," and that "gradual pressure on the government can end wars."

Hayden said that he has a stronger belief in reform today than when he first started. He added it is possible for the public to influence the actions of the government.

He encouraged people to be politically active by communicating with each other.

"Fifty-seven percent of Americans want out of Iraq, and they figured

Chairs sound off on search

By Ben Williams
Collegian Staff

Department heads and chairs weren't shy about telling the University of Massachusetts chancellor search committee just what they want to see in the new chancellor during their meeting on Tuesday.

For two days, the committee has been holding meetings with various groups on campus asking what they want the qualities of the new chancellor to be.

Kathleen Mitchell, vice chair of the committee, urged those in attendance to "dig deep in your professional rolodexes for the best example of a leader."

One aspect that many brought up was that the chancellor should be committed to making the University a true flagship institution in every sense of the phrase.

"To be a flagship administration [UMass] must have some autonomy from the state," said Mario Rotea, head of the mechanical and industrial engineering department. The concern was echoed by some of his other colleagues.

It was noted that while other large state universities have little competition, Massachusetts has a host of prestigious colleges and universities nearby.

Martha Baker, associate dean of the college of natural resources, said that "to be competitive, we need to look the part," noting the dilapidation of parts of campus.

Lieutenant Colonel David Vacchi, head of military leadership, thought to bring in higher caliber students, the chancellor needs to focus on student amenities, citing the lack of air conditioning in the Southwest residential area and a lack of free fitness facility.

"[Former chancellor John Lombardi] was always in a battle with Boston, [and I] want someone to continue that battle with the state," said Larry Zacharias, chair of the management department.

Kris Hollot, head of electrical and computer engineering, agreed that we need an "aggressive, strong voice to continue the battle."

Another part of making UMass a flagship university, argued Lisa Selkirk, head of the linguistics department, is to put teaching and research first. Others echoed her desire for a chancellor "who's willing to sup-

Noho ponders city's future

Plan explores housing, cash

By Adam Dupont
Collegian Staff

Northampton released its plan last week to govern future city growth called the "Sustainable Northampton Comprehensive Plan," the 73-page document provides a detailed look at how the city government intends to handle the problems that Northampton will encounter in the 21st century.

Many city residents were unfamiliar with the plan. Others had heard of it and offered some details on what they think the plan should address.

Bob Normand, owner of Bakery Normand's on Main St., sees the focus of Northampton's economy growth on the tourism industry, which he views in a negative light because it imports other people's wealth into the city rather than building up other industry to have the city create its own.

"It's a spin-off of wealth that is generated some other way," Normand said. "But the downtown lacks real business. Real things that people really need."

Normand also notes that the retail chain stores in Hadley "have sucked a lot of life out of downtown." Even though there has been an increase in traffic, which has also led to hassles with congestion on the roads, downtown business owners will say that "business is down across the board for every body."

Normand said that adding some chain stores could help bring more customers to downtown since people like shopping in stores that are familiar to them, but he also noted that "there has been a strong sentiment against big box stores" in Northampton.

The Reverend Peter Kakos at the Edwards Church of Northampton sees the lack of affordable housing, which feeds into a problem of homelessness, as a major issue in the city.

"The number of single room occupancies has, in the last 15 years, been cut in half," Kakos said. "People sold their downtown properties that probably had 10 to 12 rooms used for renting, [but they] saw they could get so much more money because the house is in a prime location, if you will, so they have been sold and converted into condominiums."

But building affordable hous-

Botanist examines warming

Raven talks at AC lecture

By Joshua Wolfstein
Collegian Staff

Peter H. Raven, president of the Missouri Botanical Garden and George Engelmann Professor of Botany at Washington University in St. Louis, presented a talk titled "Winning Sustainability in an Age of Global Change: What is Our Responsibility?" Monday night at Amherst College.

In his lecture, Raven challenges people to not only ask what can be done to reverse these processes but also to be responsible, moral citizens despite the fleeting pressures of time.

Professor Raven talked about the effects of global warming throughout the world, citing his recent visit to Shishmaref, Alaska, an island located five miles from the mainland, where he and other scientists saw "evident" effects of erosion in cliffs and shores, showing a picture of a collapsed house that had previously been upright three days prior to his visit.

The permafrost in sand dunes, on which many houses are built, is softening and melting. Ocean ice is turning into loose slush causing dangerous and sometimes fatal conditions for hunters who frequently walk on the ice.

The International Climate Change Partnership (ICCP) estimates that in this century alone the sea level will rise 2-4 feet but recent findings indicate that it will rise at a much faster rate. Several places around the world, such as the shores of Vietnam, have thousands of families living directly on the water, and with this rise in the sea level families and houses will inevitably encounter devastating situations.

Raven also explored population growth. According to Raven, in 1750 around the time that the Industrial Revolution began, the human population was around eight million. Since then it rose to 6 billion. Raven said a majority of the population growth comes from developing countries while only a small portion is a result of developed ones. He said the population is growing so fast that in a six week span, one million people are born in India and a nine-month span, 1 million people are born in Vietnam. One out of every eight people in the world is starving and the increase of population is certainly not going to help this ratio, according to Raven.

The Global Footprint Network calculated how many planet-Earth needs to support every one of the current standard of living. With the current population, it was determined that we need 120 percent of productivity on a continuous basis in order for support of 6.5 planets. If the population were to double, it would take the productivity of two and a half earths, and if we were to sup-

Lobsters featured at DCs

Even the University of Massachusetts Dining Commons dressed up for Halloween. "Tricks, Treats 'N More" drew students in droves to grab some of the specials, which included lobster, steak, dirt cake and frost-your-own cookies.

The most sought-after treat was the Maine lobster. When hearing that Dining Services would be serving lobsters for its sixth Halloween, UMass sophomore Ikeita Shuster said she was very excited. "I don't have lobsters many times in the year."

This excitement was understandable for many of the diners. "I was a little afraid for the seats," said sophomore Amy Stanitis. Some diners opted to sit on the Worcester steps outside of Hillside additional seating area rather than wait for a table to open up.

According to Worcester manager Roberta Potter, the biggest line was a 20-minute wait that appeared around 5:30 p.m.

"Everyone comes early for lobster, expecting [the DC] to run out," explained senior Meghan Brady.

Tickets were distributed at the door to claim one of the approximately 12,000 lobsters waiting to be served at the four dining commons Worcester alone had 3,500.

Along with the themed food, diners enjoyed magicians, fortune tellers and a costume contest. The winners of Monday and Tuesday's pumpkin painting contest were also displayed.

UMass reinvents trailers

By Jess Cohen
Staff Writer

Students in Dr. Alan Ellenegger's Senior civil engineering construction Methods course at the University of Massachusetts are designing a new type of emergency shelter that could potentially replace the current trailer used by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA). When completed, these structures will have twice as much living space, some designs will even include a second story. They will be able to comfortably house up to four people for up to two years.

Ellenegger got the idea for creating these shelters after seeing a TV program showing refugees of natural disasters being housed in trailer parks for long periods of time.

"I was all these FEMA trailers and I thought to myself, 'First of all, these people have essentially lost everything they own, and now we're going to stick them in a metal trailer. What an insult to their dignity. So port the current population at the standard of developed countries, it would take the productivity of three copies of our planet. Raven posed the question, "What will happen to our planet if our standards of living continue to rise along with our population?"

Raven touched base on the fact that biodiversity on this planet is diminishing. The number and variety of different organisms on the planet is shrinking. He said the increased number of endangered and extinct plants and animals prove this. The majority of these species have not been seen and each one is a unique product of 3.5 billion years of evolution. These unknown species will continue to be unknown due to habitat destruction, Raven said.

He added that a cause of this is greenhouse gases' rising and as a result of the global temperature's rise. Because of this change in temperature, more terrain becomes dry, and with this increase in dryness there will be an increase in forest fires, according to Raven.

He said over the next century it is predicted that the amount of forest fires will double due to the dryness, and as a result, there will be major habitat destruction. Raven said that if the global temperature rises two degrees Celsius, "we will have unmanageable conditions on our planet." Even if greenhouse gas emissions were stopped, there still would be an inevitable 0.5-degree Celsius increase in the global temperature. This extent of control over greenhouse gases is unlikely, so he said we can only hope that our society will do something about this constant release of greenhouse gases so that we can keep this increase in global temperature to a minimum.

Raven addressed those who take these global changes with a grain of salt by saying, "These current problems are not similar to problems we have encountered in the past. Those who believe that these problems can be solved by thinking the way we used to or using old techniques are certifiably nuts. Nothing about this situation represents what has happened in the past. These issues must be taken very seriously and approached in very different ways."

He stressed the idea of "promoting international understanding" through the means of leadership, emphasizing that "there is no leadership as important as the leadership you provide for yourself."

He expressed a need to continuously learn about these changes and then follow up what one has learned by means of action. He said that a key component in surviving this change is children and that they are the ones who are going to be most affected by these changes. He said it is important to get them involved at a young age and make them aware of nature and their surroundings so that when they are put into the situation where they are able to make a difference they will do so and be prepared.

The lecture ended with some words of wisdom from Gandhi: "The world provides enough to satisfy every man's need, but not every man's greed."

Raven has won many awards and held prestigious positions, including being a member of President Clinton's Committee of Advisors on Science and Technology and a U.S. National Medal of Science recipient in 2000. He won the Tyler Prize for Environmental Achievement, was the Former Home Secretary of the U.S. National Academy of Sciences and was a recipient of an International Prize for Biology.

Valley students head to Md.

BY CORY GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Friday, 118 students from the Pioneer Valley will travel to College Park, Maryland for the first-ever youth climate change conference entitled "Power Shift."

Students from the five colleges, as well as over 5,000 other high school and college students from around the country, will attend the conference to discuss the effects of global warming.

The conference will cover different topics, including workshops on renewable energy and the history of environmental justice. Guest speakers are scheduled to speak on ways people can go green.

"I really think energy efficiency and global warming are the problems of my generation and we need to deal with these problems and find solutions so our children and grandchildren can have a future," said UMass senior Vanessa Wright, who will be attending the conference.

Wright said the reason for the conference is to get people from this generation involved and for students to realize that they can make a difference with even the smallest amount of effort.

In her past years at UMass, Wright has worked to pass bills such as one on the use of energy efficiency.

The bill stated, for example, that LED lights would be used in exit signs rather than a old fashion light bulbs.

This is just one way people can help to prevent global warming, she said.

"The UMass Amherst Alumni Association proudly sponsors this event and others that enhance the student experience and advocate for student and alumni involvement in bringing national awareness to the concerns regarding global warming," the group said in a statement.

The students had to pay $20 registration fee to attend the conference and Wright said those costs go to getting the guest speakers, booking the space to hold the conference and other costs of workshops.

The conference will last from Friday Nov. 2 until Monday Nov. 5. Speakers who have not yet confirmed but may be attending include, Nobel prize winner Al Gore, former president Jimmy Carter, Chris Rock and Kofi Annan.

Engineers reinvent emergency trailers instead why not give them something that, for all intents and purposes, looks like the kind of house they're used to?" said Lutenegger.

The prefabricated structures will be made to be easily assembled and disassembled as needed.

"The idea of the shelter is to bring a prefab structure on site; assemble it as quickly as possible, make it weather-tight and bolt it to an instant foundation: the kind of temporary, secure, prefabricated foundation that can be bought off the shelf," said Lutenegger.

The class of 19 students is split into four teams, each with a different type of shelter: a traditional wood frame, timber frame, engineered lumber and metal frame.

Each shelter must include a bedroom, bathroom, kitchen and living area.

The current FEMA trailers have these same necessities. They provide 240 square feet of living space. The shelters being built for this course are proposed to provide up to 500 square feet of living space.

The designs are graded on aspects such as emphasis on economy, sustainability and the speed of the structure's assembly.

The designs should allow the shelters to be manufactured in two halves in a factory and then transported to disaster sites. They would then be bolted together onto an "instant foundation" made of screw piles that can screw into the ground at the site. This design makes for a safe foundation that can be made in a day and can also be easily unscrewed and redistributed for use at other sites.

At the end of the semester, a committee of judges will choose the best of the four designs in a competition. The winning design will possibly be patented by an outside construction company that has taken an interest in the project.

"If we have something that is very viable, economical, works well and is reusable, I'd like to take it to the next step and see if we can actually build one of the foundations and houses here on campus," said Lutenegger.

Department heads, chairs discuss chancellor search port research regardless of whether it generates external funding."

Funding was another area of concern in which the department heads want the new chancellor to be proficient. Zacharias noted that other large state universities raise around the $1 or $2 billion mark, of which UMass is far shy.

Rotea noted his desire to identify a chancellor who identifies fund raising as one of his top priorities. Other chairs also made the point that having money makes many of the other changes they want to see at the University possible.

Nearly everyone agreed the new chancellor must have a plan for the future.

"[The chancellor] should be a proponent of change," said Vacchi. "We're not one of the top state universities in the country, but we have the potential. [We] just need some gardening."

Elizabeth Chilton, chair of the anthropology department, said that the chancellor needed to be somewhat of an anthropologist in that he or she "needs to spend a serious amount of time getting to know where UMass is and where it was, and then form a consensus plan of where we're going." In her opinion, Lombardi hit some roadblocks because he didn't take that time to get to know the University before enacting his plans.

The idea of working with the University as a whole also came up a number of times. Audrey Altstadt, chair of the history department, said there is often an inequity at colleges between humanities and other departments, and the next chancellor should be "someone who's very even-handed."

This was echoed by T.J. Lakin Mountziaris, head of the chemical engineering department, who referenced the Latin root of the word university, "which means whole or community," said Mountziaris.

"University means all-inclusive," said Mountziaris. "We need someone who will grow the University as a whole ...[with] an all-inclusive vision."

School cafes inspire reading

BY TRAVIS LOLLER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

FRANKLIN, Tenn. — Even before the bell rings each morning, students at Centennial High School are lined up to get into the library. But they aren't necessarily looking for books.

They are waiting for a morning cup of joe at the Cougar Cafe, a coffee shop run by students.

Coffeehouses are springing up in high school libraries around the country, marking a big departure from the days when librarians sternly prohibited food, drinks and talking.

Some health advocates wonder whether high school students really need any more caffeine, or the calories in that caramel mochaccino.

But school officials say these coffee shops are promoting reading and studying by attracting teenagers who might not otherwise hang out in a library.

"Once they have them in there, they have their eyes and hopefully have their minds for a little bit," said Doug Johnson, a school library consultant from Minnesota.

The school library cafes are usually simplified versions of the coffee shops at Borders or Barnes & Noble bookstores. Centennial High's cafe, which has been open for only a few months, has an espresso machine and a milk frother, and sells fancy coffee drinks, hot and iced teas and hot chocolate.

"School food reflects the larger culture, so if there's a proliferation of coffee shops in bookstores out in the world, it's going to happen in schools," said Jan Puppendieck, a sociology professor at Hunter College in New York who is writing a book on school meals.

Marketing students work as baristas in the Centennial cafe, which brings in about $200 a day. After expenses, the cafe should make about $10,000 during the school year, and that will be turned into scholarships for the 10 to 15 student employees.

The coffeehouse trend comes at a time when many school systems around country are removing junk food and soda machines.

"They're already providing horrible school lunches. Now they're adding to that with 800-calorie drinks," said Susan Levin, a registered dietitian with the Physicians Committee for Responsible Medicine. Many students load up their coffee with sugar and cream or buy dessert-like coffee drinks, Levin said.

Jerry Shrader, Centennial High principal, said the Parent Teacher Student Organization considered whether it was a healthy idea before opening the cafe.

"I hen they came in one morning and watched how many students walk through the door with Starbucks or those Vaults, caffeinated drinks," he said. "There's not any increase in the amount of caffeine they're drinking."

The cafe uses 2 percent milk, offers sugar-free syrups and decaf coffee, and doesn't sell doughnuts or danish, said Robbie Reed, the Centennial marketing teacher who oversees the coffeehouse.

John Wilmer, who has run a before-school cafe at Hastings High School in Houston since he became librarian in 2003, said it is extremely popular with the 2,800 students.

Before the coffeehouse opened, "they were running about 6,000 visits per year to the library and checking out about 3,000 books," he said. Now, "we're running about 65,000 visits and checking out about 45,000 books."

He has used the money earned to eliminate library fines, he said.

On a recent school day at Centennial, 14-year-old Desmond Dwight, who works at the cafe, was sitting at one of the small round tables with friends. He said he visits the cafe "because I can get a cup of coffee and go sit and read a book."

Would he be reading in the library anyway if there were no coffee?

"I don't think so," he said, "because it would be boring just sitting here."

But 17-year-old Aaron Nall, a senior, said he doesn't think his fellow students read any more because of the cafe.

"I think this place is more a social scene than anything," he said.

ing in Northampton has been a challenge. Kakos said that the process involves "an enormous amount of red tape," making it incredibly difficult.

Kakos hopes the plan can remedy these problems.

"Maybe Northampton will become a model for small cities," he said. "Take care of homelessness by providing affordable housing and places for people to go."

The abstract of the plan has 12 guiding principles, including "[making] the city increasingly more walk-able, bike-able and transit-oriented." It includes clauses designed to "support a wide variety of housing types" to "create and preserve a range of affordability and choice in housing options," and to "support business and job development that contribute to the community and the city's long-term sustainability."

Harriet Diamond, a resident of Northampton for over two decades, wants points of the plan to be enacted democratically so all of the city's neighborhoods are represented, since the plan "doesn't necessarily represent all the neighborhoods and the interests of all the people."

"There have to be referendums on the fallot so people can really get a sense what this is about and if it's going to be good for their neighborhoods," said Diamond.

There will be a hearing on the plan at Bridge Street Elementary School Nov. 8, with a question and answer period from 6-7 p.m., followed by a public hearing from 7-10 p.m. Residents can read the plan in its entirety on the Web by visiting www.northamptonma.gov.

this out for themselves," he said.

Hayden said that mass media has only recently begun to portray the war negatively in response to the overwhelming opinion of the masses – it was not the other way around. And still, there is almost never an anti-war statement or publication in major media outlets, according to Hayden.

He said this is both disheartening and uplifting, as it shows that the media cannot be trusted to represent the masses, but he said it also exemplifies that "information is passed along through means of communication that are underestimated."

Hayden encouraged students not to be afraid to discuss politics and societal issues that concern them and to be especially aware of "the unique battle for the young generation: control of communication and technology." He also recommended visiting the Web site www.costofwar.com.

Violent death in Iraq wanes

By Douglas Birch
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — Violent deaths of U.S. troops and Iraqi civilians appear to have fallen sharply in Iraq in October, according to the latest Associated Press tally.

The AP's figures mirror other reports that the levels of bloodshed are falling here. But the meaning of these statistics is disputed, and experts generally agree that the struggle for security and stability is far from over.

The number of Iraqi civilians killed fell from at least 1,023 in September to at least 875 in October, according to the AP count.

That's the lowest monthly toll for civilian casualties in the past year, and is down sharply from the 1,216 recorded in October 2006. The numbers are based on daily reports from police, hospital officials, morgue workers and verifiable witness accounts.

The count is considered a minimum based on AP reporting; the actual number is likely higher, as many killings go unreported.

The drop in deaths among U.S. military personnel in Iraq was even more striking, according to AP's records – down from 65 in September to at least 36 in October. The October figure is by far the lowest in the last year, and is sharply lower than the 106 deaths recorded in October 2006.

The relative period of calm – if that's what it is – came during the Muslim fast of Ramadan, a time when militants have in the past escalated their attacks on U.S. forces.

Max Boot, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and former editorial editor for The Wall Street Journal, said the apparent decline in deaths reflected the success of the buildup in Iraq of U.S. military personnel, who now number 170,000. They have also moved increasingly out of massive forward operating bases into violence-plagued areas.

"I assume it's happening because the surge is working, and working even better than those who advocated it envisioned," said Boot, who was an advocate of expanding the deployment of U.S. troops here. "This is pretty dramatic."

But Anthony Cordesman, an expert on the Middle East and military affairs with the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the numbers he's seen so far mostly reflect a decline in the level of lethal violence against U.S. troops in Baghdad and Anbar province.

AP3

An Iraqi man grieves beside the flag of his country. Recent statistics show violent death in Iraq is on the decline.

Data collected by the General Accounting Office, he said, don't justify the conclusion that the overall level of fighting has fallen off, or that the number of civilian deaths is declining, because they don't paint a full picture of the conflict.

The statistics don't reflect attacks that result in injuries, he pointed out. Nor is there reliable reporting of civilian deaths outside of Baghdad.

"I don't question that the level of violence has gone down in Baghdad and Anbar," he said. "But what is not clear at all is that you have reduced the level of tension between Kurd and Arab, that the level of Shiite-on-Shiite violence is down, that the level of ethnic cleansing is down."

The reduction in U.S. losses, he said, is mostly a result of the revolt of the Sunni tribal leaders in Anbar against al-Qaida in Iraq, and not the U.S. military buildup.

And he warned that that revolt against al-Qaida was in jeopardy unless Sunni leaders get more support from the Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad.

"Does focus on one set of numbers tell you that the country is moving toward stability, security and political accommodation?" Cordesman said. "The answer is no."

There may be other, grimmer reasons the civilian death toll has receded. Sunnis have been driven out of Shiite neighborhoods, Shiites from Sunni areas and Christians out of both.

Many Iraqis have fled their country, or seldom venture out of their communities, offering fewer targets for suicide bombers or kidnappers.

Even those who think Iraq has turned a corner don't necessarily believe that the United States should dramatically scale back its commitment of troops – at least in the short term.

Boot warns that the United States will have to maintain a military presence in Iraq for many years to come.

"We're going to need a long-term buffer force in Iraq," he said. "We will still need troops there to assure both sides that they will not be left to the tender mercies of their enemies."

The Bush administration hopes to cut the number of U.S. combat brigades in Iraq by 25 percent by next summer. But some doubt that the Iraqi army will be ready to take responsibility for the country's stability by then.

Iraqi security services are still struggling to overcome divisions between Shiites and Sunnis and build truly national forces. Iraq's top political leaders, aligned along religious and ethnic lines, are sharply divided over where to lead the country.

Maintaining even relative calm here has taken tremendous effort. Baghdad, for example, has been turned into a fortress. Huge concrete blast walls ring buildings and highways, checkpoints choke traffic and Humvees equipped with weird protruding devices to foil roadside bombs roar through the streets.

Jury awards father in Westboro case

By Alex Dominguez
Associated Press

BALTIMORE — A grieving father won a nearly $11 million verdict Wednesday against a fundamentalist Kansas church that pickets military funerals out of a belief that the war in Iraq is a punishment for the nation's tolerance of homosexuality.

Albert Snyder of York, Pa., sued the Westboro Baptist Church for unspecified damages after members demonstrated at the March 2006 funeral of his son, Lance Cpl. Matthew Snyder, who was killed in Iraq.

The jury first awarded $2.9 million in compensatory damages. It returned in the afternoon with its decision to award $6 million in punitive damages for invasion of privacy and $2 million for causing emotional distress.

Snyder's attorney, Craig Trebilcock, had urged jurors to determine an amount "that says don't do this in Maryland again. Do not bring your circus of hate to Maryland again."

Church members routinely picket funerals of military personnel killed in Iraq and Afghanistan, carrying signs such as "Thank God for dead soldiers" and "God hates fags."

A number of states have passed laws regarding funeral protests, and Congress has passed a law prohibiting such protests at federal cemeteries. But the Maryland lawsuit is believed to be the first filed by the family of a fallen serviceman.

The church and three of its leaders – the Rev. Fred Phelps and his two daughters, Shirley Phelps-Roper and Rebecca Phelps-Davis, 46 – were found liable for invasion of privacy and intent to inflict emotional distress.

Even the size of the award for compensating damages "far exceeds the net worth of the defendants," according to financial statements filed with the court, U.S. District Judge Richard Bennett noted.

Snyder claimed the protests intruded upon what should have been a private ceremony and sullied his memory of the event.

The church members testified they are following their religious beliefs by spreading the message that soldiers are dying because the nation is too tolerant of homosexuality.

Their attorneys maintained in closing arguments Tuesday that the burial was a public event and that even abhorrent points of view are protected by the First Amendment, which guarantees freedom of speech and religion.

Earlier, church members staged a demonstration outside the federal courthouse. Church founder Fred Phelps held a sign reading "God is your enemy," while Shirley Phelps-Roper stood on an American flag and carried a sign that read "God hates fag enablers." Members of the group sang "God Hates America" to the tune of "God Bless America."

Young members of the Westboro Baptist church protest the United States' acceptance of homosexuality at an American soldier's funeral.

Three guilty in Spain attack

By Paul Haven
Associated Press

MADRID, Spain — Spain's National Court convicted the three main suspects in the Madrid commuter train bombings of mass murder Wednesday and sentenced them to tens of thousands of years in prison for Europe's worst Islamic terror attack.

But the verdict was a mixed bag for prosecutors, who saw four other key defendants convicted of lesser offenses and an accused ringleader acquitted altogether.

With much of the case resting on circumstantial evidence, the three judges may have been wary after a number of high-profile Spanish terror cases were overturned on appeal.

Spain's prime minister said the verdict still upheld justice. But victims of the attack, which killed 191 people and wounded more than 1,800 when bombs exploded on four trains on March 11, 2004, expressed shock and sadness over the court's decision.

"The verdict seems soft to us," said Pilar Manjon, who lost her 20-year-old son in the attack and has become a leader of a victims association. "I don't like it that murderers are going free."

Three lead suspects – Jamal Zougam and Othman Gnaoui of Morocco and Emilio Suarez Trashorras of Spain – were convicted of murder and attempted murder and received prison sentences ranging from 34,000 to 43,000 years. Under Spanish law, the most they will spend in jail is 40 years. Spain has no death penalty or life imprisonment.

Zougam was convicted of placing at least one bomb on a train and Gnaoui of being a right-hand man of the plot's operational chief. Trashorras, who once worked as a miner, was found guilty of supplying the explosives used in the bombs.

One of the biggest surprises was the acquittal of Rabei Osman, an Egyptian already convicted and jailed in Italy for the Madrid bombings.

Italian authorities said Osman bragged in tapped Arabic-language phone conversations that he was the brains behind the Madrid plot. But translations of the taped conversations by two sets of Spanish translators indicated his comments were more nuanced and did not amount to a confession.

The Spanish verdict came just two days after an Italian appeals court upheld Osman's conviction there, but shaved two years off his prison term, sentencing him to eight years.

Osman watched the Spanish proceedings on a videoconference link from the Justice Palace in Milan. The Europa Press news agency reported that he broke down in tears and shouted: "I've been absolved! I've been absolved!"

Four other top suspects – Youssef Belhadj, Hassan el Haski, Abdulmajid Bouchar and Rafa Zouhier – were acquitted of murder but convicted of other charges that included belonging to a terrorist organization. They received sentences of 10 to 18 years in prison.

Fourteen other defendants were found guilty of lesser crimes and six others were acquitted.

Much of the evidence in the 57-session, five-month trial was circumstantial. Bouchar, for instance, was seen on one of the bombed trains shortly before the attack, but at trial no one could definitively identify him and there were no fingerprints or other forensic evidence placing him at the scene.

A senior court official privy to the decision-making told The Associated Press after the verdict that the case against Osman was "flimsy," and that there was "no hard evidence" that Belhadj or Haski were masterminds. The official agreed to discuss the verdict only if not quoted by name.

Circumstantial evidence is admissible in Spanish trials. But the judges may have avoided relying heavily upon it because of a number of high-profile terror cases that were overturned on appeal, including one involving a Spanish cell accused of involvement in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States, said Fernando Reinares, until recently chief counterterrorism adviser at the Interior Ministry.

He said Spain will have to change the rules of evidence if it is to defeat extremist groups. "Islamic terrorism ... leaves a different kind of footprint" than traditional crimes, said Reinares, now head of terrorism studies at the Elcano Royal Institute, a Madrid think tank.

The trial was perhaps never going to produce the verdict some were looking for, since the seven men considered the true ringleaders of the 2004 attack were not in the dock. They blew themselves up at an apartment on the outskirts of Madrid as police moved in to arrest them three weeks after the bombings.

Three other men are still fugitives, though two are suspected of having killed themselves in suicide attacks against U.S.-led forces in Iraq.

The train bombing suspects were mostly young Muslim men who allegedly acted out of allegiance to al-Qaida to avenge the presence of Spanish troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, although Spanish investigators say the plotters acted without a direct order or financing from Osama bin Laden's terror network.

Spanish authorities had been on the group's trail in the months before the attack, but had failed to grasp what they were plotting, mistaking the coded language in tapped phone conversations as that of petty criminals arranging a drug deal.

The attack will be forever etched in Spain's collective memory, much as Sept. 11 conjures up so much pain for Americans. March 11 – a day of hellish carnage, wailing sirens and cell phones going unanswered amid the wreckage of blackened, gutted trains – was Spain's worst tragedy since its civil war.

President-elect thanks Clinton

By Bill Cormier
Associated Press

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — First lady Cristina Fernandez, in her first televised interview since winning Argentina's presidency, wished Hillary Clinton well in her U.S. election bid and thanked her husband for helping her triumph at the polls.

Speaking on Argentina's Todo Noticias network, Fernandez denied President Nestor Kirchner had distorted the extent of inflation and promised to put a priority on creating jobs, boosting exports and bettering health care and education.

Fernandez, a 54-year-old three-term senator, captured 45 percent of the vote Sunday, outpacing another woman runner-up, independent Elisa Carrio, by more than 22 percentage points. A dozen other candidates trailed further back, in an unprecedented race where women took the top two spots.

Official results published Tuesday showed Fernandez will take office Dec. 10 with a stronger grip on Congress than her husband has. The ruling coalition and its allies picked up 13 seats for 161 of 256 House deputies and added three Senate seats, with 44 of 72.

Fernandez acknowledged in the interview late Monday that she admired Hillary Clinton and noted frequent comparisons made between the two. Both are senators and lawyers who accompanied husbands from obscure state governorships as they rose to the presidency.

"I've been with her," Fernandez said, referring to a 2004 meeting with Clinton in Boston that produced a photo of the two with big smiles.

"Everything seems to indicate that she is the favorite of the Americans" in the Democratic primary fight, Fernandez said. "And why not? Another woman wouldn't be bad."

When interviewer Joaquin Morales Sola addressed her as the future "president," she laughed and said, "I'm still not used to that yet."

Much of her success was due to the accomplishments of Kirchner, who oversaw a recovery from deep financial crisis, reaching growth rates of more than 8 percent a year – help she acknowledged.

"Kirchner has been the flagship of this project," she said. "It's very important what President Kirchner has achieved in four-and-a-half years in office and this triumph is part of that."

As his close adviser, she said she was proud to have helped him turn the economy around, and she promised to continue his plans.

Fernandez dismissed widespread allegations that Kirchner's government has meddled with statistics to hide the extent of inflation, officially reported at 8.6 percent a year as of September. Independent studies put it at more than double that rate.

She promised unspecified measures to reduce the poverty that afflicts a quarter of Argentina's 37 million people, down from more than 50 percent at the height of the 2002 crisis.

She also vowed to make Argentine exports more competitive and to strengthen the region's dispute-ridden trade bloc, Mercosur, which recently invited Venezuela to join.

"We have to deepen our place in Latin America and amplify Mercosur," she said.

Asked what her husband will do once he has left office, a question of widespread speculation in Argentina, she laughed, and left the answer vague: "He's going to do what he has always done.

"He's a political animal. He's a man who deeply loves politics and really loves his country and has a great commitment to Argentina," she said.

Kirchner appeared to relish lame-duck status Tuesday in his first public event since the vote, but he also said he plans to serve as Fernandez's top adviser and made it clear that he would not be far from her side during the next four years.

"We are going to be working together so that this government really will be the best of all governments since 1983," when Argentina put an end to its military dictatorship, Kirchner said.

Forever a member of the Collegian family

My name is Gayle (Long) Carvalho and I was an editor at the Collegian from 1989-1992, editor in chief during fall 2001. I heard about Maureen from Meredith O'Brien, who is one of my oldest friends. I was the editor in chief during a great deal of upheaval at the University. There was a lot of anger from different groups on campus, and much of it was directed at the Collegian. Maureen was always in the office, doing her job and helping us as we learned to be responsible adults, and sometimes, responsible journalists. She was helpful to a fault, respectful without fail and even in uncertain times, was a rock of stability in the Campus Center Basement. The Collegian has truly lost a dear friend.

Gayle Carvalho

Amid the controversies that typically beset the Collegian's staff from semester to semester, Maureen was a source of continuity and stability for the paper's young journalists. Her passing is a loss for the Collegian family.

Tribute to Maureen

When I worked at the Daily Collegian in my senior year at UMass I always looked forward to walking into the office and seeing Maureen sitting at her desk in the back of the room. She was like our UMass mother, always willing to give advice or listen to the latest crisis, both work and, many times, non-work related. I remember her patience whenever I asked her countless questions about the intricacies of the newspaper. I remember being late to class because I was so involved with talking to Maureen that I didn't realize class had started 5 minutes ago. We were all so lucky to have had her in our lives because she gave us a warmth and caring that made being away from home a little easier. Maureen was a special lady whose smile, kindness, and laugh will be missed.

Maureen Majerowski was a long-term staff member within Student Activities, what is now known as the Center for Student Development. She began working at The Collegian in 1976, retiring in 2002 after almost 26 years of dedicated service. Maureen enjoyed working closely with college students, finding it fulfilling and rewarding, and said she would never forget the students or her days at the newspaper. Indeed, students would return after years away to visit her and her memory was long. As colleagues we enjoyed her friendship over the years and shared in many challenges that go with the constant changes of a college student activities program. We will remember her warmly.

Maureen, you were a Saint for all the guidance and support you had given the staff throughout the years. My most cherished experiences at UMass, and especially at the Collegian, would have never been the same without your long talks, laughter, and insight. I feel truly blessed to have had the opportunity to work with you. Farewell dear Maureen … you will be deeply missed.

Maureen never forgot a Daily Collegian staffer. In the grand scheme of things, I wasn't working at the Collegian very long – a year as a sports writer, a year as an associate editor for sports and not even a full year as the editor-in-chief. In the decade since I graduated, I've done what many ex-Collegian workers do and returned to the Campus Center basement to check in on the dungeon where I spent the majority of my college years. Not sure why, really. Maybe a sense of nostalgia, may be a lingering hope that nothing's changed down there and that all these 'grown-up' problems that piled on right after graduation were just a dream. Maureen and Marty provided that time warp for all of us alumni. At this sad time, I remember most Maureen's smile and 'hello,' welcoming me back into the office, not like a grand homecoming, but rather like any Monday in 1996. Or Tuesday. Or Wednesday... Seeing Maureen for just a few minutes here and there over the years was like a return to a wonderfully strange time of excitement, relaxation and passion in my life. It's a gift only she and Marty could provide for us Collegiarites of years past. Maureen, you will be missed.

I was deeply saddened to receive the Maureen had passed away recently. When I think of all of the experiences and all of the people in my life – few were more important to forming the person I am today than the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. And of the people who influenced me there – none was more pronounced than Maureen. When I think of Maureen, the image that comes into my mind was the look she gave me when I was about to make stupid decision. She would stop what she was doing, drop her pile of papers (still in hand) to the desk and just give me that look – the look that said, "Are you crazy, Ethan?". I can still see her sitting there in the middle of the room with that questioning expression.

She was a mentor and guide to hundreds, probably thousands of us who spent our free time working at the paper and devoting ourselves to its success. She would listen to our personal problems and successes and give us advice. She showed pure excitement each time one of her "kids" was offered a job in the "real world." She showed support and interest when one of her "kids" was going through a tough time. She had seen it all at the Collegian – success, failure, ambition, apathy and even some bad behavior (although we called it fun). She was a guide to us with out every telling us exactly how to do it – but by quietly whispering in our ears when something was about to go wrong. We didn't always believe her because we were college kids and we thought we knew it all. At least I did. In retrospect, I think that what Maureen taught me above everything was that I don't know it all – although, I am not sure I ever let her know that.

Thank you Maureen.

Advertising Sales Manager

I worked as an Advertising Representative for both my sophomore and junior years at UMASS. As a senior, I was the Advertising Manager. As a young business woman, I had so many questions and so much to learn. What I remember most about Maureen is her ability to help and support anyone that needed it. In other words, she never told us when she felt something should be done differently. A true teacher, she allowed us each to learn from our own mistakes, and recognized us for our accomplishments. She always had the time to listen as only a mother would to our many "girl" problems, boyfriend issues, classes and professors we needed additional support with, and so much more. She had a wonderful, caring heart, and she listened with sensitivity and love. I cannot remember the name of one professor I had from 1988-1992, but Maureen, I remember her presence, her smile, and that beautiful blonde hair like it was yesterday. She impacted my life in so many ways, and I will miss her.

Love,
Dena Hazelhorn Melnick
Advertising Manager 1991-1992

Maureen was of tremendous assistance during my three years at the Collegian. We didn't always see eye-to-eye, but in the end, we shared a mutual respect for one another. I extend the condolences of both myself and my family. I also think I can safely speak for the rest of the Collegian's employees when I was there; she will be missed.

Sam Wilkinson

I first met Maureen in the Spring of 1982. I had been hired as an assistant business manager, and worked closely with her and Jim Rotsaert.

Maureen and Jim were the heart and soul of the Collegian – he provided conservative financial and editorial guidance, she helped all the various personalities get along (and there were a lot of disparate personalities!).

Maureen wore many hats – tutor, mother, advisor, professional, and peer.

Her twinkling eyes were either full of excitement or mischief, depending on what we were discussing. She often looked the other way when we did things that were outside the rules set for us, and many times joined us for a drink at our regular Friday afternoon happy hour hang out, the TOC.

I moved from assistant business manager, to business manager, to editor in chief, and Maureen was always a source of encouragement and wisdom for me as I wrestled with various issues. For many years after I graduated I made a point of visiting Amherst at least once a year to have lunch with her.

Maureen made an indelible impression on me, and my lasting image of her is of her smiling in approval, eyes aglow.

Joel Myerson - President

I'll never forget Maureen's kindness and patience. She worked exclusively with college-aged kids, and even if we tried to our best to present ourselves with the maturity and wisdom of adults, I'm not ashamed to say we probably fell short now and again. It couldn't have been easy to be in Maureen's shoes at those times, but she never let us know it.

Maureen was a perfect bridge to the outside world, the working world, and she always doled out advice and counsel in her typical good nature.

I can guarantee the Collegian hasn't been the same since she left. And now we say the same thing about the outside world.

Michael Morrissey '94

I have heard the saying, "that eyes are the gateway to the soul"...and this is the first thing that I think of when I think of Maureen. Her beautiful, bright, blue eyes showed the world that she was caring, smart, funny, and a great friend to so many people and the thousands of students that she knew at The Collegian. I am so saddened by her passing, but I feel extremely blessed to have know her.

Millions of memories are flooding in, we had spent so many hours together, especially my senior year when I was ad manager. I can't tell you the thousands of times that she was my rock during a "crisis", she gave great advice and suggestions and would always be there for a laugh when it was all over. For those in the business office in 1999 and 2000, we had M&M day where we finally took the time to celebrate both Maureen and Marty for all of their help and support with decorations, flowers and a cake. I remember her being so surprised and grateful, and it was one of the best things our staff accomplished that year.

Debra Sheehan

Maureen was like a mother to us all who worked at the Collegian. She was someone you could always count on for a good laugh and honest advice. I enjoyed working with her and miss her big, bright smile already.

Christine Carroll

I am sorry to hear about Maureen. I remember her bright blue eyes and her gentle demeanor. I know she will be missed.

Kathleen Reilly

My strongest memory of Maureen was her calming presence in a complete rathouse. I remember Brian who "managed" the place. He was effective, but she was an exact contrast to him. She was always smiling and completely calm. She liked being around the kids and kept up with the pace but was always above the "fray." I can still picture her behind her desk. I am sad she is gone. I wish I had seen her again …

Rhonda Stapleton

Maureen was an incredible asset to have at The Collegian. She was always there with her smile when I was figuring out how to do my job, and more importantly always listened when I was discussing whatever was happening in my life. When I look back and think about her I remember the welcoming, warm presence she brought the business office (kinda like a grandmother would, (In essence she was like my Collegian grandmother.)

Bryn Simurdak

I have few happier memories from the Collegian. The day I found two tickets for Maureen for a UMass-Temple basketball game back when those were hard to get...a hold of.

Matt Vautour

As I was going through my mother's personal possessions, I found out many things I never knew before. At 54 years old, I never realized that my mother was an incorrigible pack rat. She kept every card she ever received, every bill, bank statement, mortgage payments, 401k, retirement account information, legal documents from the 1950's, newspaper clippings, report cards for 5 children, and memories from the Collegian. Until I went through her things in the days after September 06, 2007, I never had or was aware of the beautiful article written in the Collegian acknowledging her retirement and all of her accomplishments.

In all the years she worked at the Collegian, we heard daily about her "kids". She loved her job and relished the chance to influence the students she worked with.

All five children spent time in the office of the Collegian. Actually, it was probably the three girls who were there. We may have been looking for duties. In reality, we thought that the students were crazy to listen to our Mom. She drove us crazy trying to make us do the right thing, go to church, get good marks, go to college, and marry the right person. We thought, "How can those students stand her?" She drove us crazy. We all wanted to attend UMASS but she would never let us. Although as children of two UMASS employees, we would have had a terrific tuition break, my mother (Maureen Majerowski) had no intention of us getting into drugs, sex, and rock and roll of the high rise dorms at UMASS! We went to girl-only schools (the girls did) and our two brothers have a different tale to tell.

We were vaguely aware (or at least I was only vaguely aware) of former students who attended my Mom's retirement party and another get together we had when she became diagnosed with metastatic melanoma. It was not until her wake when we noticed a non-family member looking at a picture DVD of my mother through her life. I asked him who he was and he responded Tom Sweeney. His beautiful words regarding my mother were comforting and inspiring. We noticed him again at her funeral. Her good friend from UMASS, Marty Papas, delayed a very important trip to attend Maureen's wake. We are so grateful. She and many others are responsible for this beautiful edition in the Collegian. My mother, Maureen Majerowski would have been thrilled – as we are for her.

Our only hope is that we can live up to the imprint she has made.

Thank you, the former and current staffers of the Collegian for such a wonderful tribute.

Debbie Renzo

Maureen Majerowski Eulogy

I remember when I was in 5th grade and I had a very bad day at school. I got sent to the principal's office for wearing holey socks to school. I had to write I will not wear holey socks to school 100 times, say 5 Hail Mary's, and 1 Act of Contrition. When I was finally able to leave school, I found my bike tire was flat and had to walk my bike all the way home from school. When I got home I called my grandma at work. When she answered I just started balling and could not stop. My grandma then started crying. I realized that if my grandma knew that I was crying over holey socks she would think I had gone mad so I started laughing uncontrollably. She then started laughing. When I was through with my fit I said "Oh grandma, I feel so much better!" She said "Honey I do to but my mascara is running down my face and I have to get back to work but I will call you tonight." It was then that I knew my grandma would become one of my best friends.

In April, Bart and I came up North to spend the weekend with my grandparents in Maine. The first night Bart and Hank (as my grandpa is known in our circle) went to the casino and my grandma and I were left to our own devices. We started talking about when Bart and I would start a family and what having a family meant to her. She said that having her children was her greatest accomplishment. She told me that you do not know love until you have children. You love your husband more, your family, your friends even the stranger on the street. She said when you think there is nothing else in life you need you get the greatest gift of all… grandchildren.

She said with children you always worry… did I make the right decision? Should I do things differently? With grandchildren all you have to do is love and spoil them and leave the worry to the parents. We laughed as I reminded her of when I was younger (maybe 8-10) and was up north for a few weeks during the summer. My brother, Stephen, and I had to go spend the night with my other grandparents which we dreaded. To make matters worse I asked my grandmother who her favorite grandchild was and unfortunately she told me and it was not me or my brother. I was devastated! When we got back to my grandparents house I was so upset. My grandmother sat me down and asked me what was wrong? I told her the story, and she said Sarah, I am not sure why your grandmother would say something like that because it is impossible to decide." She asked me what my favorite candy bar was? I thought it was a very strange question to ask in my time of need but I said grandma I don't know. They're all so different it is hard to choose. She said exactly, choosing your favorite grandchild is like trying to pick out your favorite candy bar. It is impossible. She told me I was like a snickers bar. A little nutty but sweet just the same.

That night in April I asked her if she had any regrets. She simply said "None. She said every high and low got her to where she is today and she wouldn't change anything. I asked if she was scared of dying and she said this may sound crazy but no, I am not scared of dying I have my faith. I just don't want to."

Even in her darkest days my grandma was a fighter. She prayed hard, laughed often and lived her life to the fullest and I am so proud to have been a part of her life.

On behalf of our entire family, Bart and I would like to thank everyone for coming and celebrating my grandma's life.

I remember when I was in high school and my grandma, my best friend Kristen, and I were driving around. A song came on the radio and I said grandma this song reminds me of you and grandpa. She listened to the song and said what a great song. It could be about me and grandpa, me and you, my children, my family really it could be about anyone.

So to my grandma:

If you get there before I do, don't give up on me. I'll meet you when my chores are through; I'm not sure how long I'll be. But I'm not going to let you down, wait and see. And between now and then till I see you again, I'll be loving you, Love me

I love you grandma

Dear Maureen,

When you hired me in 1993 I bet that you had no idea that we would be spending 9 yrs which equals 2,385 days and 16,700 hours of our lives together. I came to love you as a big sister. We could talk about anything, kids, grandkids, husbands or "lack of," sisters and brothers. We also shared many events, births of your grandchildren, graduations, weddings, the deaths of our parents. You loved your family very, very much.

Maureen, I know you had a second love though. It was The Collegian.

I could see it in the twinkle of your bright blue eyes. You loved the interaction with the students, their Friday morning stories of the night before, listening to the ups and the downs of their personal lives and you would hand out the appropriate advice. You were also proud of how hard they worked to put out a daily paper, when they got a good grade on an exam or landed a good job when they were about to graduate. There are so many memories but here are a few that stand out.

The time when we started taking advertising from Anthony's Strip Club and some of the female students took offense and threatened to take us over, the time we walked into the office to find that a big party had taken place the night before. There were trash barrels filled with beer cans, a bar was set up in the graphics room with several bottles of liquor left behind. Boy, were you mad!!! The last one made up for the last. We walked into a totally decorated office for "M&M Day" (Maureen & Marty.) We were waited on and pampered with a massage that day.

I will miss you my friend
Love, Marty

I first came to work at the Collegian in August of '03 and I was very fortunate to have had Maureen Majerowski train me for my position. She was a wonderful teacher, very patient and kind, and did her best to teach me all that she knew from having worked here for 26 years. There were so many pieces of my job that she explained and trained me for. Since I came during a relatively quiet time, she was able to train me in a fairly relaxed environment. And then September came and all the students came back (as she had warned me) and from that point on, there was never a dull moment. She stayed on for a few months and helped me get my bearings. This would have been a very difficult job had it not been for her help and guidance. I could not have asked for a better, more thoughtful, or more thorough teacher. She was kind and compassionate as well. I totally enjoyed working with her and learning from her, and I am so sad that she was not able to enjoy more years of her well-earned retirement. She was truly a dear person, and I will always be grateful to her, and think of her fondly.

I had the honor of working with Maureen at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, University of Massachusetts Amherst. Maureen was such a wonderful person. She was always available for advice and guidance. For almost 3 decades she was a valuable mentor and an inspiration to so many students.

Halloween: the big picture

C.A. Chase

One striking fact about the storefronts of downtown Amherst in the weeks preceding Halloween is the extent to which their windows are dominated by painted ghouls and grinning pumpkins, and by those storefronts, the Starbucks and Ben and Jerry's, are so disconnected and oblivious to the graveyard that lies behind them.

Yesterday was Halloween, when the souls of the dead are said to walk, and today is All Soul's Day, when you pray for the dead souls. What does this Halloween have to do with death? How can we connect cardboard graveyards and plastic "R.I.P." cake toppers with a realistic, healthy view of death? We don't blink an eye at death, we just laugh on Halloween at skull masks that represent cutesy candy instead of death. To put it bluntly, Americans have a messed-up attitude towards death. We avoid it and cover it up with candy corn, furiously scrambling around before the lights go out.

Halloween is the one chance we have to have a serious conversation with ourselves about death, and we blow it. We blow it on candy, on costumes and on parties. Any meaning is co-opted into mass materialism, sexy costumes, and orange colored drinks, with frantic hedonism covering a slick denial of eternity.

Why don't we think about it? Why do we dismiss any serious thoughts about death as morbid on a night like last night?

Because last night was just like any other night, just like every other night. We end up fetishizing the very thing that we try to deny. With the Victorians it was an obsessive fear of sex (Freud was a product of his times); with us, it is death. The Victorians' attitude towards sex manifested itself in covering up piano legs and mushrooming rates of venereal disease. Our terror of death is belied by our incredibly violent video games and movies. We try not to think about the finite-ness of our lives, but we keep coming back to it, like a dog returning to its own vomit.

America has no mythology of death, no stories of explanation. We have the American Dream, to grab as much as you can, then retreat to a white-picket fence to happily lick your wounds. The majority of other cultures, however, have some sort of death mythology.

Our denial of death manifests itself in our desire for instant gratification. The microwave TV dinner is the logical opposite of eternity.

The Samurai were supposed to constantly contemplate death; in Mexico, there is Dia de los Muertos, where the dead are remembered and honored, and tied into the continuing world. The ancient Greeks had an elaborate underworld and the story of Orpheus. The Victorians had cemeteries with elaborately manicured lawns used for walks with the family.

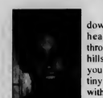
Our mythology works on getting the serial rapist on "Law and Order." The natural cycles of life and death are all off our radar; our materialistic myths mean nothing. Instead of thinking about eternity and what that means for life now, we take the present to ridiculous extremes. We talk about getting the "best pizza ever," the "best movie of my life."

We live in this candy-land without death, and our denial of death manifests itself in our desire for instant gratification. The microwave TV dinner is the logical opposite of eternity. We want everything now, so instead of color we get every day silent, gray and the same, because we want the quick and easy way, and we don't want to think about it.

Death is an uncomfortable thing to think about; it is uncomfortable to think in general. To realize we are so alone in life, so alone in death, alone in the beginning, alone in the end, and when we sleep no one follows us into slumber. Who wants to realize that we are all leading a life on borrowed time? Most people are uncomfortable being alone, and death ties into this, since your thoughts will eventually run to death if you think long enough.

The decisions you've made dog you to the grave. Was this the right choice? The right decision? We project our own loves, fears, desires onto an uncaring universe, and eventually must deal with an unrequited love for life. We all engage in celestial shopliffing, comforting ourselves with ideas of an afterlife, trying to stave off the end of the end.

And why think about it? Because if we thought about death, we'd have to take responsibility for our lives. Nietzsche said that God is dead, and that it was sad, because we were left with a negative eternity, with safety gone forever. Is this what will happen when we question life and eternity? They say death is the great equalizer, but perhaps it is the great nebulizer as well, in whether people allow themselves to think about it and allow themselves to be truly human. Because if we think about death correctly, we will also think about life.



If you walk in downtown Amherst, you walk past dead men and dead women lying quietly past the road and behind the stores. What is written on their headstones is supposed to stand in for a whole life lived, for the life and love and hate that is lost when the mortal coil is shuffled off. If they did not think about death, then they were estranged from life.

Instead of just Halloween being a missed opportunity, their lives were a missed opportunity. They lives shouldn't be evaluated post-mortem, and their happiness shouldn't be examined after the fact. It should have been questioned. It should have been mythologized. It should have been lived.

Above the graves, the sun rises and the sun sets, people wake, people lie down, sighing, living their lives, walking paths all leading to the same end. Walking past the graves, wondering if the people within were happy, if their lives meant anything at all, to themselves or to anyone else. I wonder the same things when I walk past the lighted dorms at night, with people standing in the windows.

For the USA, it's 'back to basics' time

Nick Milano

As you drive down Route 79, heading east through the rolling hills of New York, you come to the tiny hamlet of Lisle, with its population of just over 300 souls. Route 79 is its Main Street. About 25 minutes due west is the liberal college town of Ithaca. Turn around, and after spending five hours on the open highway, you arrive in the People's Republic of Amherst. What do these three towns have in common? Not very much.

To get to Ithaca from Amherst, you have to drive by both Springfield and Albany. These two cities have barely anything in common with the three towns. What they do share, though, is that they are all in this great country of ours. The nuances and the clear contrasts, between states, counties and cities, make the United States system inherently difficult to maintain. That it has been maintained is an impressive fact. But many things have changed, and the looming presence of the federal government threatens the independence of these municipalities.

After living under the burden of the British monarchy for many years, the Founding Fathers developed an inherent fear of a strong central government. They realized that no entity of government can adequately represent everyone in the country unless the power is located in the municipalities and states. This is the system of federalism, and it is dying.

The beauty of democracy is that the people hold the government accountable through elections. The best way for a democracy to effectively work for everyone is to have it controlled by the people at the local level. A nation has millions of voices, all clamoring to be heard, for their opinion to become the way of life. A state has millions fewer; Massachusetts is much more likely to develop a statewide coalition. How else could the Democratic Party claim its dominance? It controls the entire Congressional delegation, the Governor's seat and 95 percent of the legislators in the State House. Locally, there is more partisanship, as the separate districts more clearly serve a smaller number of people. All politics is local.

States' rights have been given a bad name ... but they must be resurrected lest the American system fail.

The federal government, however, is overextending itself. It must diminish the number of issues it controls. The 10th Amendment of the Constitution declares that all rights not given to the federal government are left to the states. It is not the federal government's job to legislate the definition of marriage. The decision to block women from having an abortion must be given to the states. The central government should not have the authority to legislate what scientists can study.

States' rights have been given a bad name because of the Civil War and the legacy of the Jim Crow era, but they must be resurrected lest the American political system fail.

There are problems with leaving all political responsibility to the states as segregation has shown, but the blame cannot lie entirely with the southern states.

There was a nationwide sense of racism. The Supreme Court in Plessy v. Ferguson even ruled that separate public facilities for whites and blacks were constitutional. The federal government abandoned its rule of overlooking the states during the Jim Crow era and allowed racism to foment throughout the country. Forty years after the Voting Rights Act and the Civil Rights Act were signed by President Johnson, the federal government is no longer overseeing state governments, but is stripping the states of any ability to rule independently.

The democratic system that the United States employed after winning the Revolutionary War was the first of its kind throughout the world. It was the experimental stage for democracy and passed with flying colors. Less than 300 years later, however, the system has adopted a quite different personality, in which the 535 members of Congress and the president determine the political debate. Divisive issues like abortion, stem-cell research and same-sex marriage are only political tools that are used to win points with voters. They have no business taking up serious political debate in Washington D.C. There are more important decisions to be made. If more attention was paid to the administration's marketing of the Iraq War, would we be stuck in the middle of a quagmire right now? If the legislative branch actually fulfilled its duty of checking the power of the executive, would we really be on the precipice of a world-altering war with Iran?

Congress must relinquish the debate on social issues to concentrate on its constitutionally mandated duties. The states can determine domestic policy for themselves. The United States of America needs and deserves a return to its federalist roots.

FIELD NOTES

The second of a three-part series of dueling the thoughts, perspectives and opinions of United States Army Public Affairs specialist and UMass senior Felicia Whatley. She is currently deployed in Bahgdad, Iraq.

The good fight, the long haul

Every suicide bomber is a weapon of mass destruction. Why the United States decided to go to war with Iraq no longer matters. What does matter now and for the future was the focus of U.S. Army General David Petraeus's congressional speech on Sept. 10 in which he stressed a need for a gradual reduction in U.S. troops in Iraq. Petraeus said that approach would be conducive to achieving military success and stabilization in the region.

President George W. Bush backs Petraeus's plan to remove five of 20 military brigades currently in place. "Because of the measure of success we are seeing in Iraq, we can begin seeing troops come home," stated Bush.

Troops are being withdrawn. That is a fact not to be debated or accepted. But with orders in my pocket to go to Iraq, given the opportunity to serve my country, I'd be pretty upset if the plane turned around because some Democrat decided we weren't supposed to be there in the first place.

Since last spring, the surge involving over 20,000 volunteer troops has deployed in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom. Substantial progress has been made. The increased presence of U.S. Forces over the past several months has contributed to the decline of insurgent attacks. Currently the attacks are at their lowest since Dec. 2006.

Civilian deaths are still unacceptably high, but they have declined significantly by 45 percent. At the same time, ethno-sectarian attacks have decreased. Any civilian death is tragic, but unfortunately, differentiating between friend and foe during a time of war is difficult when children and women are making themselves human bombs and driving through security check points.

We have gone on the offensive. Coalition forces recovered more than 4,409 ordinance, arms and munitions from January to September of this year. Unfortunately, more weapons are being supplied by Iran and Syria, making the fight on terrorism even more difficult.

Though the death of a civilian is tragic, the deaths of hundreds of thousands would be a crime. If we withdraw too many troops too quickly, Iraq's security would be at stake at the cost of innocent lives, not to mention what would happen to the United Nations forces, including our own troops, who would be overwhelmed and slaughtered by a greater insurgency threat.

There are currently about 169,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. Petraeus's plan will pull out 2,200 Marines this month and an Army brigade of 5,700 soldiers by Christmas.

This is a realistic plan for withdrawal. The surge has been successful in winning over local tribes. Local rejection of Al-Qaeda has contributed to the drop in violence over the past couple of months, most visible in Anbar Province.

With orders in my pocket to go to Iraq ... I'd be pretty upset if the plane turned around because some Democrat decided we weren't supposed to be there in the first place.

The number of car bombings and suicide bombings has declined. Coalition Forces continue to work to destroy terrorist networks that claim responsibility for these heinous attacks.

Despite the drop in violent actions, Sunni insurgents in Baghdad remind us that we are at war, and in war people die. These insurgents push a campaign to kill police chiefs, police officers and other Interior Ministry officials and tribal leaders in the wake of Petraeus's report.

"The main reason behind all these attacks are the signs of improvements of the security situation mentioned in the Crocker-Petraeus report," Tahseen al-Sheikhly, the Iraqi spokesman for the security plan said. "The terrorist groups are just trying to say to the world that the report did not reflect the reality of the security situation in Iraq," as quoted in the New York Times' "Sunni Insurgents in New Campaign to Kill Officials."

We have accomplished so much since toppling Saddam's regime. Our forces have detained or captured over 100 Al-Qaeda leaders. Surveillance and intelligence has been a good contributor.

Some of the problems we face involve Shia militia extremists from Iran who target our troops. These Arab extremist groups train and fund terrorists in Iran. Improvised explosive devices provided by Iran spur a "Hezbollah type force," stated Petraeus.

The locals have started to take democratic responsibility. Twenty thousand tribes and locals in Anbar Providence rejected Al-Qaeda and showed how they opposed the extremists by adding to the ranks of Iraqi forces with minimal U.S. assistance. Forty thousand more Multi-National Iraqi troops will be in position by the end of the month.

"This war is not only fought on the ground in Iraq, but in cyberspace as well," said Petraeus. This is a war of information. As Osama bin Laden continues to communicate through video, transferred all over the internet, to rally his cause and spread his terrorist ideals, the United States works to spread the ideal of democracy.

Iran and Syria have impeded this process and continue to be a threat. Iraq's long-term security as well as the security of our nation depends on stability in the region and proper security for their people.

The problems can't be fixed overnight and though many Americans want their sons and daughters home from war, there is more at stake. The fallen U.S. veterans died helping a nation that couldn't help itself from an evil dictator who murdered hundreds of thousands of his own people. Petraeus wants us to stay the course with a plan to gradually reduce troop levels. This is good diplomacy and a cause worth fighting for.

Real life story of kidnapping and murder

Providence writer and officer publish new true crime novel

By Ryan McAskill
Staff

Standing around a car, on the sidewalk or at a bus stop at 2 a.m. is something that we have all done after a night on the town. Things such as time and surroundings become irrelevant. Little thought is put into the world around us because we are winding off an enjoyable evening while in the company of good friends. On June 9, 2000, however, that exact situation led to a heinous crime that is the topic of the new real-crime novel "Thrill Killers."

Occurring in Providence, R.I., young couple Jason Burgeson, 20, and Amy Shute, 21, were loitering around Jason's SUV around 2:30 a.m. after a night at an 18 plus dance club with a group of Jason's friends. Slowly, the rest of the group went home, leaving Jason and Amy alone in the parking lot. Not wanting the evening to end, they hung out by Jason's SUV and talked. What they didn't know was that five men who had been looking to "get someone" all night noticed them and decided they were a perfect target.

Two of them approached Amy and Jason, pulled a gun, forced them into the back of Jason's SUV and kidnapped them. After a few minutes of driving, they arrived at an unfinished golf course on the Providence-Johnston boarder, where Jason and Amy were forced out of the SUV, robbed of $18, shot in the head and left to die. Just like that, two young lives were ended.

In the day that followed, all five killers, who were all around the same age as their victims, were arrested, and over the ensuing four years, all were sentenced. They would all get life sentences, though the judge informed three of the killers, trigger man Greg Floyd and accomplices Kenneth Day and Sammie Sanchez, that had the death penalty been on the table, they would have received it.

"Thrill Killers" is written by Rhode Island native Paul Lonardo and veteran Johnston, R.I., detective Raymond Pingitore. It follows the events of the crime through the eyes of detective Pingitore, who worked the case from the beginning. With numerous angles to approach it, Lonardo focuses on the lives of Amy and Jason as much as he does the crime itself.

"We really wanted this to be a story about Amy and Jason and who they were as people," said Lonardo. "We wanted to give them an identity. Much of the general public only knew them from the stark newspaper accounts, and it was important for us to talk with friends and family members in order to achieve this goal."

Despite the actions of the killers, who seemed to "murder without conscience," Lonardo avoided talking to them in any way. He let their video-recorded police confessions and testimony speak for them.

"What those five did is unjustifiable, and I didn't want to merit that by talking about them and their hard upbringing," said Lonardo. "I never had any plans to interview them, and even if I did, there is no way that I would be getting the truth. There are many people that grow up in poverty and have a hard life, but most of them don't turn into cold-blooded killers."

This is the first venture into the realm of non-fiction for Lonardo and the only literary work by Pingitore.

"My fiction stuff wasn't taking off," he said. "It's hard to start as a writer doing fiction for a living."

To aid his career, Lonardo began helping a retired Providence police chief with his memoirs. It was during this time that the case from "Thrill Killers" came up.

"We were talking about cases that he had worked and he mentioned this case and I thought to myself, 'This would make a great book,'" Lonardo said. "It was just through a chance encounter that I met Ray

Taylor perfoms house show in basement of Van Meter Hall

By Jackie Hay

For six to eight months out of the year, Steph Taylor leads the life of a musical nomad, traveling solo by car from venue to venue all over the country, keyboard and acoustic guitar in tow. Last Sunday, found her in the basement of Van Meter Hall for an evening of songs and banter, followed by talk about the ups and downs of being an independent artist.

Taylor opened with "Cavein" from her first album, "For Me," immediately filling the room with her intricate, percussive piano-playing style and expressive lyrics. It set the tone for the rest of the show, which took the audience along for a sounding, thoughtful exploration of the age-old themes of love, family, home and the road, and finding yourself again.

Taylor, who composes and writes all her songs and accompanies her own performances, weaves a musical tapestry that is rich, complex and layered.

The song, packing an emotional punch and always personal in nature, resonated with an audience that understood they were connecting with an artist sharing her soul.

"Most of what I write about is my relationships and my view of myself and the world around me. And a lot of times it feels like I'm just reading excerpts of a diary to a bunch of strangers," said Taylor before playing "Give Ourselves Away," a song about not having any means to compromise doing just that.

Taylor, born in North Miami Beach, Fla., started songwriting at 14 years old. Songwriting, the piano, and guitar were three passions that followed her through life, eventually leading her to stop studying for an English degree after two years at the University of Florida and moving to Boston, where she enrolled in the Berklee College of Music and played gigs throughout the area. She started touring full time a year and a half ago.

Since then, she has released two albums, "For Me" and "Between Ground and Sky," on her independent record label, Paper Bird Records.

The atmosphere of the show Sunday night was intimate and good-humored, as Taylor joked and chatted with the audience between songs.

"This was supposed to be a very righteous, angsty, I-was-sung-to-an ex and it turned into a last desperate attempt," she said self-deprecatingly before launching into "Leaving Expressions."

When asked by an audience member, Taylor explained that she never plans her sets anymore, but just picks

Independent artist Steph Taylor performed a house show in basement of Van Meter Hall last Sunday night. She played numerous songs off her two albums then did an open forum, allowing members of the small audience to ask her questions about her life as a musician.

Boston crime drama brings heart, substance

Directorial debut strong for Affleck

By Shyana Murphy
Staff

Ben Affleck may have a new occupation on his hands.

The actor best known for his heartthrob roles (Daredevil) and cameo flops (Bennifer) seems to have taken a turn towards legitimacy with his latest project, "Gone Baby Gone."

The film marks Affleck's directorial debut on screen. Based on the novel by Dennis Lehane (Mystic River), the film is as much a valentine to the city of Boston as it is a tale of innocence lost.

When young Amanda McCready (Madeline O'Brien) disappears without a trace amidst the squalor of her South Boston home, the shock of the incident resonates throughout the community. As media coverage abounds, the neighbors rally behind efforts to bring the child home. But South Boston is a den of secrets, as both the family and the police are aware. Cracking its code requires an insider's knowledge of the streets.

Enter private investigator Patrick Kenzie (Casey Affleck) and his partner Angie Gennaro (Michelle Monaghan). A Southie native with a checkered personal history, his connections to the sordid underbelly of the community run deep. If he can't convince the locals to spill the beans, chances are no one will. Despite immediate reservations on the part of Gennaro and the police chief Morgan Freeman, he sets about unraveling the mystery of the abduction.

Despite its throwaway crime thriller storyline, "Gone Baby Gone" possesses heart and substance. While the film is characterized by genre cliches – false leads, dead ends, skulking villains, and inconceivable twists of fate – the emotional sincerity of the characters involved never falls under questioning. The screenplay, also penned in part by Ben Affleck, is such that back story is given as much attention as the present story in determining the course of action and also the course of personal motive for each character.

In no instance is emotional sincerity more unwavering than in the Leopard print and Roberto Cavalli have resumed. The designer's debut collection for Swedish magazine H&M will be released on Nov. 8 of this year.

Cavalli is one of the many celebrity designers (and the only Italian ones) to have a line at H&M. The designer will add his distinctive flair to the racks of the clothing giant, the store will certainly not lack sexappeal after Cavalli is through with it.

Erling Persson founded H&M, but Heinnes and Mauritz in 1947 as a women's store in Sweden. Persson's son Stefan became the CEO of the company in 1998. Now with stores in over 28 countries, H&M has become known as the embodiment of cheap and chic fashion, embracing some of the greatest designers and fashion icons of the 20th century.

In 2004, H&M teamed up with head designer of Chanel and Fendi, Karl Lagerfeld. The man who made wearing black and white was of his transferred his shirt silhouettes to his lower and collection. The next year Stella McCartney, daughter of Beatle Paul McCartney, introduced her own brand of fashion excellence to the store.

His most recent addition to the roster of high-fashion designers was the Paris-based enfant Viktor & Rolf, who created a line in 2006 to sold out within hour of its release debut. Madonna and Kylie Minogue also hold spots on the list.

Cavalli's collection will be launched in Rome last week. [illegible] party guests. Masked models paraded around the party wearing his designs while champagne flowed like water into the glasses of customers like Halle Berry and Sharon Stone.

case of Helene McCready, played by Amy Ryan. Don't be surprised if she gets an Oscar. Her turn as a drug-addled, negligent mother coping with the loss of her child is not nearly as generic as one might expect. The majesty of her performance is that there is no agenda to it. Ryan plays Helene straight, with no intention of instilling in her a desire for redemption. The audience is free to revel in – or revile – her immorality without bias.

Similarly memorable is newcomer Jill Quigg, herself a former resident of South Boston. Her brief appearance as Helene's friend Dottie is entertaining to watch. Meanwhile, Casey Affleck appears bland, an actor for whom heroism could be projected onto rather than from, until the final moments of the film.

The sincerity of the performances serves as a credit to Ben Affleck's strength as a director. However, as a novice to the trade, he sometimes gives away clues to his own inexperience. Namely, Affleck hasn't mastered scene progression and often relies on black outs to transition from one point to another.

Stylistically and as a director, Affleck's heart is in Boston. Seduced by the faces and the rhythm of the city, he has a tendency to allow his passion for detail trump the larger picture. "Gone" continues to glory in details, even when the presence of the city is no longer tangible. Intricate items, from the medal of St. Christopher to a doll, to the more grisly images of duct tape and soiled underwear, jump out in a given scene and likewise, details about the characters and about the plot jump out before the larger picture presents itself. Sometimes, Affleck relies solely on these smaller details to supply truth in the storyline. This works, but the larger narrative of the film occasionally suffers as a result.

The film works best when it ceases to cater to a larger narrative, when it's allowed to linger in the bars of South Boston after closing time, and in the dialogue of its main characters.

The greatest source of poignancy in the film, however, does not belong to the cast or to the director, or even to the great city of Boston. As the film barrels towards conclusion, the story melds into a question of morality, and the resolution, nothing more than a response to that question. The final scene is heart-breaking.

Dangers of soda and Junior Mints

By Emily Trembley and Kimberly Burke
Collegian Columnists

Imagine this Halloween you and your friends are going to see a scary movie. You stop at the refreshment stand and get soda (a small is seven cups) and a box of Junior Mints (4.75 oz). Even scarier than the movie you're there to see is the snack you choose. How would this affect your health? How is this going to affect you in the long run?

First we'll look at that soda. Bubbly, fun and tasty, soda is a regular in the diet of many Americans. What people may not understand is that soda affects their health. One small movie theater soda contains 500 calories.

Soda has been referred to as "liquid candy," meaning it is a beverage loaded with sugar, dyes, preservatives and little else. It has a low nutrient density, meaning that it provides very few health benefits (i.e. vitamins and other nutrients like calcium) but is high in calories and sugar.

Well let us look at some of the ways in which soda might affect a person. Excess sugar can lead to cavities in the teeth. Also, the acidity level causes calcium to leave the bones, and less calcium in the bones can lead to osteoporosis.

Here is an experiment to try: Take a can of regular Coke and empty it into a clean glass. Find a chicken bone. Place the chicken bone in the glass, leave it submersed for a few days, and then remove it. Look at the differences in the bone. Notice how it is changed from sturdy and firm to soft and more flexible.

Drinking soda may also affect your heart health. The Journal of the American Heart Association published a study recently stating that "drinking more than one soft drink daily, whether regular or diet, may be associated with metabolic syndrome or increase risk factors for heart disease."

See NUTRITION on page 9

While soda and candy may be a nice treat at the movies, they can cause numerous health issues when not consumed in moderation.

Learning from the pros

what she wants to play next from a list of all the songs she knows taped to the top of her keyboard.

After closing her set with fan-favorite "Anything for You," Taylor opened up the floor to questions from the audience about her life as a musician and independent artist.

"Listen to other people's music, learn how to play their songs. That right in itself makes you a better player, a more diverse player," she said, when asked to share the best advice about songwriting she's ever received. "There's definitely originality that people carry, but we are a product of our influences from the day that we are born, and that has to do with our parents, our environment, the music we listen to, the sights that we see, everything we experience."

In response to a follow-up question, Taylor said that her biggest musical influences are Tori Amos, Ani DiFranco, Fiona Apple and the Beatles.

"Touring alone can get lonely sometimes, having its ups and downs," she said.

By far the most taxing and heartbreaking part of being independent is the business side, she said.

"There's not enough of me to do everything I should be and want to be doing. That can be really frustrating," Taylor said. "I book everything three months in advance and before I start booking I'm planning. All of my time is so immersed in this process – getting in touch with people, following up with them, sending the materials that they need, calling numerous places – it's just so hard to make everything line up. I can't really focus on just being an artist, or just being relaxed and doing fun stuff."

But there are good reasons for being independent.

"When you start out independent, it's a good way to have your hands in everything you do and understand what's coming towards you," said Taylor. "A lot of people are so separated from the business aspects of it that they just don't know what's going on, and that's how they get screwed over. I just think that there's more control and pride in being an independent artist."

She added that the best part is the whole aspect of planning a show, booking it, putting it on and it being successful and connecting with people.

"When that whole circle happens, it's the most gratifying, rewarding, beautiful, connected feeling," she said.

House concerts – performing for a gathering of friends in someone's living room – are one of Taylor's favorite venues. In many ways, Sunday's show at Van Meter was exactly that an up-close-and-personal event for residents in a hall with the theme of Media, Culture and the Arts.

"I like doing house concerts because they automatically lend themselves to a captive and personal performance. The space is usually set up to be more like a listening room, which allows me to really connect with an audience, which is what I enjoy most about playing," says Taylor.

"Also, at a house concert, everyone is there for the music, so there is no one talking over my set and no drunken heckling," she said. "I get to meet true music lovers this way as well as other artists and musicians. It is a win-win for all."

Now back on the road, Taylor's next stops include New York City, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Knoxville. She expects to release her newest album, "Day of Abandon," in late 2008.

[Pingitore], who had worked the case, was passionate about it and was willing to help."

With the assistance of Pingitore, as well as numerous other Johnston and Providence detectives, Lonardo began to compile all the information for the book.

"All of [the detectives] had kept a bunch of personal notes about the case and they were all willing to talk to me and give me whatever they had," said Lonardo.

Also through Pingitore, Lonardo was able to interview families of both Jason and Amy.

"Without Ray [Pingitore], there is no way that I would have been able to interview the families," said Lonardo. "Had I been just a writer doing this book, they would have turned me away, but because Ray had such a good relationship with them already, it was able to carry over to me and they were more willing to open up. They read [early drafts] and when they saw what I was doing with the case, focusing on the lives of Amy and Jason, instead of on the killers and the crime, they started opening up even more and were giving me more information on their loved ones. I really wanted to have even coverage between Amy and Jason."

As with any book, people will take different things away from it. Lonardo recognizes the way that the message of "Thrill Killers" can resonate with college students.

"There are certainly a number of ways to present this to college students – none more so than a cautionary tale for young people to be aware and vigilant, not just for foreign terrorist, but for homegrown evildoers of the kind that abducted and killed Amy Shute and Jason Burgeson," he said.

and glamour. The lengths range from thigh skimming zebra and leopard print minis to a floor-sweeping, leopard print maxi-dress. Cavalli's favorite piece from the collection, Flowing leopard print tops and even a corset in the same print scream "Cavalli" but at a price that won't make customers cry when they fork over their credit cards.

The priciest piece is a gold lame dress for around $430; the cheapest piece is a pair of men's jeans for around $85.

Anyone who isn't ready for animal print can breathe a sigh of relief, not everything is covered in leopard and zebra. There's a white ruffled, sleeveless women's top with a black bow, an oversized black cardigan and a black military jacket. For the men there is a black wool suit, a belted, double-breasted trench and plenty of silk tops. There's also an impeccably tailored tuxedo, of course, it's Robert Cavalli's white wool suit for women.

The highlight of the collection is a barely-there gold flapper dress with fringe at the hem.

The designer was thrilled that the collection is being released in time for Christmas and New Years, and especially that he has been given the opportunity to design for the younger set. He hopes that the collection will be sold out within a month, in which case the designs will not be reproduced. With the amazing success of previous designer lines, Cavalli won't have to worry about his collection taking even 24 hours to sell out.

"I have dedicated this collection to the young people who will be able to wear a Cavalli piece for the New Year," he told Ultra Daily.

Cavalli, who showed his first collection in 1972, has since become an icon in the fashion world. He is most known for his signature animal print and sexy cuts. Celebrities from Halle Berry to Jon Bon Jovi wear his clothing, and now with his exclusive H&M line, people with a limited budget can less-than-celebrity status can get their hands on his designs.

In addition to the new line, the Italian design mogul also heads its main brand, Roberto Cavalli, which includes women's ready-to-wear, menswear and accessories, as well as Just Cavalli, a less expensive brand of women's and menswear sold in upscale department stores. Roberto Cavalli "Class" is the most expensive line, and the cabs manufactured by Ford in a children's line called Roberto Cavalli "Angels," which caters to children aged six months to 14 years old. People drink soda regularly, but they also have another sweet additive to their diets: candy. Halloween is a favorite holiday for kids and adults alike, so what Halloween is complete without the loads of candy people hand out freely? Whether you are munching on bite size chocolates that you keep on your desk or eating the whole box of Junior Mints at the movies, these calories can add up quickly. That box of Junior Mints contains 595 calories and 8.75 grams of saturated fat.

Candy is considered a food that has "empty calories" because they provide no important nutritional value. These food items provide a small amount of energy from sugar but contain little or no essential nutrients like vitamins and minerals.

Many foods that are high in sugar are typically high in fat also, which is usually the case with candy. Foods high in saturated fats have been linked to obesity and heart disease.

Today obesity is becoming more prevalent, due to many factors. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) states that physical inactivity and unhealthy eating contribute to obesity and a number of chronic diseases such as cancer, cardiovascular disease and diabetes. The Dietary Guidelines for Americans 2005 recommends that people limit their intake of food and beverages with added sugars, like high fructose corn syrup.

So what do we do with all that leftover candy? Moderation is the key. People should limit and pay close attention to what they consume. Snack on small amounts only, like the small candy pieces instead of a whole candy bar. Keep candy out of sight, "Out of sight, out of mind." Keep only a small amount and throw the rest away.

At the movies, buy a smaller box of candy. If they don't have any small boxes, grab a medium and put the rest of the box away until later. Bring a drink with you to the movies or have the 20 percent juice instead of soda.

There is nothing scary about finding out you already have 500 calories on simple snacks. That really puts the horror in horror movies.

Coen seeks UM passing mark

The Rams lead the CAA in rushing with 2,128 yards along with 19 touchdowns. URI average 4.5 yards per carry, but is going up against a UMass rushing defense that is tied with Hofstra atop the CAA, allowing just 2.9 yards per carry.

Rhode Island represents a different type of challenge for the Minutemen, though, and one that will challenge Jason Hatchell, Charles Walker and the rest of the defense.

"It's the linebackers and secondary working in concert that changes things. What transpires [on a given play], and how they block determines how they go ahead and fit, so the linebackers and secondary have to work together."

As far as Coen's chance to become the all-time passing leader in his home state, Brown said he's talked to his quarterback about what it would mean to reach the milestone in what is likely his last collegiate game in Rhode Island.

"I joked with him about it earlier in the week," Brown said. "I told him he's got to go back to his home state this summer. This is an important game for him; this will be his last chance to play in his home state as a collegian, so it's a big game for him."

With the 2007 regular season drawing near its end, every week is beginning to take on that "big game" feel. The Minutemen play three of their final four games on the road, including last week's trip to Williamsburg, Va. – a victory over William & Mary. With momentum a priority for teams heading into the postseason, having just one home game in November (next week against New Hampshire) could be trouble for a team that is so successful at home.

"It's a challenge any time you go on the road in our conference," Coen said. "We have to take pride in playing well on the road, and I think we've done a decent job on the road this year in getting ready the night before and execution-wise."

UMass climbed a spot in the Sports Network poll, moving ahead of Montana into third, receiving six first-place votes. The Minutemen are still No. 4 in the FCS Coaches' Poll, with a pair of first place votes.

With Hofstra's 35-31 loss to Villanova Saturday, the UMass now has a two-game lead in the CAA North division, and is the only team remaining with a perfect record in-conference. Three teams in the South division – Delaware, James Madison and Richmond, are 4-1 in CAA play. Coincidentally, those are the only CAA teams UMass does not play in 2007.

Redshirt senior running back Matt Lawrence paced the Minuteman offense with 198 yards on the ground last weekend.

a conference-best 266 rushing yards per game.

But it will be a tough test for Rhode Island, as well. The Minutemen possess one of the stronger defenses in the FCS, ranking third in the CAA in scoring defense (19.5 points allowed per game) and second in rushing defense (117.5 yards per game).

"Boston College was trying to run the ball on them, and weren't very successful at it," URI coach Tim Stowers said during the conference call. "So we have our hands full. They're always in the right spots, they bring pressure and they're very athletic and they make plays. They play outstanding defense."

The Minutemen catch a break this weekend, with Rams starting quarterback Derek Cassidy (ankle) and running back Joe Casey (shoulder) likely out with injuries. But the defense must still contend with running back Jimmy Hughes, who gained 168 yards and three touchdowns last weekend against the Wildcats.

The Rams lose a lot of offense with Casey and Cassidy both going down last weekend. Casey has 782 rushing yards this season (105 last weekend) and Cassidy has good mobility, gaining 444 rushing yards (192 net yards) and three touchdowns. But Stowers believes his offense will be just fine this weekend.

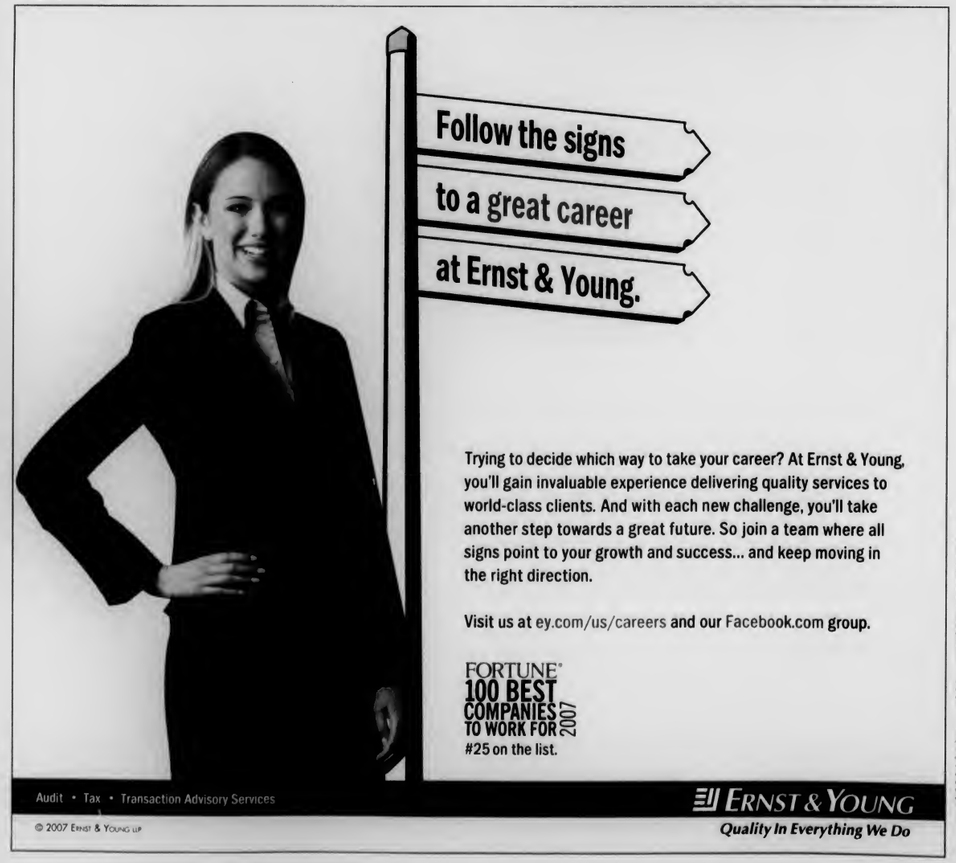
"I thought Jimmy Hughes had an outstanding game," Stowers said. "He can run outside, he can run inside and he can catch the football. He's just a complete football player.

"I feel like this might be a better football team if Joe [Casey] can't play – if we put Jimmy back there and put the ball in his hands," he added.

Hughes has been a playmaker for the offense, averaging 9.4 yards per touch. He's accumulated 668 yards of total offense (469 rushing, 199 receiving) and has been a terror to defenses on the ground, averaging 8.1 yards per carry.

"[It's] a different test [for the defense], because it's so unique in the way they go about running the football," Brown said before Wednesday's practice. "It will be a real disciplined challenge for our guys, because if you make a mistake in the run game and you jump up in the run, you can get beat in the play-action pass."

Sophomore D.J. Stefkovich will make his first-career start in place of the injured Cassidy this weekend. The back-up quarterback also has some mobility, but Rhode Island's chances hinge on him limiting mistakes and capitalizing on opportunities – something the offense has struggled with this season.



Despite ranking second in the conference in time of possession (32:46 per game), the Rams have problems finishing drives. They rank second-to-last in the 12-team conference in both third down conversions (34.8 percent) and red zone scoring percentage (69 percent). They've also struggled on field goals once in the red zone, connecting on just half of their eight field goals tries.

The Rams have 105 more rushing attempts than any other team in the CAA this season, and have run the football 73.8 percent of the time. But they may need to mix it up a little bit if they hope to get their first conference win of the season, because coach Brown will have his defense ready for the spread option offense this weekend.

The Minuteman defense looks to put the same crunch on the Rhode Island running game as it did two weeks ago against Northeastern. The Rams sport the A-10's top rushing attack, averaging 266 yards per game.

Both forwards and defensemen are important parts of the penalty kill in college hockey. Several of the Minutemen's best goal scorers also spend significant time on this special teams unit. The team was also without its best penalty killer, sophomore forward Brett Watson, last weekend.

Large home surface should help UMass

Minutemen failed to score twice on the two-man advantage and looked out of their element on the Warriors smaller ice sheet.

"We had two 5-on-3s we didn't score on up there, and we had a couple power plays that they did a pretty good job killing penalties. That lack of productivity on special teams really got in the way of us winning games that we certainly had every chance to win, but it was because we didn't execute."

Merrimack's rink is the same size as the one UMass played on last Friday at Providence's Schneider Arena. Both sheets are 200 feet by 85 feet. The Mullins center has an extra 10 feet in width at 200-by-95, which makes a world of difference in the speed of the game and the style of play.

"Generally speaking, the games played [at home] and [at Merrimack] are played a bit differently because of the ice surface," Cahoon said. "It's not so different from this past weekend, where we clearly played a whole lot better here [at home against PC] than we did down there."

For a team like the Minutemen, moving to a smaller ice sheet is like handcuffing your skaters in the offensive end, something that appeared to happen at Providence Friday in a 3-1 loss. UMass players were bumping into each other and struggling with the lack of space they had to work with.

Conversely, when a team like Merrimack or Providence comes to the Mullins Center, they can get lost in the extra space, which causes communication problems on the ice and disrupts the timing of the team's offensive attack.

"Your time and space are reduced because everything happens much quicker in a smaller space," Cahoon said. "We're very structured in the tight rinks. You have to be.

"What can happen to teams in bigger rinks like our rink is that they get lost in the space, so they lose their shape and they lose their team format."

The Minutemen will have the home-ice advantage Saturday, and need to take advantage of it after starting their conference schedule without a win in their first three Hockey East games. Next week, the Minutemen will be without the comfort of home, playing two road games against BU and UMass Lowell.

UMass is 20-11-1 at home all-time against Merrimack, and at 29-27-5, the Warriors represent the only Hockey East school against which the Minutemen hold a winning record.

Playmakers double as penalty killers for Maroon and White

plenty of guys here capable of killing penalties."

With Watson out of the lineup, junior Jordan Virtue and freshman Michael Lecomte saw time on the kill last weekend along with Quirk, Berry, junior Chris Davis and senior P.J. Fenton. Watson typically pairs with Fenton, but has played with Berry and others at times depending on the opponent. Watson's absence also robs UMass of one of its most successful face-off men.

Obviously, the objective doesn't change on the penalty kill, but the ways to best defend against the tendencies of an opponent vary.

"We like to go real hard and make the team string together three of four good passes to get a good opportunity," senior captain Mike Kostka said. "It's a little tougher on the big ice surface [of the Mullins Center] because they have more time, but generally we like to be very aggressive."

But Kostka understands that during a penalty kill, you can't be too aggressive. Focusing too much on one player can crate a clear seam to the net or to another teammate open for a shot. The forwards who see time as penalty killers also must beware of over-pursuing a play. Typically, forwards harry the opposition's point men and going for a pokecheck and missing essentially eliminates him from the play long enough to create a goal.

"Even though we're down a man, there's a lot more open ice down there. So every once in a while, instead of icing the puck and just killing time, we try to jump the play and get a goal," Davis said.

"You never want to put your team in a bad position when you're down a man, but if the other team is pushing up too many guys on the power play, trying to score, we can catch them on a 2-on-1, 2-on-2. Me and [Quirk] are fast guys and we always have to be in the right position and know when to go."

Davis scored UMass's lone short-handed goal so far this season when he jumped a play against St. Lawrence on Oct. 12.

At times, the fact that some of UMass's top penalty killers are also their primary offensive playmakers creates difficult circumstances for Cahoon. When trailing late in games, the minutes players like Quirk and Davis spent on the penalty kill cut down on their explosiveness. Quirk doesn't feel like it's a particularly large problem, but when its avoidable, the Minutemen have to refrain from taking misguided penalties.

Saturday's opponent, Merrimack, is not one of the Hockey East's most dangerous teams in any aspect of the game. But after dropping 2-of-3 to the Warriors last season, the Minutemen know they can't afford to sleepwalk through the game.

"It's not just [BC and BU], it's every team in this league," Kostka said. "There are guys on every team you have to look out for."

Joe Mehmi can be reached at jmehmi@student.umass.edu

Junior forward Chris Davis brings his quickness to the penalty kill unit and also owns the Minutemen's only short-handed goal.

Freshmen goaltender Paul Dainton ranks eighth among Hockey East goalies in goals-against average at 2.52. The freshmen has started five of the Minutemen's first six games in net.

Xavier picked to win A-10

Lavender, Daniels headline returning Musketeer seniors

By Sam Ehrlich
Collegian Staff

For the second straight year, the Atlantic 10 coaches selected Xavier to win the conference.

Xavier, who shared the A-10 regular title last year with Massachusetts, garnered 42-of-59 first-place votes. The Musketeers have won 20 or more games in 10 of the last 11 seasons and have advanced to the NCAA Tournament in six of the past seven years.

The coaches picked Xavier first overall largely due to its impressive returning class.

Returning senior guards Drew Lavender and Stanley Burrell both received all-Atlantic 10 honors last season, while leading the Musketeers to the second round of the NCAA title.

Lavender was named to the watch lists for the Bob Cousy Award, which is presented to the nation's top point guard. He is in consideration for the Frances Pomeroy Naismith Award, which is given annually to the best collegiate senior player 6-feet tall or shorter.

Fellow senior Josh Duncan also hopes to make an impact in his final season. Duncan played sparingly over the last 15 games last year while nursing an ankle injury. If he stays healthy, the 6-foot-9 forward has potential to be one of the team's leading scorers.

Xavier also received some national recognition. The Sporting News placed the Musketeers at No. 25, while Andy Katz of ESPN.com put the team No. 22.

Last year, Xavier nearly upset the top-seed and eventual national runner-up, Ohio State in the second round of the NCAA tournament. But the Musketeers blew a nine-point lead in the final four minutes.

Among other A-10 teams, Rhode Island garnered five first-place votes to place second in the poll.

The Rams ... all starters who made up nearly all of the team's scoring last year. Among those returning are first-team preseason All-Conference guard Will Daniels, as well as junior guard and 2007 A-10 three-point leader, Jimmy Baron.

Last year's regular season co-champion, Massachusetts, received a first-place vote, but dropped to eighth in the preseason polls. Defending A-10 tournament champion George Washington also is projected for a huge drop, falling to seventh.

The A-10 preseason All-Conference first team includes Lavender, Rhode Island's Daniels, Saint Joseph's Ahmad Nivins, Fordham's Bryant Dunston and Dayton's Brian Roberts. The second team includes Burrell, Temple's Dionte Christmas, George Washington's Maureece Rice, as well as Saint Louis teammates Tommie Liddell and Kevin Lisch.

Three A-10 Players Honored

Three Atlantic 10 players were named to the Naismith Trophy Preseason Watch List.

Seniors Will Daniels of Rhode Island and Xavier's Drew Lavender and junior Ahmad Nivins of Saint Joseph's will compete for the award with 30 other NCAA upperclassmen. The Naismith Trophy is presented annually to college basketball's players of the year.

Daniels, a 6-foot-8 forward out of Rhode Island, averaged 17.4 points and 5.6 rebounds last season. He shot 49 percent from the field, leading his Rams to 19 wins last year and a spot in the 2007 A-10 Championship Game.

Lavender led the A-10 in assists last season while averaging 11.2 points. The Xavier star added a team-high 45 steals en route to earning All-Conference second-team honors and leading Xavier to the second round of the NCAA Tournament.

The 6-9 Nivins was sixth in the A-10 in scoring with 16.6 points-per-game and fourth with 7.6 rebounds per game. The forward scored at least 20 points seven times last season and added six double-doubles last year, leading the Hawks to the quarterfinals of the A-10 Championship ... 2007 A-10 Champion George Washington head coach Karl Hobbs received a contract extension until 2012. In six seasons, Hobbs led the Colonials to a 114-65 record and three straight NCAA Tournament appearances ... Duquesne senior Kieron Achara was been named to the 20-man roster of the Great Britain National Basketball Team. If he makes the final 12-man roster, Achara's native team will be competing for a spot in the 2012 Olympic Games at home in London.

One of the A-10's top returning guards, senior Drew Lavender looks to improve upon his junior season, when he led the league in steals.

Ramming ahead

Coen to return home to face Rhode Island in CAA match

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts football team travels to Kingston, R.I., Saturday to take on Rhode Island at noon in Meade Stadium on the Rams' Family Day. But the Rams players likely won't be the only ones with family members in attendance.

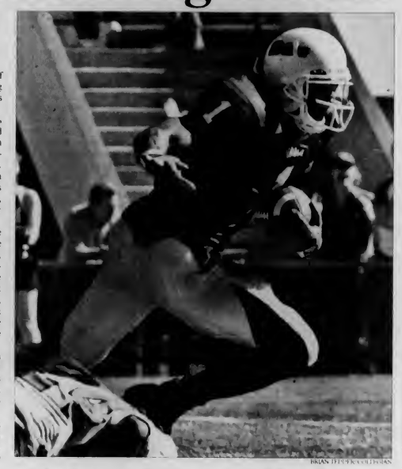
Quarterback Liam Coen calls Newport, R.I., home, and with Coen 99 yards away from breaking the UMass all-time passing yards record, it's the perfect timing for a mini-homecoming of sorts.

"It will mean something, but not as much as a win," Coen said. "Getting a win against those guys is always sweet if you can do it – it's not easy. Their record doesn't show how well they've been playing."

URI has lost a number of close games, including a four-point loss to Fordham in the season opener, an overtime loss to FBS Army the following week and a 49-36 shootout against UNH last week. In that game, the Rams led, 17-7 and 24-14 in the first half.

That record – a dismal 1-7 and 0-5 in the Colonial Athletic Association – certainly does show the performance the Rams put on at New Hampshire. URI ran at will against the Wildcats to the tune of 430 yards on the ground, including 100-yard games by Jimmy Hughes and Joe Casey.

The option offense the Rams employ is different than the spread formations and heavy I-formation running attacks the Minutemen (7-1, 5-0 CAA) have seen this year. Though UMass coach Don Brown saw it last year at Navy, who runs a similar offense. And, of course, UMass plays Rhode Island every season.



In fact, the Maroon and White have faced Rhode Island more than any other team (81 meetings), leading the all-time series, 45-34-2, playing every season since 1946. Brown has coached against the Rams for more than a decade, dating back to his head coaching days at Northeastern and his time as defensive coordinator for the Minutemen in the late '90s.

Brown says the Rams are a unique team to prepare for and one that can be very dangerous

URI ran for 168 yards against the Minutemen last year in a 41-16 UMass victory.

"We practice [defending against the option] every spring and every preseason," Brown said. "You have to have a certain way to approach it."

Redshirt senior wide receiver J.J. Moore led the Minutemen with five catches for 79 yards in last week's win, as a part of the team's largest scoring output of the season.

Minutemen take on prolific URI rushers

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

Rhode Island amassed 430 rushing yards last weekend against No. 8 New Hampshire.

And lost. By 13 points.

In five Colonial Athletic Association games this season, the Rams have rushed for 1,172 yards (234.4 per game) and 10 touchdowns.

They've lost all five of them.

It's been a difficult season for Rhode Island. The team has suffered through a number of key injuries on offense and has kept games close before succumbing at the end.

The Rams are 1-7 this season and will have to play their best game of the year against UMass (7-1, 5-0 CAA), a team that has won 17 straight regular season games against FCS opponents – including 13 consecutive conference games.

Despite what the records and other numbers might say, UMass coach Don Brown views the Rams as a significant challenge for his football team.

"They're extremely competitive; they've been in every football game," he said during this week's conference call. "We've got to take care of business. This is the week that from a defensive perspective, we have a lot of work to do."

Much of that work will be preparing for Rhode Island's option offense. It's an offense that the Minutemen don't see very often.

"You've got to prepare for coach [Tim] Stowers' spread option and all the things that come with it," Brown said. "That's a unique style, which is extremely difficult to simulate."

It's a style that's also been hard to stop for opponents this season, with the Rams averaging

Those pesky Warriors

UMass hopes to avoid same fate against Merrimack as '06-07

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

It's hard to pick out something that didn't go right during the Massachusetts hockey team's 2006-07 season that included a combined winning record against Hockey East heavyweights Boston College, Boston University, New Hampshire and Maine. But a 1-2 record against conference bottom-dweller Merrimack is one.

Saturday, the Minutemen (2-2-2, 0-1-2 HEA) host the Warriors (3-2, 0-2 HEA) at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center, hoping for better results than last year's pair of disappointments.

The Mass Attack was upset by the Warriors on the road early in the season, 3-0. The Minutemen seemed to struggle with the drastically smaller rink the Warriors play on at home, losing in the early-season shutout. UMass then fell again on Jan. 5 by a 2-1 score. The Minutemen won their only home contest against Merrimack, 4-2.

Junior forward Scott Crowder and the Minutemen take on Merrimack in a Hockey East contest Friday at the Mullins Center.

Upsets happen, but one must remember how successful a season UMass had last season. They were a combined 8-5-2 against the aforementioned perennial conference contenders, and that was only good enough for a fourth-place finish in the conference.

Had the Minutemen found a way to take four points out of Volpe Athletic Center, in a pair of games that I-Mass coach Don Cahoon admits that team could have, and possibly should have won, the Maroon and White would have tied the Maroon and Gold for second in the conference – a point behind UNH for the top spot in Hockey East.

Nonetheless, the Warriors proved to be a feisty team, and one that gave the Minutemen in particular a lot of trouble last season.

"I think they're going to be a faster team up front [this season]," Cahoon said. "What gave us a lot of problems last year was that they did a good job neutralizing us 5-on-5, and our only real hope of scoring goals on them was going to be on special teams."

UMass looked particularly helpless in the 3-0 loss on Dec. 5, when the

Skaters look to limit penalties

Avoiding penalty kill a must for Mass Attack

Boston College forward Nathan Gerbe scored nine power-play goals last season. Boston University's Pete MacArthur scored six. Hockey East players don't miss chances, especially when they have one fewer defender to worry about.

Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon knows the danger posed when providing any of his nine conference opponents that one extra chance on the man advantage.

The Minutemen avoided these situations well in 2006-07, averaging a conference-best 10.8 penalty minutes a game in Hockey East action.

Things haven't gone as smoothly this season for the Minutemen. Although six games is far too small a sample to accurately assess a team, discipline doesn't appear to be at the level it was during last season's run to the NCAA Tournament. It's not so much the amount of penalties, but the timing and gravity of the infractions that has caused the problems.

Alex Berry's game misconduct against Providence last Friday put UMass in a 5-on-3 situation and also left Cahoon with one less player to rotate on four lines. Sophomore winger Will Ortiz thrives on his aggression and feisty play, but an open-ice hit on a UMass-Lowell player forced the Minutemen to kill a penalty in an overtime.

Against UML, Cahoon had the luxury of playing his most gifted penalty killers; but against Providence, Cahoon was without sophomore center Brett Watson – who missed both games with an injury sustained earlier in the week, and is doubtful for this weekend.

After officials dismissed Berry from the game, the Minutemen killed off the penalty. However, UMass didn't have such luck in several other instances against the Friars. PC scored three power-play goals in a two-game set with the Minutemen and another with an extra attacker on and the goaltender pulled.

These are situations Watson excels in and not having the heady pivot at his disposal forces Cahoon to use other players who just aren't as adept as Watson into these situations.

"Brett Watson is a great defensive player in all aspects of the game. He brings a lot to the penalty kill," junior Cory Quirk said. "Not having his presence out there is something that might hurt us. But we have

UM finishes fall season, looks to spring

Freshmen show promise in doubles and singles action

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts tennis team wrapped up the fall season last weekend at the Dartmouth Big Green Invitational with an eye towards the spring season.

UMass saw plenty of promise at the Invitational when the top three doubles teams came in second for their tournaments. I-Mass singles recovered from the first day after losing nearly every singles match to Dartmouth.

All four freshmen won as well, despite their limited experience. UMass coach Judy Dixon said she was surprised at how much they stepped up and called this fall a good learning experience for her newcomers.

"I feel that the fall season helps brand [our freshmen] to the style of Division I tennis and the intensity," Dixon said.

Minutewoman freshman Candynce Boney gained experience this fall pairing with Pozar as the No. 1 doubles team.

Their first tournament together was the Army Invitational Sept. 15-17 where they took first against Rutgers senior Anela Dujsic and junior Polina Zaretser.

The doubles team set the momentum for the match against Connecticut on Sept. 26 beating sophomores Kelley LoRusso and Allison Campitiello.

"[Boney] played extremely well this fall and she had some quality results," Dixon said. "I'm pleased with her intensity on the court, and her variety."

After losing in the Cissy Leary Invitational, Boney blew out Huskies' senior Jessica Potter in two sets, 6-1, and 6-2. Boney's quick learning earned her the No. 2 spot on the spring roster.

UMass's success with the fall season set high expectations for spring. The Minutewomen believe they can finish top three in the Atlantic 10 with a shot at a national ranking with the depth Dixon added through recruiting.

Last year UMass finished 9-7 during the regular season. In the Atlantic 10 Tournament, the Minutewomen rolled through Saint Joseph's and Xavier before losing the semifinal match to Temple, 4-1, on April 21.

UMass still had one more match against Charlotte, but lost, 4-0, in the consolation round the next day.

Another challenge is making up for the lost production of Michele Speiss who graduated in the spring. She finished the season 15-6 in singles dual match play and 8-4 with Pozar, her former doubles partner.

Dixon knows that without Spiess's presence, the Minutewomen have to improve even more over the winter to prepare for their Feb. 2 match against Boston College.

"We need help in the middle of our lineup," Dixon said. "We still need to work on our doubles because a lot of freshmen aren't really aware of knowing how to play doubles."

No. 5 singles freshman Kaitlyn Carpenter also surprised Dixon with her performance, despite several losses throughout the fall.

"She is learning how to make the jump from the [high school level] to college tennis and what that means is you have to play a more aggressive style of tennis," Dixon said.

Dixon feels the winning will come with more experience, but the only way to gain that experience is with more practice during the off-season.

Therefore, the focus has been developing players rather than focusing on the early recruitment period.

Before any of that happens, the team has a two-week break from practice; the Minutewomen start again in the middle of November.

Exhibition slate for Maroon and White

Though the regular season does not officially begin until next week, the Massachusetts men's basketball team will get two opportunities to test itself in exhibition play. The Minutemen host American International College at the Mullins Center tonight and will play Concordia at the Curry Hicks Cage Saturday.

UMass coach Travis Ford welcomes eight players to the program this season, including seven freshmen. The Minutemen graduated two of its best low-post threats in Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman and seek to replace the combination's scoring and rebounding production in the paint.

Lasme was drafted in the second round of the 2007 NBA Draft by the Golden State Warriors. He signed a rookie contract and made the final 15-man roster.

Recruiting Update

It's never too early to start recruiting in today's college game. Ford secured a verbal commitment from 6-foot-2 guard Aaron Cosby last week. Pledging to the recruiting class of 2010, Cosby is sophomore at a high school in Louisville, Ky.

However, the commitment is non-binding, since Cosby is not eligible to sign a national letter of intent until November 2009.

Ford is also courting a highly touted prospect from Mount Vernon, N.Y. Forward Kevin Jones visited campus last weekend on an official recruiting visit. The 6-foot-8 forward is considered to be a top recruit by multiple basketball analysts.

At one point, as many as 10 schools were recruiting the forward, including Connecticut, Pittsburgh, Indiana and Ohio State.

Jones will not be eligible to make a commitment until the early signing period from Nov. 14 to 21. Kevin's older brother Gerard is also a former UMass football player ... Former UMass point guard Tiki Mayben will play for Binghamton University next season. Mayben will spend this year at Hudson Valley Community College trying to improve his academic status to become eligible for Division I basketball. The Troy, N.Y., native spent two seasons at UMass, though only one as an eligible player.

UM to host frisbee players

By Lucas Correia
Collegian Staff

On Saturday and Sunday, the University of Massachusetts will be hosting the regional Pat Bell Memorial ultimate frisbee tournament.

Fourteen men's teams and eight women's teams from all over the North East will compete.

This highly competitive tournament is a chance to gauge which college Frisbee teams currently stand out the most. The official national season for ultimate frisbee is the spring. The performance of each team in this tournament can usually be seen as a precursor to their spring performance.

Senior Kevin Cooper, co-captain of the UMass team (also known as Zoo Disc), described the fall season as "more of a tune-up circuit where teams work with new players and strategies, yet still compete at the highest level possible."

UMass has hosted this annual event since 2000. Traditionally, one of the competing teams is made up of UMass alumni. The event's Ultimate Player's Association (UPA) Web site jeers, "We look forward to seeing everyone out in Amherst this weekend; good luck to all teams except the Alumni in Day 1 Round 4!"

In 2005, the event was renamed in memory of UMass graduate and Zoo Disc member Patrick Bell, who passed away the previous summer. Bell graduated in 2004 with degrees in computer science and computer systems engineering.

On June 19, 2005, he went into sudden cardiac arrest after completing a triathlon. On hearing the news of his death, Bell's former teammate Daniel Giza told Zoo Disc in an email, "Pat was a great guy, a hell of a disc player, and the world of athletics will suffer with the loss of his dedication, focus, and attitude."

The pool play games will take place behind McGuirk Stadium, beginning Saturday at 9 a.m. and ending around 4:15 p.m. The final games of the tournament will take place Sunday, starting at 9 a.m.

Smith College to erect new science bldg.

By Leah Thurston
Collegian Correspondent

Lately, construction of a new science building at Smith College has been the central focus for many Northampton residents.

On lawns throughout the area, signs reading, "Resist" are physical representations of the feelings of some residents in terms of the city's plans and policies.

These residents feel that City Hall's planning and decision-making has been one-sided lately, by going ahead with plans that were not exactly agreed upon universally.

One such plan that tends to stir up some outcry is Smith's construction of a new building for engineering and molecular sciences, expected to be completed by 2009. Despite the disapproval of some Northampton residents, however, the expansion will act as a huge improvement for Smith's campus, in various ways.

"Smith, compared to many of the colleges with which it competes, is at a disadvantage in terms of campus acreage per student," explained Smith's media relations director Kristen Cole.

The college has 125 acres for every 2,600 students, compared to Amherst College with 1,000 acres for every 1,600, Hampshire College with 800 acres for every 1300, and Mount Holyoke with 800 acres for every 2,100. "There is not enough developable square footage within the current campus to meet the programmatic needs of the sciences," Cole explained.

Smith College hopes that the new building will symbolize

Student reports assault and battery

By Melissa Garber
Collegian Staff

The University Massachusetts Police Department released a public safety alert via e-mail last night informing the campus that a UMass student was assaulted outside North A Residential Hall on October 21 at 2:30 a.m. According to the UMPD, the student was punched in the face by an unidentified man and his injuries required surgery to repair.

Along with the public safety alert, the UMPD also released a surveillance tape of the four men entering North A Residential Hall.

"We're trying to indentify one of the parties in the video," said UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald.

Residents of the North Apartments had mixed responses.

"I feel pretty safe except for at night when I walk home [alone]," North Hall A resident senior Michelle Carter said. "but if you live here you shouldn't have to go home and get jumped."

"I feel like they should have notified everyone in the building at least," Carter said. "I feel like a lot of people don't check their e-mail. Like that bomb [scare, which occurred last Thursday morning]. I didn't know until my roommate told me."

Sophomore Majid Al-Zaben, a resident of North Hall C, said, "I got [the email] fifteen minutes ago. I think it was effective."

Regarding his safety Al-Zaben said, "I'm fine. I was in Lebanon during the war."

Junior Nyawira Mwaura of North Hall B said she felt, "very safe."

"I haven't heard much about it," she said. "But I think they [the e-mails] are very informative. They do a good job of being informative without scaring."

"I feel like they are not random acts of violence so I am not scared," Mwaura said.

Recently, the I Mass campus has experienced a number of incidents of assault. On Oct. 1, freshman Johnny Evans was stabbed outside of the Student Union and Sylvan resident Sean Saxema was assaulted with a baseball bat by former student, Murtaza "Moke" Hatan Qutab in his suite.

If you have information on the student indentified in the UMPD's surveillance video as the suspect, contact the police department by calling (413) 545-2121, or responses may be directed to Detective Brian Davies at (413) 545-0485, bdavies@admin.umass.edu, or to the Anonymous Tips page accessible at http: www.umass.edu/umpd/ About Us Anonymous Witness.

Senior Center teams up with Noho nurses

By Elizabeth Hewlett
Collegian Staff

The Senior Health Services held a reopening ceremony Monday at the Bangs Community Center in Amherst.

"I was thrilled with [the ceremony]," said Senior Center Director Nancy Pagano. "It gave us all a lift."

The Senior Health Services nursing program features one hired nurse, Lisa White, who holds office hours at the center two days a week. It also holds clinics led by other nurses affiliated with the center.

White has also made some visits to local senior housing. Senior Health Services hopes to expand the services provided to include outreach to the larger community, for which it needs grant funding.

"There are a lot of older people who financially ... do not go to the doctor as often as they should," Pagano said about the need for the program. "Having a nurse here that they can just drop by that's free ... allows them to do more preventative health care."

Pagano described nurse Lisa White as "just the right person" to serve as the Center's nurse.

"[She is] excellent in not just her nursing abilities but her way with people," said Pagano. "She's somebody that is a personality around the clinic."

White will also provide a welcoming environment for the seniors, according to Pagano, who described a visit with White as "more informal and comfortable" and "less threatening" than a traditional doctor's visit.

Seniors can talk to White "like a real good friend."

After operating for about 10 years, Pagano said, the nursing program was initially transferred to another department before closing for re-evaluation last January.

The new incarnation of the Senior Health Services features a partnership with the Visiting Nurses Association (VNA) Hospice at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton.

Pagano says the existing [illegible] Cooley Dickinson Hospital [illegible] nurse if White is ever unable to make it. [illegible] White will also help with referrals and in writing grant proposals. The program will be run in the University of Massachusetts School of Nursing.

New 911 response system in place

Mobile phones bring new emergency tech.

By Hannah Nelson
Collegian Staff

Amherst has implemented a new 911 system that improves response time to cell phone callers – a benefit for the large number of mobile college students in the area.

The state-of-the-art system was announced earlier this week and will allow emergency responders to pinpoint the location of the caller as well as the number the call was made from. It includes a mapping system that can plot up to four positions at a time and take into account the population and activity of an area.

"The system has played a role in all cell phone calls since then, all cell calls come through the system," said Rita Burke, director of the Amherst Public Safety Communications Center, in reference to the successful start of the system several weeks ago.

On the first day of use, the system allowed for a lost hiker to be helped out of the woods.

A large number of hikers have been aided since then. In another situation the system enabled dispatchers to see the hiker's location as well as that of the police sergeant's who was responding to the call. The sergeant called from his phone in order for the hiker's location to be relayed relative to [illegible] since the Dispatcher could see both locations on the map.

According to the Amherst Police [illegible] system is essential for Dispatchers who take calls and dispatch for both the police and fire departments, as it helps to pinpoint callers' location [illegible] and to verify where they are calling from.

There is one drawback to the system – [illegible] cell phones work with it.

"Yes and no. If you have [illegible] you don't even have a pay as you go like a Pre-Paid. If You must be a subscriber," said Burke.

All of the Amherst Public Safety Communications Center staff has been [illegible] and trained to use the system. The new system [illegible] and the grant was funded in part by the Statewide Emergency Telecommunications Board (SETB).

The SETB hopes to provide the [illegible] all emergency services to wireless callers [illegible] with wireless 911 calls, according to the Massachusetts Public Safety website regarding the implementation of the wireless enhanced system statewide.

Before the system's existence, anyone calling on a cell phone would need to provide their cell phone number to the emergency operator in case of disconn nection. Now PSAPs, or public safety answering points, will have the ability to retrace the calls. In the state, previous 911 calls made from cell phones were rerouted to a State Police Dispatch Center in order to retrieve the caller's location.

As early as 1996, the need for an improved 911 system was recognized.

Half of all 911 calls in the country are made from non-landline phones so the Federal Communications Commission required all wireless phone carriers to adhere to any Enhanced 911 system. The Wireless Enhanced 911 Fund was created in 2002 in order for systems such as the one in Amherst to be put into effect. The fund is supported by a $.30 monthly surcharge to phone bills.

"Whether you need an ambulance or a fire truck, or the police, it still comes into the center first," said Burke.

The Amherst Center is located on the third floor of the police building and handles the dispatch of ambulances, the fire department, and the police.

Burke said it doesn't matter what form of emergency a caller has, "It is important for all 911 callers to know there is a central center to call."

its commitment to producing women leaders in engineering, technology, and sciences, as well as enhancing its commitment to environmental sustainability.

Designed by architectural firm Bohlin Cywinski Jackson, the building's innovative design aims to promote energy efficiencies through the use of renewable resources for construction and natural elements for climate control. The building will have green roofs, porous pavement, vegetated swales, and the use of shading for natural temperature control – all as a means to promote environmental responsibility.

Named Ford Hall, in honor of Ford Motor Company which gave Smith the $10 million gift, the building will house the college's Picker Engineering Program, as well as the department of computer science, chemistry, biochemistry, and molecular biology.

Over the years when properties became available in the Green Street or West Street area near the campus, Smith began to purchase them, paying market value for each one.

A few of the rental houses needed to be removed to provide space for the 140,000 square-foot science and engineering facility, so the tenants in those rental properties either found new rental properties on their own or with the help of Smith, which paid for all of the relocation costs.

The proposed, 140,000 square foot design for Ford Hall will aim to promote energy efficiency and environmental responsibility.

Groups test FCC's 'Net Neutrality' stance

NEW YORK (AP) – A coalition of consumer groups and legal scholars on Thursday formally asked the Federal Communications Commission to stop Comcast Corp. from interfering with its subscribers' file sharing.

Two of the groups are also asking the FCC to fine Comcast $195,000 for every affected subscriber.

The petitions will be the first real test of the FCC's stance on "Net Neutrality," the long-standing principle that Internet traffic be treated equally by carriers. The agency has a policy supporting the concept but its position hasn't been tested in a real-world case.

Last month, The Associated Press reported that Comcast hindered file sharing by subscribers who used BitTorrent, a popular file-sharing program. The AP's tests confirmed claims by users who also noticed interference with some file-sharing applications.

Comcast is the country's largest cable company and has 12.9 million Internet subscribers, making it the second-largest Internet service provider.

Comcast denies that it blocks file sharing, but acknowledged last week that it was "delaying" some of the traffic between computers that share files.

In practice, the company blocks requests from users who are trying to retrieve files from a Comcast subscriber's computer for a period of time. But it eventually lets the requests through if they are repeated.

In one AP test, a request went through after 10 minutes of trying. The technology does not directly affect downloads of BitTorrent files by Comcast subscribers, only uploads.

Comcast has said the interference is intended to improve the Internet experience for all its subscribers, noting that a relatively small number of file sharers is enough to slow down its network.

In response to the filings, David Cohen, an executive vice president at Comcast, said that the FCC's policies recognize that ISPs need to manage the traffic on their networks.

But if other ISPs follow in Comcast's footsteps, file sharing would essentially crawl to a halt. While the technology is a popular way to illegally share copyright movies and music, legal uses are proliferating, particularly in movie distribution.

"They're blocking an innovative application that could be a competitor to cable TV," said Marvin Ammori, general counsel at Free Press, one of the advocacy groups behind the petition to the FCC.

The petition asks the commission to immediately declare that Comcast is violating the FCC's policy. The co-signers are Consumer Federation of America, Consumers Union, the publisher of Consumer Reports; Media Access Project; Public Knowledge, and professors at the Internet practices of the Yale, Harvard and Stanford law schools.

Free Press and Public Knowledge are separately filing a formal complaint that asks the FCC to demand a "forfeiture" from Comcast of $195,000 per affected subscriber.

The number is based on the statutory maximum of $97,500 for a single continuing violation, doubled by what the groups see as deception on the company's part. Comcast kept its practice secret until publicized by the AP, saying that it couldn't divulge the inner workings of its network for security reasons.

Its filtering technique also involves the company forging network messages so that they appear to come from subscriber and non-subscriber computers.

The complaint includes affidavits from three Comcast subscribers who say they have been affected by Comcast's interference. The complaint asks the FCC to determine the total number of affected subscribers.

It's not clear how quickly the FCC would act on the filings.

"The FCC should be aggressive by reviewing these cases because they go to ensuring the freedom and openness of the Internet which is so vital to our communications future and to our civic dialogue," FCC Commissioner Michael Copps said in a statement.

Comcast's Cohen noted that the FCC's policy statement, which says that consumers are allowed to run the Internet applications of their choice, makes that "subject to reasonable network management" by ISPs.

"If Comcast is right – that what it's doing meets the policy statement – then anyone can start blocking BitTorrent tomorrow," Ammori said.

A ruling against Comcast could cause problems for other Internet service providers. Many of them acknowledge managing traffic to improve flow, which likely includes slowing down file-sharing traffic by means less drastic than Comcast's.

The Net Neutrality debate erupted in 2005, when the FCC abolished the obligation of providers of Internet service via digital subscriber lines, or DSL, to carry all traffic non-discriminately (that obligation had been abolished for cable broadband in 2002). The obligation was replaced with the policy statement.

Phone companies started suggesting that they would like to be able to charge large Web companies more for guaranteed delivery of their traffic as a way to finance the build-out of their networks.

The Comcast building stands tall in Philadephia. The company has recently been reported to be hindering file sharing by subscribers.

Network news losing relevance

Hannah Nelson

Part of our culture still lingers on the days of apple pie and baseball. The newscaster is supposed to be a family friendly fit in your living room. But every morning, "The Today Show," gives me 15 minutes of the news desk and three hours of talk show.

Yes, they are a 'news magazine' and are supposed to be light and bright. But where am I supposed to get the truth amid the fifth cancer segment this week and the latest fall fashions for people over 40?

People want hope. I get it. But can the average Joe on the street tell me the difference between Sunni and Shiite? Kurdistan and Kazakhstan? I know I'm demanding a lot here. I won't pretend to know half of what's going on in the world, but I try my best. And so should the American news networks. Is it really too much to ask?

I've had it up to the ears in toy recalls and soldier stories. I feel like everyday is the same story with a different face. This probably all seems incredibly insensitive, and I am certainly not saying that the current news highlights aren't important, just overemphasized.

As a writer for gothamist.com described the BBC, "The newscast is not flashy and filled with cute graphics. You'll feel much more informed about what is really going on in the U.S. and the world than watching the combined 90 minutes of the offerings from CBS, NBC, and ABC or from watching CNN for twelve hours." That's quite a bold statement.

I've had it up to the ears in toy recalls and soldier stories. I feel like everyday is the same story with a different face.

The "Big 3," as ABC, NBC, and CBS have been dubbed, are facing the flight of viewers to the BBC America network's newest launch of BBC World News America. The broadcast is tailored to the American viewer whereas the previously aired newscast was simply BBC World. This is of course excluding Fox and CNN, which are fine if you like watching the same celebrity revelation at midday over and over again. I guess it was a slow day.

World News America started broadcasting earlier this month, though if you grab that remote in a UMass dorm room, you won't find the BBC America channel in our listings. There is the always reliable PBS broadcast of the BBC World News. Or if you are on the go, there is the BBC NewsPod and various other podcasts available by news genre through iTunes.

On that note, I add that the BBC is not the mouthpiece of Al Jazeera.

Most Americans know Al Jazeera as the voice for certain terrorist leaders in hiding. But they are indeed more than that.

The BBC has participated in joint ventures with Arabic news in the past, and perhaps that's the reason why Al Jazeera gets tossed into the mix. BBC World had a joint Arabic television operation with the Saudis in the mid-90s. It shut down in 1996 because they could not agree on censorship matters. Many of the BBC staffers moved to Al Jazeera when it began airing later that year.

In the Middle East, it is considered the most reliable news source according to a recent poll. The same poll had Fox as the top network in the United States and the BBC for the large majority of Europe and elsewhere. To the Arab people, Al Jazeera is a powerful symbol of free speech that had been something relatively unheard of in many of the participating countries.

Naturally, that caused a lot of stir among the Gulf states. The Algerian government even went so far as to cut the electricity in 1999 to parts of their capital in order to stop the public from viewing one specific program that was to be shown on the day in question. It is the only station independent from political control in the Middle East.

Al Jazeera has a negative connotation here in the U.S. because of the administration's discontent with the way the broadcast has presented the war in Iraq. The majority of dislike comes from the broadcast of videos of al-Qaida leaders. This has resulted in many accusations against the station, sensationalist being one of the kinder terms in use. The point being however, that the BBC and Al Jazeera operate independently.

If at the end of a long day you are looking for some news to make you feel better about the world then choose one of the mainstream networks. If you want something hard-hitting, albeit slightly more depressing, then the Brits are for you.

BBC won't be there to hold your hand, they don't aim to make you feel good about the state of the world. They will give you simply the reliable truth.

A different perspective

Bruce Lerner

There is a common theme among staunch supporters of Israel, or more accurately, Israel's policy. These supporters frequently call forth the accomplishments of the state of Israel whenever criticism is levied in order to alleviate the anti-Semitic character of the critique.

One of these defense mechanisms is to bring up the technological contributions of Israel to the world in the form of computer technology, or other such inventions. For example, Israel has created the world's first ingestible video camera, instant messaging technology, the cell phone, and the Pentium chip.

As The Free Republic said in a March 2006 article entitled "Modern Israeli Inventions", "while engaged in regular wars with an implacable enemy that seeks its destruction and an economy continuously under strain by having to spend more per capita on its own protection than any other country on earth."

The logic of this position, that Israel is immune to criticism because of its contributions, is impeccable.

Therefore, any person that chooses to denounce something like the occupation of Palestinian lands since 1967 had better shut up, in light of the above presented information.

The logic of this position, that Israel is immune to criticism because of its contributions, is impeccable. It is such a great feat to protect a victimized country's reputation and to justify its always necessary actions.

It is not easy to protect oneself against all of the anti-Israel sentiment all over the U.S. and on campus. Therefore, bringing up technological contributions is a surefire way to quell the ignorance of the heathens who dare raise their voice about Israeli actions.

Since the rationality is so apparent of the above mentioned pro-Israel argument, it must be extended to the United States as well. Let us take a look at a few of the sordid moments in U.S. history from a new, more celebratory perspective, focusing on America's achievements rather than on its shortcomings.

The Mexican–American war was a rather ugly example of early American imperialism. Many innocent Mexicans and unfortunate U.S. soldiers were brutally killed in the successful attempt of President Polk to illegally annex a large portion of Mexico, what is now known as the western half of the United States. The year that this war was started, 1846, will live in infamy for many people of Mexican origin who now find that they cannot even access their ancestors' land.

This is what people and especially those darn leftists that do not focus on important matters will say. More intelligent individuals will point out that 1846 was the year that the cylinder printing press was created by American inventor Richard M. Hoe, forever revolutionizing the printing profession.

Now, let us look at another bad time in the history of the United States, the genocide of the indigenous population followed by the ensuing second class citizenship instilled upon them. Millions upon millions of native people who committed the crime of living on this great continent of America faced rape, dispossession, disease, murder, and outright genocide upon the arrival of the glorious European settlers.

Some would say that this was wrong. Frankly, these people are wrong themselves.

We cannot ignore that upon their arrival, these ingenious Europeans started to invent things left and right, contributing to the overall good of humanity. Naysayers forget that one of the founding fathers, a European descendent, invented the indispensable modern day amenity – bifocal glasses. Discussion about the advent of the light bulb should adequately take attention of off the early Americans' conduct towards Native Americans.

Of course, now we come to one of the most heinous and abhorrent topics in the nation's history, the practice of enslaving Africans in what was known as the slave trade. It is impossible to truly comprehend the depths of suffering that Africans endured during the disgusting middle passage.

Nevertheless, horrendous as this period was, and some would say continues to be, there are at least a few good things that came out of it, and they should be brought forth.

This is of course referring to the invention of the cotton gin by Eli Whitney. Now slaves could pick much more cotton and contribute more fully to the great cotton industry of the South.

Also, the shipping industry with slaves as cargo of course, also flourished, since the new economy demanded more labor power. Then there was the sewing machine, invented by John A. and Hiram Abial Pitts. This great contribution enabled the latest fashion trends to be accessible to many more people than before.

As we can see, whatever criticism of America or Israel comes about, there is always a counterpoint in the form of a new contribution to the realm of technology. Of course people will try to bring up thing such as the Vietnam War, or the attack and occupation of Lebanon, but then one can top these trivialities with the winning hand of computers and their subsequent software that everyone benefits from.

This is not even to mention biotech. It is simply unfair to ignore these great contributions and to focus only on the negatives.

Immorality runs rampant on television, movies

Katherine Marr

Now that I'm away at college, I've realized that several household rules have changed in my absence. For example, because my sisters live at home for the full 12 months, while I reside there for only four months, they apparently retain full remote control rights for the entire year.

Seemingly lucky for me, one of my sisters is a senior in high school, so her viewing tendencies should mirror mine. Yet, for some reason, I recently found myself drawn to the television that my youngest sister has permanently tuned in to, the Disney Channel.

Why? Perhaps because in today's world, the media has become decreasingly G rated, and more specifically, society takes a lax approach toward sexuality. Sexual scenes and references, both implicit and explicit, are now commonplace in the majority of sitcoms, films and music.

Sexual scenes and references, both implicit and explicit, are now commonplace in the majority of sitcoms, films and music.

Consequently, it is almost refreshing to watch the more family-oriented programming – in my case, my youngest sister's latest obsession – the television show "Hannah Montana." Hannah Montana is the latest pop star sensation to spark a craze among preteens and teens.

What is reassuring about her widespread popularity is that this actress/singer's raciest lyric is, "Wish I could tell you there's a kiss…" The furthest she ventures is not to ponder even a real kiss, but rather a theoretical kiss.

I myself experienced a childhood where, "theoretical kisses," were approximately where my knowledge of media sexuality ended. At a young age, I remember being told that during particularly passionate kisses, the actors and actresses wore "fake lips."

Once, in response to glimpsing at a love scene, my sister and I shouted, "Look! We can see her fake lips falling off." (Apparently the power of suggestion is very strong because we were in total agreement over those malfunctioning fake lips).

In middle school, I was led to believe that any couples engaging in sexual activity were "married." In especially scandalous sitcoms, this often led to couples being "married," "divorced" and "remarried" to entirely different people in the course of one half-hour episode.

Over the years there were certainly times when I viewed my parents' overprotective nature as annoying or comical. But now I'm saddened at how younger, impressionable children are growing up with increasingly too much knowledge, and often unrealistic conceptions of sexuality as a result of media exposure.

The media plants the notion in people's minds that whatever is shown on television is the norm. More often than not, the sexual behavior depicted in a day's worth of television does not occur in real life at the same extreme frequency. Nonetheless, viewers leave the show with the skewed perception that it does.

For example, "One Tree Hill," is one of many shows that glamorize sexual content. The entire cast of teenagers has hooked up with each other. One character was consequently pregnant at her high school graduation, and another character bore two sons with two different women at a mere 18-years-old. This is not normal.

Several weeks ago, I also saw the movie "Knocked Up" at the Student Union's "Something Every Friday." Judging merely by its title, sexual undertones were crucial to the storyline, but "Knocked Up" still could have been cute, funny and retained some sense of dignity. Instead, the movie was heavily peppered with crude scenes and repulsive references, so strong that, in my opinion, they detracted from the genuinely humorous parts.

Aside from such over the top, off color movies, there are countless films that throw in the occasional bad scene for no good reason.

Movies that otherwise could have been PG have one blatantly risqué scene that may last only five to 10 seconds, but is it enough to limit the audience to viewers of a particular age or morality.

Most irksome is when the scene is not at all meaningful to the plot or character identities, but only serves the purpose of upping the rating to PG-13 or R to appeal to a "cooler, more mature" audience.

Even for college students who foster no immediate concern about media content affecting younger siblings or their own children someday, the prevalence of sexuality still lessens its meaning for all viewers. Honestly, if you should tune into a television show in the middle of sex scene, there's probably a 50-50 chance as to whether the couple are in a committed relationship or engaging in a one night stand.

Yet when all is seemingly bleak, I do know college students who regularly hold Disney movie marathons and watch all of the old classics from "Aladdin" to "Cinderella." I know high school seniors who are engaged in the mad frenzy to score tickets to Hannah Montana's upcoming concert at the Worcester DCU center. I can only hope that this is evidence of a renewed morality emerging in society.

There is absolutely nothing wrong with returning to childhood times of innocent, naïve and carefree fun and humor. Sure, some of these family-oriented sitcoms can be inane (a particular episode where Hannah Montana eats dog food comes to mind), but I'll gladly watch them over half of the lewd programs that mar the silver screen today.

Presidential dollars

New coins to follow trend of collectors' item state quarters

BY ELLEN CREAGER
DETROIT FREE PRESS

DETROIT — Can a dollar be as cool as a quarter?

The upcoming holiday shopping season will determine whether new one dollar presidential coins will catch fire with the collecting public the way state quarters have for the past nine years.

So far, so good.

"Our customers are already collecting for Christmas," says Sylvia Penn, head teller at the Comerica Bank on Mack Avenue on Detroit's east side. "They especially want John Adams real bad. Right now I don't think I have any. People keep asking, 'Can you get them? Please, can you get them?'"

Next year, the last of the 50 state quarters will roll off the U.S. Mint production line. Since 1999, 140 million Americans have been rummaging through loose change to find and collect quarters that represent every state. Next year's Oklahoma, New Mexico, Arizona, Alaska and Hawaii quarters will be last in the series. It costs the mint just five cents to manufacture a state quarter, so it makes 20 cents off every one.

To keep the public hooked and coffers filling, the mint hopes that its new series of 38 presidential dollar coins will inspire the same collecting frenzy.

Every year from now through 2015, the mint will issue four presidential dollars per year. In 2016, it will issue at least two (presidents must be dead two years before their likeness can grace a coin).

Coins for George Washington, John Adams and Thomas Jefferson came out earlier this year, and 769 million are in circulation. The James Madison presidential dollar debuts Nov. 15.

The coins won't replace the dollar bill. But they are real money. Vending machines, banks and merchants have them as change.

Or theoretically they do.

"I get maybe five a month, and they're usually all from one guy," says Dave Danaj, manager of the Original Pancake House in Grosse Pointe Woods, Mich. "They are not common."

That unfamiliarity breeds contempt. A dollar coin doesn't look like real money compared to a dollar bill.

"They look like casino tokens," grumbles Rich Parsons, owner of Brighton Coins. "I have in many instances given them as change in my store, and people say, 'I don't want it; give me a dollar.'"

That is a drawback, compared to the popular state quarters. Those were easily found in your pocket or lunch money. And you could tell in an instant it was a quarter.

"The quarters have been good for kids because they can afford it, and they are in wide circulation," says Wayne Robertson, a Livonia, Mich., coin dealer. "Even my wife started going through the drawer to collect them."

Just like a middle-schooler, collectible coins need controversy to be popular. State quarters prompted talk when many people complained about all the fussy images crammed onto the designs. People were adamant about the quarters they loved and the ones they hated.

Now the presidential dollar is building its own mystique. Somehow, many John Adams and George Washington dollar coins are missing the "In God We Trust" and "E Pluribus Unum" phrases that are engraved on the edges because they slipped past the machine. (Called "godless dollars," the error makes serious collectors drool.)

Others have clamshell-pinched wavy rims where the edge engraver went too close to the edge. This is the first time that edges of a coin have been stamped since 1933, which makes them interesting.

The bad part about the new dollars is their fake gold color. Like the Sacagawea dollar, presidential dollars aren't gold at all — they're a mixture of copper, zinc, manganese and nickel. A presidential dollar is worth, oh, exactly $1.

But in a tough economy, that's a good price for a Christmas present. And albums that hold them are as cheap as $2.99.

"It is not a piggy-bank-breaking hobby," says Patrick Heller of Liberty Coin Service in Lansing, Mich. "With quarters, someone might collect one for each of 10 grandkids. They might think twice about doing that with dollars, but we'll see."

What do children think?

"The presidential dollars are OK," says Taylor Mazurik, 11, of Livonia. She is the daughter of coin dealers and a collector herself. "I liked the state quarters because there were more of them, and you could see the pictures from different states." When the state quarters series ends, she'll collect presidential dollars.

Taylor also collects something else: Mercury dimes. At a recent coin show, she pointed to a collection of 10-cent pieces showing the winged-helmeted image that was minted from 1916 to 1945.

Depending on condition and rarity, Mercury dimes cost $1 to $44,000 each.

Collecting presidential dollars is looking better all the time.

'A bad day for brides'

Harry Potter and the author who would not stop spilling

BY JEFFREY WEISS
THE DALLAS MORNING NEWS

With the greatest of respect, I'd like to say something to J.K. Rowling, author of the "Harry Potter" series.

Shut up. Please.

Stop talking about what Ron will do for a living, whom Neville will marry and what kinds of creatures Hagrid will raise.

If you didn't put it in the books, please don't tell us now.

I guess I don't want you to stop explaining completely. I'd love to know more about what inspired some of the plot details in the books. If you want to dish about how you decided on those particular inscriptions for the headstones, how you came up with the names for the characters, or how you cleverly planned the religious underpinnings of the broad arc of the story — I am all ears.

But telling us that Dumbledore is gay, as you did recently? Why would you do that?

As a fan, I can understand both the authorial impulse and the public interest. As a reader, it's making me nuts.

Another awfully good British author, the late Douglas Adams of the successful "Hitchhikers' Guide to the Galaxy" series, confronted a comparable question a few years back. One of his fans asked about the kind of computer one of his characters used. He replied, in part:

"The book is a work of fiction. It's a sequence of words arranged to unfold a story in a reader's mind. There is no such actual, real person as Arthur Dent. He has no existence outside the sequence of words designed to create an idea of this imaginary person in people's minds.

"There is no objective real world I am describing, or which I can enter, and pick up his computer, look at it and tell you what model it is, or turn it over and read off its serial number for you. It doesn't exist."

I'd disagree with that a bit. It does exist — in the minds of any reader who wants it to exist. And that's what you're interfering with.

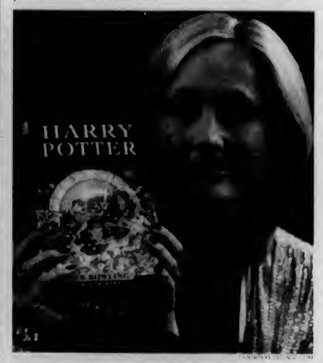
The physicist Erwin Schrodinger long ago came up with a wonderful thought experiment. He imagined a cat that existed across possibilities — somehow simultaneously alive and dead until somebody checked to see which was true.

What seems weird (but true) in physics is just the way it has always been with a good story. What exactly did Huck Finn's raft look like? Did Captain Ahab's father whip him every St. Swithin's Day? Did Bilbo Baggins use product on his hair back in the Shire?

As a reader, I get to decide, because the author left those details untold in the books, which is one reason that a book is almost always better than the movie based on it. More explicit backstory is not always better. Compare the brilliant book (and cartoon) of "How the Grinch Stole Christmas" with the awful live-action movie. The Grinch had an unhappy childhood? Who cares?

Based on what you decided to put in the books, I can imagine that Dumbledore once had a girlfriend or that he was so emotionally crushed by guilt that he sealed himself off from romance or that he was one of those rare men for whom romance never really came up — or that he was gay.

I can consider any of those possibilities as I read ... or I can mull over all of them at the same time. Talk about magic.



Is Dumbledore gay? He is for you, apparently. But unless you said it in the actual books, must he be so for me? Your saying so now makes it harder for me to imagine anything different. Do you really want to limit your fictional world that way?

So ... can I call you Jo? I like all of your myriad fans. I've spent so much time exploring the children of your mind over this past decade that I feel we are friends.

You lived with Harry, his friends and his foes for so many years. You birthed them, shaped them, honed the fine details of their existence. And you thought long and hard about exactly which of those details were so important to the story that you would include them in the books.

For all of those years, until those books were published, the characters and settings were yours to command and control. But then you let them go.

And speaking for all of your happy readers, I need to tell you: Now they are ours.

J.K. Rowling, the author of the phenomenally successful "Harry Potter" books, continues to give fans details about the already-finished series.

Owls, Hawks set to begin A-10 tournament

Lokey leads Temple into big matchup with Saint Joseph's at Finnesy Field

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Atlantic 10 Field Hockey Tournament gets underway today, as Temple will take on tournament host and cross-town rival Saint Joseph's at Finnesy Field at 11 a.m.

The Owls (15-5, 6-1 A-10) are on a six-game winning streak thanks in large part to midfielder Alli Lokey. The senior and A-10 Offensive Player of the Year leads the conference in goals (18), points (46) and assists (10).

"She's a tremendously talented player who knows how to score," Temple coach Amanda Janney said. "There is a lot of pressure on her, and she needs to stay focused on having a solid game."

Seniors Ashley Bird, Leanne Vogelsong and Nadia Clendening lead an experienced Temple backfield. Goalkeeper Erin Hanshue is a three-year starter and ranked third in the conference in saves during the regular season.

"Our backfield is full of seniors, and I'm expecting them to step up as well and prevent goal-scoring opportunities," Janney said.

The Owls finished tied for first in the A-10 with Massachusetts, a team they could see in the A-10 Championship game. The Minutewomen lost to the Cherry and White, 2-1, back on Oct. 12. Sophomore forward Mandi Routh scored two goals while Hanshue had five saves.

"Temple is an aggressive, athletic and fit team," Saint Joseph's coach Michelle Finegan said. "They have a number of dynamic athletes capable of causing trouble."

Temple feels prepared for what they face from St. Joes, but know that the Hawks are a threat.

"St. Joes has some solid players on its team," Janney said. "[The Hawks] do a good job of keeping their formation, which gave us a little trouble last week."

Last Saturday, Temple defeated SJU, 4-2, a victory that gave the Owls a share of their first-ever regular season A-10 title. Freshman midfielder Jen Wrublesky scored her ninth goal of the season to put the Hawks on top 1-0 midway through the first half.

Less than five minutes later, Routh found Brehm for her first of three goals on the afternoon to tie the game.

The Owls came out strong in the second half, scoring two goals in a 40-second span. Lokey passed to Brehm in front of the goal, who put it past senior goalkeeper Rebecca Cunfer to break the tie. Brehm and Lokey hooked up again less than a minute later to secure the victory for the Owls at home. Lokey also added a goal in the 60th minute off a pass from Brehm.

"We have made some adjustments, and I think our midfield will do a better job to match up with the strengths in [Saint Joseph's] midfield," Janney said. "I believe our forwards have an advantage over their defense, and we hope to expose that again this weekend."

The Hawks (9-8, 4-3 A-10) won three out of their last four regular season contests and are looking for their first A-10 Championship since 1995.

"They were able to capitalize on just about every opportunity when we played them last Saturday," Finegan said. "We have made a few adjustments to create a better match up which should make for a good game."

Both teams are located in Philadelphia, only adding to the intensity of the matchup. The last time the two teams met was at Temple's Geasey Field. Now the Owls must go and play on SJU's home turf.

"It's a huge rivalry," Janney said. "The players know each other from their high school days, so their competitiveness keeps them driven to win. There should be a big crowd from each team, so we are hoping for an exciting game with a good outcome for us."

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu.

Temple midfielder Alli Lokey was named the Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Year. She led the conference in goals (18) and points (46).

Spiders await UMass in opening round that belief we can win, and that's really important," Sowry said. "That belief coupled with some confidence and preparation puts us in a good position to be competitive against them."

The Minutewomen have had a week to prepare for their matchup today and have been putting the time to good use. Sowry has focused the practices to include a lot of situational preparation, such as what kind of offense they will run if they are down a goal with five minutes to go, or how they should react if they are clinging to a one-goal lead and Richmond has a penalty corner.

Sowry expects Richmond to try a different strategy than they used in their first matchup, so her team must be ready for anything.

All season long, the defense played outstanding, led by the trio of Erin O'Brien, Kristina DoRosario and freshman standout Jamie Bourazerris. the team was first in the A-10 in shutouts (nine), goals against average (0.94), and shots allowed (7.2 per game).

This is a dramatic improvement from last season when the team allowed 52 goals and over 14 shots per game. If the defense can play as well as they have all year long, the Minutewomen will be in a great position to win their game today.

The offense has been the weakness of the Maroon and White throughout the year. The team averages 1.47 goals per game. They outshoot their competition consistently, getting 12.2 shots per game, but too often those shots do not find the back of the net. The primary scorer for the Minutewomen has been sophomore forward Cher King, who leads the team with seven goals and three assists. Tied for second are Bourazerris, who sometimes comes up to apply pressure from her backfield position, and forward Lauren Gillespie, who has been coming off the bench all season to provide some extra punch to the lineup.

The offense has improved in recent weeks, it has gained more diversity as the season progressed with 10 different players recorded a goal.

Sowry has not decided who will start in goal. All season the Minutewomen have alternated between sophomore Sarah Williams and senior Becky Letourneau. Letourneau started in the goal the last time they played Richmond, but Sowry stated that both goalies have looked strong in practice and she will decide who starts sometime this morning.

If UMass wins today they will face off against the winner of Temple vs. Saint Joseph's tomorrow.

Scott Feldman can be reached at SFeldman@student.umass.edu.

Sophomore midfielder Cher King led the Minutewomen with seven goals on the season. Her and the Minutewomen take on Richmond this afternoon in the opening round of the A-10 Tournament.

tremendous leadership. I think it's a fantastic reward for both of them, much deserved, and they have been the biggest key to our success this year," Sowry said.

This was O'Brien's second award of the season — she was named a NFHCA Senior All-Star less than two weeks ago.

Though the Minutewomen were a defensive team, scoring just 28 goals on the season, Cher King scored a quarter of those goals and joined the two senior defenders on the first team.

"Goals for us have been few and far between and we need her to be firing consistently on the field," Sowry said.

The UMass coach added that King needs to pick up where she left off in the beginning of the year and present offensive opportunities for the Minutewomen, even if she is not scoring goals. The team needs her on the field because she is smart and can create quality offensive chances.

King scored seven goals on the season and gives the team the best chance to score in 1-on-1 situations with defenders. She has the best ball skills and is a constant threat to change games.

The awards continued to pile up for UMass as Midgets Potts and Jamie Bourazerris were named to the A-10 All-Rookie team.

Potts is the biggest physical presence on the team, and although she is often schooled for her style of play, she uses her strong size and abilities to intimidate other teams. Bourazerris is a defender but like the Cowboys and most successful defensive partners, she is a threat to score as her [illegible] led her second on the team.

Harris, UM dominates AIC

Minutemen light up Mullins Center in exhibition victory

By Michael King & Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

American International did everything it could to slow down the Massachusetts men's basketball last night at the Mullins Center in exhibition play. But The Minutemen outlasted and outran AIC for a 103-66 victory.

UMass finishes its exhibition schedule Saturday against Concordia at the Curry Hicks Cage.

"We got off to a slow start tonight, but it didn't really concern me," Ford said. "I knew we'd hit our spurt at some point."

UMass coach Travis Ford intent on showing off his team's fast-paced style of basketball encouraged his Minutemen to push the ball up the court. The team took every advantage of fast break opportunities with the intention of creating open 3-point shots.

UMass	103
AIC	66

In the second half, the team focused on turning defensive rebounds and AIC turnovers into easy baskets underneath the hoop.

Ford acknowledges that his team won't command the front court as it did last season and will rely on a fast-paced style of play and strong shooting ability to win games.

"We're not a physical basketball team and it showed on the rebounding end tonight," Ford said. "We didn't play nearly as fast as I wanted to. And we actually didn't shoot the ball as well as we've been shooting it."

With seven freshmen added to this year's squad, it was also the first chance for Ford to experiment with different combinations on the court.

"It confused me I didn't really get a good look at guys," Ford said about his frequent substitutions. "I wanted to play everybody, but I really couldn't do it. Saturday night I'll stick with some rotations and see what looks good. [Tonight] I was shuffling too many guys in and out."

AIC kept the score close through the first 13 minutes, as the Minutemen struggled to make their 3-point attempts – at that point, shooting 29 percent.

But once the UMass 3-point threats started to get hot, the Yellow Jackets simply couldn't keep pace. The Maroon and White ended the first half with 18 total 3-point attempts, making seven.

Starting shooting guard Ricky Harris shot 5-of-10 from 3-point range and made several transition lay-ups. The sophomore paced the Minutemen with 25 points and five steals.

From downtown

At Midnight Madness a few weeks ago, Ford said that his team would shoot a lot of 3-pointers this season.

If last night's exhibition is any indication, that may be an understatement.

The Minutemen hoisted up 18 shots from beyond the arc in the first half alone and finished the contest with 35 attempts. They hit on 14 of them, good for 40 percent. Both Forbes and Max Groebe came out strong, as the pair hit on its first two tries. Ricky Harris was cold to start, but his shot began to fall as he connected on 5-of-10 from deep.

"Our three-point shot can be a very demoralizing weapon at times," Ford said after the game.

Just about everyone who played shot at least once from the perimeter, with seven of the 11 players connecting at least once.

Game trends

Ford had his team play pressure defense, using a full-court press for much of the game. The strategy paid off, as the defense forced the Yellow Jackets into 13 turnovers in each half. Many of those turnovers resulted in quick and easy UMass baskets.

Lowe had a strong exhibition performance for the Minutemen running the point, driving into the lane and finding the open teammate. He played at a fast pace for much of the game, giving the Yellow Jackets problems defending the up-tempo UMass offense. Lowe led all players with eight assists, and the team finished with 26 on the night – compared to 11 turnovers.

Harris was equally as impressive, exploding for 25 points – with 14 coming in the second half. He anticipated Yellow Jacket passes all game long, coming up with five steals and two easy breakaway baskets … All five starters scored in double figures, as did Groebe, who scored 11 off the bench … Dante Milligan was elbowed in the face early in the second half and remained down for a minute before Ford helped him up. He appeared fine, just shaken up, and returned to action … Papa Lo drew huge ovations for an emphatic block midway through the second half … Eleven different Minutemen scored in the game … Sedale Jones was the only eligible player who did not play in the exhibition. Jones recently became eligible after his paperwork was approved by the NCAA.

hosted UMass and beat the Minutemen 5-0. This is easily the most lopsided win for La Salle in the series history. Especially considering UMass holds a 10-3 advantage in the series all-time.

Rappaport wasn't with the team when it lost to La Salle 2006 as he was rehabbing his ankle while spending the semester in Italy.

"I remember I was sitting in an Internet cafe and I saw it on Gametracker," he said. "I couldn't believe it and we've been talking about it since this season started. It's a really important game."

UMass and La Salle are tied for the final playoff spot at the moment. Both teams are 3-2 in the A-10, but enter this game on different streaks. Despite winning six in a row at one point, including an upset of No. 13 Saint Louis on the road, the Minutemen enter today losers of their last two. La Salle won its last three games, all A-10 matchups.

UMass and La Salle share a similar offensive mantra. Stylistically the teams are different, but both coaches hope to get as many players involved as possible. Nine different La Salle players scored goals this season compared to eight for UMass.

Fordham (5-6-3, 4-1-0 A-10) struggled early, losing six of their first seven games on the season, but righted itself once A-10 play began. They've won three games in a row and 4-of-5 including a 3-1 win over Duquesne in its most recent action.

Offensively, the Rams rely more on timely goals than a prolific attack. Seniors Kevin Meyer and Dean Stanic share the team lead in goals with four. Other players have scored, but the Rams do not rely on the balance that UMass does. Eight UMass players have scored goals and six have converted for game-winners.

The Minutemen are 8-3 all-time against the Rams. The teams did not meet last season and UMass got the best of their A-10 foe in 2005, winning 1-0 at Fordham in double-overtime.

The Rams played each of their last six games at home, but must now deal with the rigors of playing their final four games on the road. However, their schedule does not include Charlotte or Saint Louis.

Fordham travels to Kingston, R.I., tonight for a matchup with URI. The game will greatly affect the A-10 table. Saint Louis currently leads the conference at 5-1 with Fordham in second place. If FU defeats URI, they will have 15 points along with SLU who plays Saint Joseph's tonight also.

A URI victory is best for Saint Louis because it gives the Billikens some room regardless of the outcome in their matchup with the Hawks.

"She's the big deal. She can play quite a good player. She's been injured recently. I don't know if we'll see her but if we do they'll be better," Rudy said.

The Spiders still have a shot at making the A-10 Tournament and Rudy expects them to play like it.

The Colonials (8-8, 3-6 A-10), like the Minutewomen, are out of contention for the postseason and the tail end of their season will also be one based on pride.

"GW is always tough. Our games are always close last year, although we outplayed them by a bunch, we scored one goal [1-0 on Sept. 29]," Rudy said. "Their coach [Tanya Vogel] is a former player there and she motivates her players and, whatever it is, they have a high premium on work rate."

George Washington's top goal scorers are juniors Keara Mehlert, Meg Pyle and Erica Wright, all tied with eight points.

Mehlert has started every game for GW this year, racking up four goals. Last season she accumulated three assists (second on team) and scored her first goal, against Morehead State Sept. 3.

Pyle, a forward, has three goals and two assists. She led the Colonials in points, with 13, in 2006 when she pocketed six goals and notched one assist.

Wright, a midfielder, is the squad's other big scorer. Like Pyle, she has three goals and an assist. Wright appeared in all 19 of GW's games last year and recorded one goal.

Whatever the weekend has in store for his players, Rudy just wants them to give 100 percent and allow his seniors – Jenny Roehrig, Kristin Walker, Kaelyn Caldwell, Brit Canfield, Melissa Jubinville, Christina Nunes and Tina Rodriguez – to end their UMass careers on a victorious note.

Davy guiding Simmons in net

team. "I looked at it as doing something to be involved."

But Simmons made his collegiate debut in the team's first game of the season and eventually started 18 games during his first year with the Minutemen.

"He came in and had a lot of pressure on him," Davy said of Simmons. "He took that pressure well and from that – he's just grown in stature. Watching him, you could see he had the ability to be an outstanding goalkeeper. He's always had the potential to do it."

Before that fateful season, Koch hired Davy to take over the position from Jon Lowery. Among the responsibilities as Koch's new assistant coaching the goalkeepers.

Davy has overseen Simmons' development over the past three seasons. But the coach credits his goalkeeper's industrious nature for making it easier for him to help Simmons improve.

"He's the guy who knocks on my door and takes bags of balls and says 'Coach, what are you doing? Let's go train.' And that's why he's become the player he is," Davy said of Simmons. "He's taken the raw talent he had and just through hard work – he's become one of the top goalkeepers in New England."

While Simmons works on tactical game situations during team practice, training with Davy involves improving technique and working on weaknesses in net.

"When we go out [and practice], it's a lot of technical work," Davy said. "We'll work on some reaction drills and some things that we've identified that he needs to brush up on."

Since goalkeeper and coach spend an extra three or four hours per week training in net in addition to regular practice, the two have developed a special relationship.

Both Simmons and Davy feed off of each other's strong desire for improvement.

"[Davy] brings a lot of knowledge and knows the position," Simmons said. "He brings a work ethic … we're out there everyday early pretty much. He brings that desire to play and to get better and it's easy for me to feed off it."

As much as Simmons has learned to play goalkeeper during his time at UMass, Davy has learned how to teach the position. Ironically, the Grimsby, England native played nearly every position during his pre-college days across the pond – except for goalkeeper.

Davy was a midfielder for Lock Haven University in Pennsylvania. During the years between his playing days and his time at UMass, Davy studied the goalkeeper position and received multiple teaching credentials.

"He's studied and worked hard and has learned the position as well as anybody," Koch said of his assistant. "He's had a huge impact. His knowledge of the game is outstanding and he's one of the better assistant coaches that I've had."

An eager pupil and talented coach are a combination for success. And now the hard work of both Davy and Simmons is paying dividends for the Minutemen on the field.

The Massachusetts field hockey team takes on Richmond today in the opening round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament in Philadelphia at 2 p.m. The Minutewomen defeated Richmond, 1-0, on Oct. 21, if UMass wins today it takes on the winner of the Saint Joseph's–Temple game, which begins at 11 a.m.

Minutewomen return to A-10 tournament

By Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

It's tournament time for the Massachusetts field hockey team. Today it will travel to Philadelphia to face off against defending Atlantic 10 Champion Richmond in the first round of the A-10 Tournament.

UMass (11-8, 6-1 A-10) has rebounded from last year's 6-14 season in a big way. Saturday's victory at Rhode Island clinched a share of the conference title along with Temple.

The Minutewomen are the No. 2 seed in the tournament despite sharing the regular season title because they lost to Temple on Oct. 12. However, the Minutewomen are not content with regular season success, they believe that they are talented enough to win the tournament.

"One of our goals this year has been to get back to the tournament and we're excited, we're ready and we're ready to play a good game," said UMass coach Justine Sowry.

Standing in their way will be the Richmond Spiders (5-12, 5-2 A-10), winners of the last five conference titles.

The Minutewomen have gained a great deal of confidence since their emotional win over Richmond in the regular season. On UMass's senior day, Nicole Phelan scored off a penalty stroke early, and that goal was all the team needed. The defense dominated the rest of the way holding Richmond to two shots on goal in the Minutewomen's 1-0 victory. Sowry hopes for a repeat of that performance today. She feels that their win over Richmond will play a factor in today's game.

"Having not beaten them for five years, we now have

Sowry honored as conference's top coach in first year at helm

By Mike Connors

On Jan. 22 it was announced that Justine Sowry would become head coach of the Massachusetts field hockey team. It was unknown if that was the right decision, but now Sowry is Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year and hopes to lead her team to the conference tournament championship and beyond.

"It was a great surprise and definitely an honor to be selected by your peers in that capacity in my first year," Sowry said. "The bottom line really has been the effort of the team, and I also have to thank the assistant coaches as well for getting the team prepared and ready for the final."

The Minutewomen finished 11-8 overall, and 6-1 in the all-important conference play. Sowry led the team to its most successful regular season in six years; it was not since 2001 that the Minutewomen were atop the A-10.

Sowry coached a team that used timely goal scoring and tight defense to finish the season strong, winning seven of its final 10 games. She stressed "having the belief" throughout the season, and her strategy of preparing the team to be mentally tough has paid off as it heads into unfamiliar territory from last year.

The first-year coach was not the only one to receive an award from the A-10. Seniors Erin O'Brien and Kristina DoRosario led the Minutewoman defense that allowed 0.94 goals against this season and were rewarded with a spot on the A-10 All-Conference first-team.

"[O'Brien and DoRosario] complement each other real well, they're well respected, and they just have

Minutemen welcome Rams, Explorers to Rudd Field

By Joe Melloni

Redshirt junior Doug Rappaport and sophomore Bryan Hogan expressed the Massachusetts men's soccer team's feelings toward Rhode Island after losing to the Rams last Saturday.

The pair reframed from using the word "hate." But the message was nonetheless taken. The loss is certainly still fresh in their minds and has motivated the Minutemen to do everything they can to force a rematch with Rhode Island in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

"I guess off the field they're OK, but on the field I really don't like [Rhode Island]," Rappaport said. "I hope we get see them again in the A-10 Tournament."

The Minutemen must get to the A-10 Tournament first and to do that, they have to move past the loss to URI. With Fordham and La Salle coming to town, the Minutemen can unofficially lock up a spot in the conference tournament with a pair of wins.

UMass takes on La Salle at 11 a.m. this morning on Rudd Field. The UMass players talked about this game with the Explorers almost as passionately as they did the matchup with Rhode Island. Last season, La Salle

Davy's coaching key to success for Simmons in net

By Michael King

It can be the loneliest position on the field. But redshirt junior Zack Simmons has excelled as goalkeeper with the Massachusetts men's soccer team, emerging as one the team's most important players.

But the Durham, N.H., native has not faced the burden of improvement by himself. Simmons has invested countless hours on the training ground with UMass assistant coach Jon Davy.

Under Davy's tutelage, Simmons developed into one of the best goalkeepers in school history. He became the career shutout leader for the Minutemen with a 1-0 win over Hartford on Oct. 6, bringing his total to 19.

That victory marks how far Simmons has come since he arrived at the University in the fall of 2004.

And it wasn't an easy road to his current position. Competing in net for the UMass club team during his freshman year, Simmons never intended to play for the Minutemen. But UMass coach Sam Koch encouraged Simmons try out for the team in the spring of 2005 and the redshirt junior found himself on the roster the next season.

Even at that point, Simmons was unaware of his impending accomplishments.

"Maybe play my senior year," Simmons said of his expectations immediately after walking onto the

Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team finishes its 2007 regular season this weekend, hosting games against Richmond at 2 p.m. Friday and George Washington at 11 a.m. Sunday.

No matter the outcome, the Minutewomen (8-6-1, 3-6 Atlantic 10) will not have enough conference points to qualify for the A-10 Tournament. But UMass coach Jim Rudy said that should not make a difference this weekend and that these last two games are about going out with dignity and class.

"What we have left is a matter of character and pride and also, responsibility. Our kids who are on scholarship here, they're representing not only themselves and their parents, but they're also representing the school, and the Commonwealth and the state taxpayers if you want to take it the whole way," said Rudy. "It's up to them to honor their contract, if you will, and to play."

Rudy said the Spiders (6-10-2, 5-3-1 A-10) are much improved from last year. They lacked personnel in 2006 finishing 3-13-2, with a 3-6 A-10 record but they have started to hit their stride. Richmond has three players with three or more goals on the season.

Midfielder Jessie Wolfe is the top goal scorer. Starting every game, the junior has tallied five goals and one assist, for 11 points. She, like many aspects of last season's squad, has improved in quality. In 2006 Wolfe recorded one goal in 18 games.

One of Richmond's next best scorers can be described as the one that got away. Rudy scouted Carrie Holland, a native of Pittsfield for the Minutewomen about five years ago, but she had no interest in playing for UMass.

A senior midfielder, she has established herself as one of the Spiders' premier players. She missed all of last season due to injury, but Rudy says she has been making up for lost time. She has notched three goals and two assists, for eight points.

Midfielder Jen Ruhe has seven points with three goals and an assist. As a freshman last year when pocketed one goal and got three assists (five points).

Training prevents suicides

By Anna Dollanitis
Collegian Staff

Mental Health Services (MHS) at the University of Massachusetts has provided suicide prevention training to over 400 members of the campus community to date as a part of a three-year grant awarded to the University in the fall of 2006.

The Garrett Lee Smith Memorial Suicide Prevention Grant, which amounts to $225,000, was provided by the Substance Abuse Mental Health Services Administration and is being used to "train key individuals and groups on campus to recognize students on campus at risk of suicide and provide appropriate intervention."

The training focuses on members of the campus community known as "gatekeepers," who regularly interact with students, including UHS staff, campus police, coaches, deans, faculty, academic advisors and Residence Life staff, according to program coordinator Kerry Morrison, who conducts the training sessions.

The training being given to people in various departments of the campus was adapted from Campus Connection, a model which was created at Syracuse University.

"The training combines information about warning signs, myths and stats about suicide with experimental and skill building exercises," said Morrison. "To increase participants' level of comfort and effectiveness in intervening in crisis situations with students in distress."

Morrison identified the most common warning signs of an individual contemplating suicide as depression, feelings of hopelessness, suicide attempts, isolation or withdrawal, increased risk taking behavior and increased alcohol or drug use.

Campus recreation center on its way

Officials decide to go ahead with plans for center in 2009

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts officials undertook the long-awaited groundbreaking on a new $50 million, state-of-the-art recreation center set to be built on the east side of Commonwealth Avenue, across the street from the Mullins Center.

"We are committed to providing students a learning environment that keeps pace with our peers," said UMass Interim Chancellor Thomas Cole as he began the ceremony. "All freshmen and sophomores right now will be able to use the facility before they graduate."

The new 120,000 sq. ft. athletic facility is expected to open in 2009, and will feature two floors of weight training and fitness equipment, as well as a three-court gymnasium that can be used for basketball, volleyball and badminton, and will be surrounded by an indoor track.

The recreation center will feature modern facilities, including new locker rooms, a juice bar, lounge spaces and administrative offices. The building's design was completed by Sasaki Associates of Boston, and will be constructed by Fontaine Brothers of Springfield.

"This one is special," said UMass President Jack Wilson, after being introduced by Cole. "It dates back a long time. I'm excited to see this long-standing dream fulfilled for our students."

Funding for the new building comes almost entirely from student fees. The groundbreaking ceremony came only days before the Massachusetts State legislature considered a critical $2 billion bonding bill, which would send over $1 billion to the University, with more than 51 percent of that going directly to the Amherst campus.

"Over 80 percent of what we do is out of our own funds, including projects like this recreation center," said Wilson. "This [bonding] bill would make that ratio more like 50-50."

State Representative Ellen Story (D-Amherst) also noted the impending state bill as she took the podium, but her speech also fit with the joyful tone of the ceremony.

"In the last few years, money for buildings like this one has been coming out of the pockets of students. This building, funded out of student fees, is for the students, which is important," said Story. "I just want to make sure that state legislators like myself get some sort of special pass, so we can go shoot some hoops whenever we'd like."

"One of the first things prospective students look at when visiting the campus is the state of the buildings, and this will make quality of life for students even better," said Jennifer Broccetas, alumna and member of the UMass Board of Trustees. "When I was a student here in the '80s, the places we had available to work out in left a lot to be desired. This will change that image."

"We saw the need. We made the commitment. Now it's getting done," said John McCutcheon, UMass Amherst Athletic Director. "This will bring state of the art resources to our students."

Minutewomen capture A-10 Championship

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

For the first time since 2001, Richmond didn't win the Atlantic 10 Championship. The Massachusetts field hockey team now holds that title and went through the five-time defending champions to do so.

After defeating the Spiders 2-1 on Friday, the Minutewomen (13-8, 8-1 A-10) used two Erin Parker goals to win the A-10 with an identical-score victory over Saint Joseph's on Saturday.

UMass will head to Princeton on Tuesday for a matchup with the No. 18 Tigers.

The Minutewomen opened up the scoring against the Hawks (11-9, 5-4 A-10) just over 20 minutes into the game. A Jamie Bouraxeris shot off a penalty corner was blocked, but Katelyn Orlando, in her second game back from injury, received the rebound and found Parker on the side for the goal. It was Parker's fourth of the season, but she was not done.

Seven minutes later, Nicole Phelan sent a pass into the center of the circle and Parker was there to beat goalkeeper Rebecca Cunfer for her second tally of the day.

"Every game she works tirelessly," UMass coach Justine Sowry said of Parker, "but she doesn't have the statistics to show her good work over the year."

After defeating Saint Joseph's Saturday to capture the Atlantic 10 Championship, the Massachusetts field hockey team returned home to hoist the trophy at the Curry Hicks Cage during halftime of the men's basketball exhibition game.

YCMP holders still cannot use swipes at People's Market

By Joe Staff
Collegian Staff

One popular student-run business at the University of Massachusetts is not allowed to let its customers use their YCMP (Your Campus Meal Plan) swipes, and the customers and staff of the People's Market are asking why.

YCMP swipes can be used at a variety of eateries on campus, including some student-run businesses. These swipes are used frequently by many students that have the meal plans to allow them to do so. With some meal plans suited for undergraduates like the Value Meal Plan that costs $1663.50 a semester, students receive 224 meals and only seven meal exchanges (YCMP swipes). Other plans suited for graduate or commuter students, like the Gold Meal Plan that costs $875, allows the purchaser 100 meal exchanges per semester.

Each meal exchange swipe equals $7.25 worth of food or drink, totaling $725 worth of food or drink for the paid price of $875. From these expensive rates, students want to get their money's worth. That means most students are reserving their meals for the dining commons and eateries on campus that take YCMP swipes.

The People's Market is a student-run business located in the Student Union. According to the co-manager, Rachel Mandel, the Market is close to celebrating its 35th anniversary.

The Market is a distributor of all-natural and fresh food and supports the fair-trade system. It provides students a place to eat healthily and offers a variety of food and drink that includes herbal tea, gourmet coffee, assortment of cheeses, fruit, assortment of bagels, cold drinks, sandwiches and more.

For years, the staff of the People's Market has been attempting to get the attention of the Center for Student Business. The CSB is a council consisting of 12 people, mainly business students, including one director that oversees policy and procedure development of the student-run businesses on campus. The Market wants to make some compromise to install the right for its customers to use their YCMP swipes.

National gas prices have risen significantly in Amherst, prices have gone up to $2.95 per gallon.

Gas prices skyrocket

By Cary Hutchison
Collegian Contributor

Students at the University of Massachusetts are feeling the effects of higher gas prices as the cost of fuel has risen eight cents a gallon, according to a recent survey.

AAA of Southern New England has determined that gas prices have risen from $2.67 to $2.72. Despite the high cost, Massachusetts remains 13 cents under the national average of $2.85.

In Amherst, the average price for regular self-serve gas is $2.95.

U.S. considering plan for motorcycle medic response

By Molly Strawberg
Collegian Staff

America may be catching on to a trend Europe started nearly ten years ago.

First responder paramedics dedicated to helping motorcyclists are slowly making their way across the country in populated areas. Fire departments and ambulance units are starting to train paramedics to respond to health related incidents via motorcycle in an attempt to decrease response time and ultimately help save lives.

Nantucket Fire Chief Mark McGougall began a similar system 15 years ago with just one motorcycle.

"In a congested area it can make a difference," McGougall said. "It's helpful in certain areas especially highly congested areas and with events in areas we can't get an ambulance

King Tut's face unveiled in public for first time

By Anna Johnson
Associated Press

The face of King Tutankhamun was unveiled in public yesterday after more than 3,000 years of the ancient pharaoh's death.

King Tut's buck-toothed face was unveiled Sunday for the first time in public — more than 3,000 years after the youngest and most famous pharaoh to rule ancient Egypt was shrouded in linen and buried in his golden underground tomb.

Archeologists carefully lifted the fragile mummy out of a quartz sarcophagus decorated with stone-carved protective goddesses, momentarily pulling aside a beige covering to reveal a leathery black body.

The linen was then replaced over Tut's narrow body so only his face and tiny feet were exposed, and the corpse of the 19-year-old king, whose life and death has captivated people for nearly a century, was moved to a simple, glass, climate-controlled case to keep it from turning to dust.

"I can say for the first time that the mummy is safe and the mummy is well preserved, and at the same time, all the tourists who will enter this tomb will be able to see the face of Tutankhamun for the first time," Egypt's antiquities chief Zahi Hawass said from inside the hot and sticky tomb.

"The face of the golden boy is amazing. It has magic and it has mystery," he added.

Hawass said scientists began restoring the badly damaged mummy more than two years ago. Much of the body is broken into 18 pieces — damage sustained when British archaeologist Howard Carter first discovered it 85 years ago, took it from its tomb and tried to pull off the famous golden mask, Hawass said.

But experts fear a more recent phenomenon — mass tourism — is further deteriorating Tut's mummy. Thousands of tourists visit the underground chamber every month, and Hawass said within 50 years the mummy could dissolve into dust.

"The humidity and heat caused by ... people entering the tomb and their breathing will change the mummy to a powder. The only good thing (left) in this mummy is the face. We need to preserve the face," said Hawass, who wore his signature Indiana Jones-style tan hat.

The mystery surrounding King Tutankhamun — who ruled during the 18th dynasty and ascended to the throne at age 8 — and his glittering gold tomb has entranced ancient-Egypt fans since Carter first discovered the hidden tomb, revealing a trove of fabulous gold and precious stone treasures and propelling the once-forgotten pharaoh into global stardom.

He wasn't Egypt's most powerful or important king, but his staggering treasures, rumors of a mysterious curse that plagued Carter and his team — debunked by experts long ago — and several books and TV documentaries dedicated to Tut have added to his intrigue.

Archeologists in recent years have tried to resolve lingering questions over how he died and his precise royal lineage. In 2005, scientists removed Tut's mummy from his tomb and placed it into a portable CT scanner for 15 minutes to obtain a three-dimensional image. The scans were the first done on an Egyptian mummy.

The results ruled out that Tut was violently murdered — but stopped short of definitively concluding how he died around 1323 B.C. Experts, including Hawass, suggested that days before dying, Tut badly broke his left thigh, an apparent accident that may have resulted in a fatal infection.

The CT scan also provided the most revealing insight yet into Tut's life. He was well-fed and healthy, but slight, standing 5 feet, 6 inches tall at the time of his death. The scan also showed he had the overbite characteristic of other kings from his family, large incisor teeth and his lower teeth were slightly misaligned.

The unveiling of Tut's mummy comes amid a resurgence in the frenzy over the boy king. A highly publicized museum exhibit traveling the globe drew more than 4 million people during its initial four-city American leg of the tour. The exhibit will open Nov. 15 in London and later will make a three-city encore tour in the U.S. beginning with the Dallas Museum of Art.

The Egyptian tourism industry is hoping to capitalize on that interest and draw tourists to Luxor to see something they couldn't in traveling exhibit — the mummy itself.

The number of tourists who visit Tut's tomb is expected to double to 700 a day now that the mummy will be on display indefinitely, said Mostafa Wazery, who heads the Valley of the Kings for Egypt's Supreme Council of Antiquities. Most of Egypt's other identified mummies are on display in museums in Luxor and Cairo.

Change in habits helps fertility rate

By Natasha S. Whitney
Harvard Crimson (Harvard)

(U-WIRE) CAMBRIDGE, Mass. - Forget psychics, pills and pricey in vitro fertilization for some women, combating infertility may be as easy as adjusting eating and exercising habits, according to a study released Wednesday by researchers at the Harvard School of Public Health.

In one of the first studies of its kind, researchers found that specific dietary patterns, vigorous physical activity and maintaining a healthy body mass index can lead to a substantial decrease in the rate of infertility due to ovulatory disorders.

According to Jorge E. Chavarro, co-author of the report and research fellow at HSPH, the specific dietary patterns include taking multivitamins containing folic acid and iron, avoiding trans fats and choosing fish, eggs and whole grains over chicken, red meat and white bread.

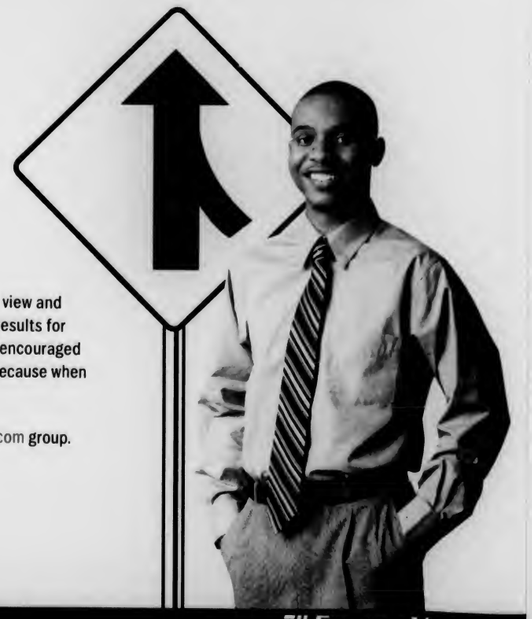
The researchers conducted the study by surveying a group of 18,000 women struggling with infertility on their lifestyle and diets.

Chavarro said that there are many causes of infertility in women, including blocked fallopian tubes, which cannot be treated by strictly dietary and physical means. However, the most common contributor to female infertility — problems with ovulation — can often be abetted by these means, according to the study.

Currently, one in six couples struggle with infertility, and ovulatory problems have been diagnosed in 18 to 30 percent of those cases, according to the press release for the study. Until now, most reports on infertility have focused on how it can be influenced by medicine and surgery.

"This is the first big long-term study in the world that's taken a look at diet and exercise and its effects on fertility," said Patrick Skerrett, author of the book, "The Fertility Diet: Groundbreaking Research Reveals Natural Ways to Boost Ovulation and Improve Your Chances of Getting Pregnant." The book is based on the report and will be published this coming December, he said.

Chavarro and co-author Walter C. Willett, director of the department of nutrition at HSPH, chose to track body weight, level of physical activity, multivitamin supplements and certain dietary adjustments on the basis of past studies that correlated these factors with diabetes in women. The authors believed that these correlations were important because they speculated that sensitivity to insulin is also related to ovulatory function in women.



Currently, Harvard University Dining Services works closely with HSPH and Willett to design meal plans.

Not only are our dining halls free of trans fats, they also provide other fertility-friendly options daily, according to HUDS spokeswoman Crista Martin.

These foods include low glycemic carbohydrates like whole grain pasta and bread and protein from healthy sources like soy beans and chickpeas.

Grant funds suicide prevention training

1,100 college students commit suicide annually, according to the 2004 United States Census. "We do not have specific data about UMass," said Morrison. "This is one of the reasons to do this work, to get a better idea of the rates of attempts, completions, etc in our community."

Although MHS has received positive feedback from participants in the training, it plans to ask for further feedback from these participants in order to determine changes to be made in the program in the future.

"We are look at pre-tranning, past-tright after training and three months laiert surveys on knowledge, skills and comfort with intervening, to see what effect the training has on participants, but we are in the very early stages of collecting this data," said Morrison.

The grant that MHS is currently working with, which was awarded to 46 institutions nationwide, will end in 2009, at which point, SAMHSA will decide whether or not MHS will be offered another grant, or additional funding through alternate means, according to Morrison. UMass is currently in the second round of colleges and universities that were awarded the grant by SAMHSA.

"We are trying to get a group of trainers who have gone through the initial gatekeeper trainings to continue to do this work," said Morrison. "As well as helping departments and the University develop protocols or policies for suicide prevention so this work will be sustainable after the grant expires."

MHS stresses the difficulty that mental health professionals have in identifying serious mental and behavioral health problems in college students. Nationwide, fewer than 20 percent of students who die by suicide are past or current clients of their school's counseling center. UMass Amherst surveys have shown that over 80 percent of those who sought mental health care said services helped them stay in school and improve academic performance.

In additional to the gatekeeper training sessions, MHS has also participated in the National Anxiety & Depression Screening with the Psychological Services Center. Developed media campaigns to raise awareness about suicide prevention and planned the National International Suicide Awareness Prevention Week on the UMass campus in September.

"Resources are available to students, faculty and staff in distress of any kind whether or not they are contemplating suicide," said Morrison.

Mental health care can be obtained through Mental Health Services located in Hills North, the Everywoman's Center, Counseling & Assessment Services (CASA) located in Berkshire House or the Psychological Service Center (PSC) located in Tobin Hall.

Students react to increasingly high price of gas in Amherst

"I feel like I refill my tank so often," said Ross Walker, a senior at UMass. "I drive a Nissan Altima, which is a pretty gas-efficient car, but lately I find myself at the gas station twice a week paying a whole lot more than I am used to."

A commuter student, Walker lives off campus in an apartment in Belchertown. At the beginning of the semester, he found that his drive to campus was a little long, but it wasn't something he thought of much until now.

Junior Ruth Drumm has also noticed her wallet becoming emptier as she is forced to refill her tank more often than before. According to Drumm, the rise has made her hesitant to go visit friends at schools out of state because she simply cannot afford to do so.

While both Drumm and Walker drive small sedans, students with SUVs have really noticed a strain on their funds. The cost to fill up a larger car can range anywhere between $45 and 60 dollars, said students who own SUVs.

"It just becomes a hassle," said Amanda Samanello, a junior at UMass. "I feel like I am constantly shelling out more and more money for gas, leaving me broke and unable to buy things for myself."

A Mobil station employee in Amherst center said he hadn't seen a change in business because of the rise of gas prices.

"People need gas, they aren't just going to stop driving, they have to fill their tank," he said.

According to the Federal Energy Information Administration, gas prices were 62 cents lower a year ago. In 2003, barrels of crude oil were $25 per gallon. Price per barrel has steadily increased over the last four years, but as of May 2007, prices were $96.24 per barrel.

Alternative methods are being introduced, according to Walker, and corn-based ethanol is one solution.

A Mobil station on Route 9 had the lowest price in the area at the cost of $2.66 per gallon in early November.

Somali pirates surrender to two ships hijacked from U.S. Navy

By Edward Harris
Associated Press

Somali pirates gave up control of two ships hijacked months earlier and U.S. Navy escorted the boats to safer waters Sunday as it stepped up efforts to bring security to the seas off the chaotic Horn of Africa nation.

The pirates climbed into small skiffs and headed back to Somalia after speaking by radio to U.S. naval personnel. A Navy ship and helicopter guided the South Korean-owned boats Mayuno 1 and 2 further out to sea.

It was the third time in a week the U.S. has intervened to help ships hijacked by Somali pirates. Sailors boarded a North Korean ship to give medical assistance to crew members who overpowered their hijackers and a U.S. naval vessel fired on pirate skiffs tied to a Japanese-owned ship.

Naval personnel boarded the South Korean-owned ships and gave medical checkups to the crew, said Cmdr. Lydia Robertson of the U.S. Fifth Fleet in Bahrain. No injuries were reported. The two Tanzanian-flagged boats were seized May 15.

The Navy was also urging pirates to leave the Japanese ship and two hijacked boats in the region and sail back to Somalia, she told The Associated Press.

"We're very happy with this development and hope it happens with the other ships off the coast," Robertson said. She gave no indication of the content of the conversations.

Robertson said the increase in U.S. military interventions was mainly due to a surge in piracy. As the Navy moved ships into the area to respond to one incident, increased contact with other hijacked ships in the area was more likely, she said.

"It's not that it's a change in focus," Robertson said. "But we had the opportunity to put some pressure on the pirates and say, it's time to leave, we need to free these ships."

South Korea said all 24 sailors on board the two ships freed Sunday were safe. The Foreign Ministry said the ships were being escorted to Aden port in Yemen at the request of the South Korean government. The two dozen sailors included 10 Chinese, four South Koreans, three Vietnamese, three Indians and four Indonesians.

"The government strongly condemns the international pirate activities that resulted in innocent sailors seized in high seas and held in captivity for a long time," the ministry said.

South Korean media have reported that the Somali pirates were demanding between $700,000 and $1 million in ransom. Robertson made no comment on ransom demands, deferring to the shipping company.

Last year, another South Korean fishing vessel was captured off Somalia and released three months later after a ransom of more than $500,000 was paid.

Somalia lies close to crucial shipping routes connecting the Red Sea with the Indian Ocean.

The country has had no effective government since 1991, when warlords ousted a dictatorship and then turned on each other, making it difficult to prevent attacks along Somalia's 1,880-mile coastline.

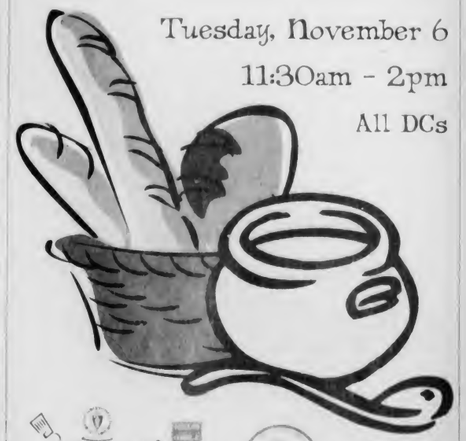
response."

Aside from the overall response time, the Amherst Fire Department recommends AMPD is usually on scene first and all police officers are first responders. Overall, AMPD's motorcycle response team utilizes the quick response on medical calls.

"If we have only one officer out, we put a defib [automatic defibrillator] on the motorcycle and a small medical kit," Mieczkowski said.

There is also extensive motorcycle training



A system in which first response paramedics attend to fallen motorcyclists is similar to a program started 15 years ago at the Fire Department in Nantucket.

Pagans get no play

Katy Bruck

Even with Halloween barely a week behind us, not much thought is given to the actual origins of the holiday. A popular theory is that Halloween is in some way a "conspiracy" created by candy companies and costume manufacturers. A theory like this doesn't seem so farfetched when you start to see ten pound bags of assorted mini candy bars and rubber George W. Bush masks lining the aisles of convenience stores starting in August.

Like most holidays in America, Halloween has become more about commercialism and, on college campuses, having an excuse to behave even more questionably than usual on the weekends leading up to and following Oct. 31. But some enterprising R.A.'s were attempting to tackle the truths behind Halloween – I saw many a bulletin board plastered with construction paper cutouts of flying witches and common myths and misconceptions about the ancient holiday.

For those who may not know, Halloween, still known by many as Samhain (pronounced Sah-wen, of Celtic etymology), is the last in a series of ancient Celtic harvest festivals, and marks the New Year on their calendar. It observes the end of the growing season and the coming of winter, and the darkness that comes with it.

For this reason, many traditions also integrate celebrations of honoring the dead, as well as acknowledging the cycles of the seasons and of life. Many of our current Halloween traditions – like trick-or-treating, Jack o' Lanterns and dressing in costumes – come from this ancient belief that where the light of summer and the darkness of winter come to meet each other, the world of the dead and the world of the living are also enjoined.

For college students, the idea that American traditions are probably based on some mish-mash of age-old foreign customs shouldn't be too surprising. So why is Halloween still relevant? Because it is still celebrated in its original incarnation by a small minority of people. Some of whom reside on this campus.

On most forms and applications that I've seen, there's usually not a "Neo-Pagan/Wiccan" bubble under religious affiliation.

At Marshall University in West Virginia, students are now officially allowed to miss class in order to observe Pagan holidays. The new policy, which formerly protected worshippers of more well-known religions, expanded its jurisdiction to Pagan students. This was less of a response to an overwhelming protest on the part of the students than because the dean felt that, despite their minority, these students had a right to have their religious practices respected.

And that respect should be reflected in university policy. A sociology professor at Marshall expressed his hope that the new policy will encourage Pagan students to be more vocal and become a greater presence on campus.

The University of Massachusetts, like many other universities, has a blanket policy stating that any student who is unable to attend class, sit for an exam or fulfill a work requirement for religious reasons is, under Massachusetts law, excused from that particular obligation (as long as sufficient notice is given). On the UMass Religious Affairs Committee Web site, they even have a list of major religious observances so that professors can verify the dates of any holiday that may interfere with student attendance. Not surprisingly, Pagan holidays are not included on this list, although there is an RSO relating to Pagan students.

The actual number of Pagan students on campus is difficult to gauge. On most forms and applications that I've seen, there's usually not a "Neo-Pagan/Wiccan" bubble under religious affiliation, and "Other" generally doesn't cut it when it comes to specific statistics. Judging from the RSO S.P.I.R.A.L.S. (Student Pagans Integrating Religion and Life Spiritually), I'd say the number of active worshippers on campus is probably somewhere in the 20's.

You don't see too many flyers advertising events, and only if you look carefully will you notice the occasional five-pointed-star-within-a-circle pendants hanging around a few people's necks. Much to my surprise, I found out that this summer, UMass actually hosted a regional conference for Pagans and Wiccans in New England. There were workshops, book signings and a barbecue. So these people really do exist. They are our fellow students, our teachers, shop owners and they're even in the military.

I overheard at the dining commons a few weeks ago someone sniggering and looking pointedly at a group of kids sitting at a table. They were dressed in mostly black, and a few of the guys had metal circlets on their heads. They stuck out, and they seemed unembarrassed about it.

Though my sniggering friend probably didn't realize it, I knew that these kids, who maybe seemed a little awkward in their black t-shirts, "weird" necklaces and funny little crowns, were just practicing their rights as students and citizens to observe their own religion.

I didn't laugh, I felt no need to ridicule. Because when October rolls around, and the leaves start crunching under our feet, everyone becomes a little Pagan. So next time you're carving a pumpkin or eating a marshmallow ghost, remember those among us who, on this day in particular, really know where it's at.

Question Clinton's credibility

Brad DeFlumeri

Those who follow politics and are not awestruck by Bill and Hillary Clinton – a rapidly expanding segment of the population – generally have some questions about the ethics and morality of the former first couple.

Many commentators from the political left and right have written extensively on the sexual, real estate and ethically questionable practices of the Clintons.

Ann Coulter established her longstanding career and notoriety for meticulously documenting the ethical transgressions of the Clintons. Her best-selling 2002 book, High Crimes and Misdemeanors, brings together the illegal and morally reprehensible things the Clinton family has done, as well as all those they have hurt in the process.

Unsurprisingly, there is another political dagger being launched that could easily do further damage to the dwindling credibility of Hillary. On Friday, Oct. 26, The Equal Justice Foundation of America unveiled "Hillary! Uncensored: Banned by the Media." The documentary's debut was put on by the Republican club at Harvard University and then quickly disseminated nation-wide.

Hillary has made a political career out of being able to conveniently ignore the painful truth in attempt to further her agenda.

The scathing documentary chronicles how, in the run-up to her 2000 New York Senate victory, Clinton illegally obtained millions of dollars in political donations from a number of unchecked donors – and then lied to the press and the public when questions were raised. The documentary illuminates how the Clintons illegally raised upwards of $12 million via a Hollywood political gala in August of 2000, when Bill still resided in the White House.

The Equal Justice Foundation is a nonprofit, politically neutral organization dedicated to exposing both public and private corruption. EJF researched the events that led up to the pending federal court case and produced the documentary.

The court case, Paul vs. Clinton, will be heard by a federal district court in California in early 2008. The case revolves around the allegations of widespread fraud in Clinton's 2000 Senate campaign and the alleged cover-up that followed.

The allegations brought forth in the case and the film is certainly not new. However, the precision with which the producers consistently capture the Clintons in conflict with their previous statements and testimony is alarming. Time after time, the movie reveals, Hillary is caught with her hand in the illegal campaign finance cookie jar, only to lie about the crimes after being questioned by the Federal Elections Commission or investigators. One of the Clintons' top fundraising officials, Aaron Tonken, served 5 years in prison for the campaign finance indiscretions that were unearthed in Hillary's 2000 campaign.

Douglas Cogan, a businessman-turned-associate producer and researcher for the film, said he's made it his mission to expose what he calls the greatest campaign finance fraud that ever has been committed.

"[The Clintons think] they are truly above the law," Cogan said. "My country has never seen anyone like Hillary Rodham Clinton."

These allegations could prove significant in the coming election season. If our mainstream media has its way, the documentary and the pending litigation will not even enter the public consciousness, as every mainstream media source has largely ignored the allegations being made.

However, there is nothing surprising about the Katie Couries, Bill Moyers and NPR types ignoring the allegations of criminal conduct being levied against a powerful and prominent liberal politician. To report allegations against Clinton and allow the people to see her true colors would undermine the whole movement to elect a Democrat President in which our media is a force to be reckoned with.

More evidence that details the Clintons' historic contempt for the rule of law and their belief that they are above it is not surprising, either. However, what may be important here is the notion that a viable Presidential candidate who publicly ignores the marital infidelities of her husband so as to not let them conflict with her political ambitions is considerably more corrupt and detestable than many already acknowledge.

Regarding the campaign fraud, film-producer Cogan noted, "Hillary can no longer feign ignorance in what went on here. I think she is absolutely an unthinkable commander in chief."

However, I would submit that Hillary has made a political career out of being able to conveniently ignore the painful truth in attempt to further her agenda. It never fails to amaze me how so many women advocacy groups get weak in the knees at the mere sight of Hillary while she simultaneously ignores charges of rape, infidelity and procuring sexual favors from interns in public office against her husband. Is she the type of strong-minded wife to which our young women should aspire to be?

Ultimately, voters will decide whether Hillary's well-documented disdain for law is enough to keep her out of the White House. However, let me leave you with two final questions.

In a time when there is an increasingly powerful call for change in national politics toward more accountability, honesty and decency from our public officials, is a return to the Clinton White House even remotely acceptable?

If George W. Bush is so widely condemned in part for the perception that he very routinely and callously misguides the public, then why would we expect anything but a horror show from a President Hillary Clinton when her history reveals so many instances of abuse of power?

These are questions worth examining.

The power of a smile

Smiling is an act and expression used by humans to convey a message of happiness, pleasure or excitement. The act of smiling is produced as an involuntary response to a genuine emotion. Scientists have learned that smiling is innate and an example of this would be a blind person smiling without learning it through observation. I believe that through smiling and surrounding yourself with other smiles, you can live a more positive, pleasurable life.

Josh Walovitch

A few things must be considered when connecting the act of smiling with the idea of being happy. Smiling is an expression of an emotion, namely happiness, and emotions we express on our face give the outside world – to a certain extent – a window into what's going on emotionally inside.

Expressions provide evidence as to your inner feelings. For example, if you are feeling happy on the inside you will exhibit this with a smile, but if you are feeling sad or depressed on the inside you will let the world know through the act of frowning.

The next connecting idea is that emotions are contagious; they spread as if they were a deadly virus. For example, if you are walking down the street and someone passing you directs a smile your way, intuitively you are going to smile back. You might not be happy at the time, but because someone is exhibiting this nice gesture, you feel the need to experience it as well.

On the contrary, if you attend a funeral you are more prone to become depressed – not only because you are in the presence of a depressing ceremony, but because you are surrounded by a bunch of people who are also depressed.

If you are not quite convinced with the idea that emotions are contagious, just consider the idea of going to a comedy club. If you go to a stand-up club and see a comedian perform, I guarantee you are going to laugh ten times harder than if you were at home watching from your sofa. The reason for this is that the laughter is just as contagious as a smile or a frown.

Emotions we express on our face give the outside world… a window into what's going on emotionally inside.

A room full of 10ft people laughing along with you will definitely increase your emotional release of laughs. The key to happiness is right below your nose. If you hang around with people that are sad most of the time, or complain or just can't seem to squeeze a smile out, then why don't you consider running with a crowd that is more jovial?

Now, obviously being around smiles 24/7 will not solve all of your problems, but I am positive that it will not hurt either. And for all you lazy people, you use fewer muscles to smile than to frown.

Ok, so now we have this idea that I can pass my positive energy in the form of a smile and increase your positive energy by making you smile. When I think about that idea, I take notice to the powerful force I have over you. I am playing you like a puppet, just like in that terrible 'N Sync video. I have the ability to control your emotions.

Obviously, I am not controlling someone on a significant level, but it is a start. Imagine the type of control that someone who is giving a speech has on a crowd of 10,000 people. I bet that even if they make a terrible joke, you are going to hear countless chuckles. And if they wanted to, they could tell a sad and depressing story and change your emotions from happy to sad within minutes. Those are some serious superhero-type powers right there, controlling the emotions of thousands of people through the usage of words.

I guess you can consider smiling – or any emotion – a form of persuasion. Whether you use this in a positive or negative way is up to you. But imagine someone like a president, addressing a whole nation of people, and what type of damage they could do with this act of persuasion. It's scary to think about certain things that are out of our control.

If society, through the means of endless advertisements, is feeding us all of these messages attempting to change how we feel, how can we be sure that they are not taking advantage of us? How can we stand around taking everything in at face value, accepting what something is just because someone claims so? I guess if you did decide to be more skeptical toward things you come across, then life would become a little more complicated.

But the next time you find yourself among thousands of other people being preached to, think twice before you laugh, or become upset about the words coming out of the speaker's mouth. Maybe the main purpose of their words is hidden and embedded behind meaningless laughs or sad stories. Don't let the crowd around you influence your thoughts.

Emotions can be persuasive and if you are still skeptical about this whole "you smile, I smile" concept then why not experiment with it. Next time you are walking to a class or are in a room full of people, dish out a smile or two and see what type of reaction you receive. I wouldn't be surprised if you are graced with some smiles in return.

Comedy: not just another reason to stay up

Boston improv group brings act to Earthfoods Cafe in Student Union

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Correspondent

Tuesday night, the Jewish Student Union and I Mass Hillel will be bringing something to campus that it has been notably lacking: live Jewish sketch comedy.

On Nov. 6, Boston-based comedy troupe "The Late Night Players" will be coming to Amherst as part of their nationwide college campus tour.

The Late Night Players started as a group of six friends at Brandeis University in Waltham, Mass. who had a love of sketch comedy. They performed frequently at school and, upon graduation, decided to take their show to campuses across the country. Eventually, two members were not able to tour, leaving Aaron, Seth, Andrew and Zach as the new players.

Their style of comedy consists of social commentary, political criticism, random silliness and Napoleon Dynamite-style dancing. Some sketches poke subtle fun at the politicians, while others are very overt. The Players wear their opinions on their sleeves (literally), directly attacking Wal-Mart by comparing it to Harry Potter's main villain.

This relevant brand of humor has won The Late Night Players wide acclaim by youth across the country, but targets by the mainstream media, as their venues tend to be small and they often go under the radar.

They usually do school-specific humor as well, ripping good-naturedly into the area, by-laws and alumni of whatever university they happen to be at. Their specialty, however, is anagrams of the school name.

"Anagrams is the best thing we've ever come up with," said Zach Sherwin. "The concept is brilliant, and we're so good at the execution now."

Since the UMass Hillel was involved in bringing them to campus, you can also expect a good amount of Hebrew humor, such as "the time traveling Israelite" and their sketch about the common uses of the word "oy."

The Late Night Players are very socially active, raising money and awareness for important causes such as Global AIDS and the Darfur genocide at many of their shows. These efforts are spearheaded by Andrew Slack, but supported by all of the members for their obvious importance to society. They believe that those who have the attention of the public have a responsibility to put it to good use.

The event will open with a performance by the University's own Mission: Improvable. MI is a group of 16 UMass students with a knack for making things up on the spot. The group was started in 1996 by four UMass alumni as a weekly comedy show. Since then it has been thriving, putting on regular shows and participating in comedy festivals across the state.

Their humor is decidedly ridiculous, and the shows operate somewhat like "Whose Line is it Anyway?" Previous skits have included slow-motion battles and the dilemma of putting a snake into a nursing home.

The event will be held at 8 o'clock in the Earthfoods cafe in the Student Union. The price is right: admission is free, courtesy of the Jewish Student's Union and the Hillel. For entertainment people, Jewish people and anyone who likes a good laugh, The Late Night Players should be a mid-week priority.

"The Late Night Players" comedy style is similar to the television show "Whose Line Is It Anyway?," but with more political references and specialized jokes to their latest tour stop.

Cult classic returns to DVD

'My So Called Life' shares adolescent woes with fans

By Bruce Descis
Arts & Living Columnist

You can learn a lot about teenagers and television by watching television with your teenagers.

Take "Beverly Hills, 90210," which first hit the airwaves in the fall of 1990, when my oldest daughter was in high school. My both came away with a number of lessons that being rich doesn't necessarily make you happy (actually, we already knew that), that teenagers of all social strata have to deal with drugs, alcohol, sex and peer pressure and that the only reason Jori Spelling was in the show was because she was Aaron Spelling's daughter, but she really wasn't that much worse than anyone else in the cast.

And though the Jori series was hardly a great show, and neither my daughter nor I left for all that Luke Perry hype, the series was a lot more realistic in its portrayal of teenagers than the shows that aired when I was in my teens, like "Father Knows Best," "My Three Sons," "I've Dream Reed Show," "The Adventures of Ozzie & Harriet" and "Leave It to Beaver."

Which gets us to "My So-Called Life," the critically acclaimed but low-rated series about 15(-ish)-old high school student Angela Chase (the remarkable Claire Danes) and her family and friends. The ABC series lasted only one season, from August 1994 to January 1995, but it was a memorable one, and I watched it with my three younger children, who were all on the verge of teenagerhood.

Although the series has been out before on DVD, this week's release of "My So-Called Life: The Complete Series" (Shout! Factory, $69.99, not rated) provides fans with an excellent package. The six-disc set not only includes all 19 episodes, but also comes with new interviews and episode commentaries by cast and crew members and a 40-page commemorative book.

Created by Winnie Holzman and executive producers Marshall Herskovitz and Ed Zwick, who had earlier collaborated on the hit TV series "thirtysomething," "My So-Called Life" was by far the most realistic teen-oriented series in television history when it debuted on ABC.

Written like diary entries by a bright but alienated high school girl, it gave voice to the inner thoughts of Danes' Angela as she navigated through the emotionally dangerous terrain of high school.

"It's a show about people where the theme was being a teenager," Holzman says on the DVD documentary "My So-Called Life Story," which helps explain the series' appeal to both adults and teens (and pre-teens). Holzman and the other writers developed an uncanny ability not only to speak in the language of contemporary teenagers but to do so without condescension or slighting the intelligence of the teenagers in the series.

The latest box set of "My So Called Life" features all original 19 episodes and a 40 page book with cast interviews.

"My So Called Life" is remembered by many television fans as one of the more accurate teenage dramas.

While Angela's parents, played by Bess Armstrong and Tom Irwin, were both complex characters who genuinely cared for their children but had their own issues and needs that sometimes took priority, it was the young people in "My So-Called Life" who made the show so special.

Angela's two best friends, odd child-on-the-edge Rayanne (Wilson Langer) and gay Rickie (Wilson Cruz), were completely fresh and real-to-TV characters, indeed Cruz's character was the first gay teenager to be a regular on a network TV series. And although Jared Leto as the handsome and sullen Jordan Catalano (Angela's crush) and Devon Gummersall (as Brian) and Devon Odessa (as Sharon) – two of Angela's past friends with whom she was becoming more distant – had shining, above-everyone moments, Danes, who made the show a pilot when she was only 13 and still in junior high school, (she beat out the 16-year-old Alicia Silverstone for the role) in his interviews for the DVD, Herskovitz describes Danes' Bryant as "magical," while Holzman marvels at Danes' "really unusual level of talent."

It's clear from the DVD's "A Conversation With Claire Danes and Winnie Holzman" that what Holzman calls Danes' "preternatural talent" inspired the series' writers. And in her part, Danes, looking glamorous at 27 in this recent interview, recognizes that Holzman had a unique ability to articulate the thoughts and feelings of teenagers.

From a parent's perspective, "My So-Called Life" offered some extraordinary insights into how different the teens viewed the world than the grown-ups.

The DVD's best episode opened with Angela having dyed her hair a bright shade of red. Crimson glow, which irritated just about everyone who reacted with resentment and anger – mother of the year Patty Chase.

Angela's voice-overs were remarkably revealing in this regard from the perspective that she wasn't always the smartest person in the room, but rather the subject of watching her cope with a hard-hearted real-to-her observation. "Sometimes I think if my mother wasn't so good at pretending to be happy she might be better at actually being happy."

The DVD set does justice to the series, chronicling its on-again-off-again history at ABC, its revival in reruns on MTV and its continued hold on viewers. Of all the actors, except Leto, appear to have interviews about themselves on the show, each revealing true feelings they were doing something special when they were filming "My So-Called Life."

As for this parent, I too, survived two teenaged daughters (seeing them face to junior high and high school, and probably have "My So-Called Life" to thank, for helping me get through their teenage years.

Coheed continues story with new LP

By Erin Pinkosky
Arts & Living Writer

If it takes ambition to put together swirling fantasy rock operas spread out over a five-album arc then Coheed and Cambria might be the most ambitious band on the planet – or at least the only one with a record deal. There aren't too many bands these days whose music harks back to the grandiose, proggy rock of groups such as Queensryche and Rush, but Coheed and Cambria have the sound and the style nailed.

There's a sprawling, sometimes silly sci-fi mythology embedded in the songs conceived by singer Claudio Sanchez and the Warped Tours vets surround Sanchez' upper-register vocals with epically deep riffs and hooks. Good Apollo, I'm Burning Star IV, Volume Two: No World Tomorrow, which debuted at No. 9 on the Billboard 200 album chart, has two tracks that clock in at more than four minutes and a third almost one long. To top it off, the story line for each of the series' five records – The Amory Wars – is being recorded out of order. No World for Tomorrow is the second part of the fourth chapter in the band's [illegible] with the first chapter [illegible]. It is also set to be recorded [illegible].

this year for this tour coming up. But none of the music is related, you know what I mean?

We put together a set that the crowd will be happy with because the story's there. But the fact is, we are a rock band and we can be enjoyed purely just for our music in the first place. It's really just an addition for fans who want to get involved and have a really cool thing to look into with the story line.

Q: How was it making the album this time around?

A: We went through quite a few trials and tribulations in the past year. There was a certain point where we basically just left a tour that was booked, and our drummer and bass player just kind of split because of their own issues and things that were going on with them. When that happened we had a big question mark hovering above our heads as to whether this was going to be a band anymore. But Claudio and I have been playing in bands together since we were like 12. So we decided that either way, we were going to continue to play, whether it be Coheed and Cambria or not.

Q: How did that change the recording process?

A: For the first time in a long time, Claudio and I literally would sit down and put songs down together. A good example is "The End Complete." We just sat and wrote that song together, just sitting there, like the music was all put together like in a day. And then, of course, Chris the drummer had a big part in it because we would have these song ideas and we would strike them and Claudio would just send them over the Internet to him and he would lay down drums and send them back and then we'd get together and we'd have something to rehearse. A couple of songs were like that, just working together, which was really cool for us to revisit that side of our friendship where we could just sit.

Q: So what happens after Coheed and Cambria releases the fifth album? Is that the end of the story and the band?

A: We have a lot of choices. There are so many different parts to this mythology that Claudio has with his story that we could still go in that direction and continue in some other way. Or we could just release a rock record. Or we could go in some other direction. I'm not worried about it. I know that this band will be able to do whatever we want to. I know the people that enjoy our band, the hard-core fans, will be happy no matter what because we're going to still continue to do what we do.

Q: Does Claudio ever come to you with a piece of the story where you just want to ask him, "What IS this?"

A: To be honest, especially now, with everything that's on this album, I went through everything in the past year. So it's like, when I know what experiences are coming out in the lyrics that tie into the story but are so close to the reality of things that have gone on, I completely understand.

Because this album really has so much to do with everything we've been through in this past year, and everything that he's been through, and because we've been friends for so many years, I can tell what he's talking about. And I can even tell from prior albums because, when you're really close to somebody, you know when they're talking about themselves.

Coheed and Cambria base their songs after a series of comic books by lead singer Claudio Sanchez. Sanchez bases the contents of his songs on real life events, but slightly exagerated.

New box set of 'Family Guy' released

The latest DVD set of "Family Guy" includes a lunch box, ping pong paddles and poker chips. The set will cost around 100 dollars.

By Diane Wehts
Newsday

Family Guy" never does anything halfway or even three-quarters. It's whole-hog for the adult cartoon set in Quahog, R.I.

So when Fox Home Entertainment releases a "Family Guy" DVD gift set, it doesn't just collect all the episodes (has far released 90 shows on the 16 discs included in five previous DVD volumes). And it doesn't only add the straight-to-DVD movie "Stewie Griffin: The Untold Story," plus a bonus disc of new material including deleted scenes, recording booth footage, storyboards and guest star interviews.

Oooooh, nooooo. The "Family Guy Freakin' Party Pack" (just out at a list price of $150, widely discounted to the $100 range) is a chunky, clear plastic lunchbox with blue metal corner bumpers and yellow side handles. It is crammed to the gills with playtime paraphernalia, character-face ping pong paddles with matching balls and net, series-themed poker chips, dice and playing cards and a nifty zippered Stewie CD case holding all 18 precious discs.

It certainly adds up to, as the set's disc-shaped contents booklet proclaims, "uncensored pee-in-your-pants fun!" The Fox DVD press release lies not when it promises, "Now, audiences can relive every offensive and outrageous moment from the past eight years, including all of Peter's adventures at the Drunken Clam, Brian's foray into the adult-film industry, Stewie's plots for world domination and more."

Obviously, "Family Guy" is not a cartoon for kiddies. Series creator Seth MacFarlane made that clear from the first episode, which premiered on Fox after 1999's Super Bowl XXXIII (Denver's John Elway wins the big one a second straight time). In case you're wondering whether this new DVD party pack is suitable for your little family guy, here's a little hint from the TV.com synopsis of that premiere adventure, "Death Has a Shadow."

"After Peter heavily drinks at a bachelor party, even though he told Lois he would not, he gets fired from his job at the Happy-Go-Lucky toy factory for being hung over. Peter soon applies for welfare, but after a mix up, gets sent a check for $150,000. Eventually, Lois finds out, and Peter decides to return the money by dumping it from a blimp at the Super Bowl. He is arrested as a result."

Father knows best? Not in this subversive gagfest

Humorist is no James Frey

By Robert K. Elder
Chicago Tribune

It has been 15 years since humorist David Sedaris stepped with pointy, elfin shoes into the national spotlight with "Santaland Diaries," his public radio account of his stint as Macy's Christmas elf.

In quick succession, Sedaris found himself a regular contributor to radio's "This American Life," a best-selling author ("Naked" and "Me Talk Pretty One Day") and a frequent contributor to The New Yorker and GQ. David Letterman was so smitten that he invited Sedaris to do a rare, on-air reading.

In March, Sedaris also found himself in a dust-up with The New Republic, which tried to fact-check his stories and paint him as a James Frey-like fabulist. A few months later, the magazine itself came under scrutiny for publishing three "Baghdad Diaries," written by an American soldier under a pseudonym. Army officials investigated and called the columns "false." The New Republic conceded one geographical error but stands behind the accounts.

But more on that in a moment. Sedaris splits his time between residences in London and Paris, when he's not on the road reading.

Below, he talks about not smoking, applying for British citizenship, and not writing about his niece.

Question: When we talked about this a few years ago, you said smoking helped control some of your compulsive tendencies. Have any resurfaced?

Answer: When I very first stopped smoking. They say the best way to stop smoking is to move, and if you can't move, move your furniture. So, I went to Tokyo to quit. I went for three months. At first, it wasn't old habits that came back to me, it was new and more insidious ones.

Q: Such as?

A: Such as really concentrating on a muscle in my leg, until I basically could cripple myself. I was hobbling. I could do it in my neck as well ... just completely focusing on it. I was in pain. But that kind of went away. It is pretty amazing how quickly you feel better. It's amazing how quickly your skin changes. I was gray, now my skin has colors to it.

I just quit so I could stay at nice hotels. Generally, I'm on tour two months out of the year, and all the good hotels have gone non-smoking.

Q: You recently said that you're not anti-smoking; that, in fact, you would vote for Barack Obama because he was a smoker.

A: I would. It's funny that when you quit smoking, people assume that you've immediately become intolerant.

Q: Why aren't you on camera for "This American Life's" TV series on Showtime?

A: I'm just incredibly uncomfortable in front of a camera. Incredibly uncomfortable. On the radio, you don't have to worry about what you look like. I have really crummy teeth.

On the radio, it's one thing. ... There was a time, and maybe we're still in that time, when people would say, "Wait a minute. What's that guy doing on the radio? That's not a radio voice." I think, especially on TV, people are gonna say, "What's the guy doing on the television?"

So that was it, just my own discomfort. I can't imagine it changing. If anything, it gets worse as I get older.

Q: Do you have any new perspective on The New Republic article?

A: Well, correct me if I'm wrong, but my understanding is that they have a guy who's reporting from Iraq, who's a soldier. Well, it turns out that his reports aren't necessarily true. So therefore, the deal is, if you're reporting from a war zone, it's OK to exaggerate. But if you're writing about guitar lessons you took from a midget in the 5th grade, every single word has to be true. That was what I got from it.

I've been asked in 1,000 interviews: "Do you exaggerate in your stories?"

And I've always said, "Yes." I don't understand why it would be news when somebody does says it.

Q: But, at the time, people were hanging James Frey (author of "A Million Little Pieces") out to dry for fabrication. What was your initial reaction to the piece?

A: I guess it was, "Who cares?" Even with the James Frey stuff. In his book, he basically says, "I'm a (messed) up alcoholic." And then people said, "That (messed) up alcoholic lied to us!"

Well, that's what (messed) up alcoholics do.

Q: Has it made you think about labeling future works differently, perhaps as fiction?

A: They just want something to put on the back of the book so people will know how to shelve it. Not that that necessarily does any good because my last book ("Dress Your Family in Corduroy and Denim") ended up in the sewing section.

"Essay," I suppose, would be the closest. But it wouldn't really matter to me. I've never gotten up and said, "Every single word of this is true."

David Sedaris has been published in a variety of newspapers and magazines such as The New Yorker and GQ.

the game. "We put ourselves in an immediate hole, and you know, we're fighting uphill the rest of the day. We eventually got it back to even, gave up one big pass play in overtime, and that was the difference in the game."

In the first half, every positive yard gained seemed like a major accomplishment for either team, as the Rams took a 6-2 lead into halftime following a pair of field goals, including a short, 23-yarder into the brutal wind.

Nearly every attempt to send the ball through the air proved absolutely futile, and the combination of cold temperatures and considerable rain made the football extremely slick, causing four fumbles in the first half alone.

Rhode Island jumped out to an early lead with a 26-yard field goal one minute, 18 seconds into the first quarter. The first offensive play of the game was an end-around to Rasheed Rancher. Running right to left, Rancher put the ball on the ground shortly after taking the handoff from Coen, and the Rams recovered on the UMass 13.

The Rams went three-and-out on the possession, gaining four yards on two run plays and an incomplete pass, but URI kicker Bryan Giannecchini easily put the ball through the uprights with the wind at his back.

UMass responded the only way they could in the first half, getting fortunate with a safety. On another Rams three-and-out, Rhode Island lined up to punt, but the snap went over the head of Giannecchini, who doubles as the team's punter. Giannecchini recovered the ball and was tackled in the end zone by Keiron Brown to close the score to 3-2, URI.

The Rams pulled further away in the second quarter, scoring the only points in the game that were earned going against the wind. Quarterback D.J. Stefkovich, playing in place of an injured Derek Cassidy, marched URI 74 yards down the field in 14 plays, consuming 6:32 of the clock in a drive that resulted in a field goal. The teams would head for the locker rooms with an unorthodox 6-2 score in favor of the Rams at half-time.

The only score in the third quarter was by UMass wide receiver Victor Cruz, scoring the first collegiate points of his career and it was another safety, making the score 6-4.

Much like the last two-pointer, a bad snap to Giannecchini forced the punter to react quickly. The snap was high, but Giannecchini, already in his own end zone, got a hand on the ball, reined it in, and scrambled across the end zone, evading a few UMass defenders before Cruz eventually brought him down, falling out of the back of the end zone.

In the fourth, the offensive fistfuls continued. Neither team could muster a sustained drive, much less a first down. UMass was an abysmal 2-for-16 on third down conversions, and URI wasn't much better at 5-for-19.

The only score in the fourth was a game-tying – and record tying – third safety, this one by defensive tackle Kyle Harrington, but the Minutemen came within inches of a game-changing touchdown.

Punting was so difficult, Rhode Island coach Tim Stowers realized in the second half he was better off going for it on every fourth down, rather than punt into the wind, as the ball usually ended up back near the line of scrimmage.

On a fourth-and-six from their own 36-yard line, the Rams went for the first down, but running back Jimmy Hughes was stopped after two yards.

Starting from the Rams' 38, Brown put the ball in running back Matt Lawrence's hands nine consecutive times, avoiding the hazards of trying to pass in such a strong wind.

Already in field goal range, the third quarter was winding down, and so were the Minutemen's chances to score with the wind at their backs. With that in mind, Brown played the third quarter like the fourth, conserving every second he could.

Six yards by Lawrence, clock stopped due to a URI injury, 1:50 left. Two more yards, then the big one, 12 yards by Lawrence, pushing the pile and surpassing 1,000 yards for the season – 1:31 remaining. Up the middle for three yards, then off-tackle left for seven yards to the 8-yard line. With 40 seconds left, the Rams called timeout, trying to reset themselves.

Lawrence gained three more, pushing the line of scrimmage to the 5. UMass timeout with 25 seconds left in the third. Lawrence goes up the middle again for two yards, clock running.

The UMass coaches frantically tried to call timeout with 10 seconds left, but the referees were trying to break up the pile of players and spot the ball. Finally, as the clock ticked down to zero, Coen got the timeout call. The refs put four seconds back on the clock – enough for one more try at the end zone.

Lawrence was stopped at the line of scrimmage. Fourth down, fourth quarter. The teams moved to the north end zone, with the wind howling in their faces. No longer with the wind advantage, Brown opted for the touchdown, foregoing a chance to take a one-point lead with a field goal attempt.

Lawrence got hit in the backfield, escaped one defender, stiff-armed another, but was finally overtaken at the 1-yard line. With the turnover on downs, the Rams' offense took over with 15 minutes of football left and a two-point advantage.

That's when Harrington revived his teammates with a huge defensive play. After Stefkovich fumbled on first down, recovered by running back Jerrell Jones at the two, he dropped back, slipped in the mud, and went down in the end zone, 6-6 tie.

Throughout the fourth quarter, Brown insisted on passing the ball. Coen finished 7-of-22 passing for 22 yards and two interceptions. Neither team could score, and the game went into overtime.

"We thought we'd be able to run certain plays in our offense," Brown said. "When you look at our execution numbers, we were ineffective, so there's a problem there. But we had a hard time sustaining anything."

The overtime period came down to a single play, the only real passing success of the day, save for a 26-yard reception by URI tight end Akil Chester. On the first play of the extra session, Stefkovich hit Hughes in the seam with a perfectly thrown ball. Hughes made the catch, falling down at the 4-yard line. Three quarterback sneaks later, Rhode Island was up by six, 12-6. Continuing their special teams woes, URI missed the extra point, giving the Minutemen a chance to win it on their possession.

Instead, four incomplete passes by Coen spelled the end for the Maroon and White. Two dropped balls by Cruz and a bad pass to Jeremy Horne, scattered around two Lawrence rushes totaling 12 yards, were capped by Coen's second interception in the end zone, and an eruption on the Rams sideline.

Regarding the decision to go for the touchdown at the end of third quarter instead of kicking a field goal with the wind still at their backs, Brown said his players wanted six.

"I just went with my players on that one," Brown said. "They felt they could get [the touchdown]. It would have been a nail in the coffin. We've gone for it on fourth down a lot and had success. That's one of many calls you reconsider in this football game when you lose a tight one like that."

Lawrence rushed 24 times for 83 yards, while Hughes gained 93 yards on 29 carries for the Rams. Stefkovich was just 3-for-10 passing for 62 yards. UMass had just four penalties for 26 yards in the game, one of its lowest totals of the season.

Saturday's loss to Rhode Island marked the first defeat in the Colonial Athletic Association for UMass coach Don Brown since 2005. The Minutemen return home this weekend to face New Hampshire.

Heavy winds lead to history

Minutemen in a 2005 tilt against Albany.

The first two safeties came on bad snaps by freshman longsnapper Steffan Lazerow. The first bad snap sailed well over URI punter Bryan Giannecchini's head, and went 31 yards backwards into the end zone for the safety – recorded by Keiron Brown.

The second one was similar to the first, but this time the ball slipped through Giannecchini's fingers and Victor Cruz took him down in the end zone for the safety.

With the rain consistently pouring down all game, the field became extremely muddy and that led to the third UMass safety. With the ball on its own 3-yard line, URI quarterback D.J. Stefkovich slipped and fell in the end zone, giving Kyle Harrington the final safety – tying the game at 6-6 early in the fourth quarter.

The action actually picked up directly following the safeties. After the first safety, URI booted the free kick high into the air, and the wind took it back – and almost into the arms of a Rams player. A massive pile fighting for the ball was removed, and the Minutemen had the ball.

The following free kick was also eventful. The Minutemen smartly called for a fair catch and the Rams incurred a 15-yard penalty when they interfered with the returner – giving the Minutemen terrific field position at the URI 27-yard line. But Coen was intercepted in the end zone four plays later.

The weather had a huge impact on the punting, as well. The wind was so strong, that UMass punter Brett Arnold – who entered the game as the second-leading punter in the A-10 – recorded a punt in the first quarter that almost went backwards. The ball landed a few yards past the line of scrimmage and took a bounce backwards – and went down in the books as a punt of negative 1-yard punt.

There were three punts in the game under 10 yards, including two 6-yard punts by each punter. On Arnold's next punt after the 1-yarder – this time with the wind – he blasted a 59-yard punt.

With the wins making that much of a difference, neither Stefkovich nor UMass' Liam Coen had any success throwing the ball. Coen (7-of-22 for 22 yards and two INTs) and Stefkovich (3-for-10 for 62 yards) combined for just three passing first downs all game.

Both teams were forced to consistently run the ball with the wind and rain, and that resulted in consistent fumbles for both sides – especially Rhode Island. The Rams fumbled six times, losing two of them. The Minutemen added two fumbles of their own, losing one.

With passing almost not an option, both defenses stacked the line of scrimmage to stop the run. This made it very difficult to sustain drives and pick up key third downs, and the statistics certainly back that up. UMass was 2-of-16 on third downs, while URI was 5-of-19.

Since punting against the wind almost made no sense, the teams combined to go for it on fourth down nine times (seven by the Rams).

"I'm very proud of our coaching staff and our football team for doing an outstanding job and finding a way to win the game," Stowers said.

Despite the win, the 26-year coach probably hopes he never has to endure or witness a game like that again.

Chances are, he never will. But you never know.

The next game you watch there could be four safeties.

wrist shot toward the net and it snuck through Braithwaite's legs.

The goal was his second of the season and first of two on the night. With the score 4-0, Lecomte snuck behind the Warrior defense and waited for a teammate to spot him. Sophomore defenseman Justin Braun sent the puck to him and he tucked it around Braithwaite.

Paul Dainton is another of those young players and performed equally well in earning his second collegiate win, making 22 saves, late in the third period. Merrimack sophomore Matt Jones broke in alone on Dainton. He skated in and tried to beat Dainton to his glove side, but the young net minder easily knocked it away.

Sophomore goaltender Dan Meyers was in uniform for the first time since the opening weekend after suffering a groin injury, but Dainton made his fifth consecutive start.

The UMass offense made Dainton's life easier with its five goals, including its second shorthanded tally of the season. The first one came against Saint Lawrence on Oct. 13 when Chris Davis jumped a play. Davis had a hand in this one as well, but Berry scored the goal.

Davis stole the puck from Sadlowski and used the boards to knock it ahead to Berry, who skated into the Merrimack zone. A Warrior defender got in front of Berry, but when he cut toward the slot the defender fell and he skated in alone. The puck on his forehand when he entered the zone, he switched to his backhand and drew Braithwaite before going back to the forehand and stuffing it past his glove.

Despite the success on the penalty kill, Cahoon was unhappy with the amount and nature of penalties.

"We were very fortunate to get through the second period. We were undisciplined and took too many penalties and spent most of the period killing penalties," Cahoon said. "We did a good job killing the penalties and actually got a shorthanded goal. The period didn't please me because most of the time, those types of circumstances result in negative things."

Notes

Senior Matt Burto scored UMass's fourth goal to extend his point-scoring streak to four games. ... Burto, Ortiz and Lecomte are tied for the team lead with three goals. ... Berry was plus-4 on the night. ... UMass is now 36-0-1 in its last 37 games when scoring four or more goals. ... The Minutemen have won eight consecutive games against Merrimack at the Mullins Center. ... Freshman Brian Keane and Merrimack center Rob Ricci received 10-minute misconducts for their roles in a fight in front of the UMass net late in the third period.

The score would hold at 2-0 until halftime, but St. Joe's came out firing in the second half. Jen Wrubleski scored four minutes into the second half when the ball was rolling around in front of the cage. It was the freshman star's 10th goal of the season.

St. Joe's pressured the Minutewoman defense the rest of the game, but they weren't able to get an equalizer. Late in the second half, UMass had to play one player down for seven minutes after Makaela Potts received a yellow card.

"We're really trying to work on her positivity and staying on the field because when she's on, she has a huge impact on our success," Sowry said.

With no time left on the clock, the Hawks received one final chance to tie the game, but their shot off a penalty corner went wide, and the Minutewomen left the field going to the NCAA tournament for the first time since 2001.

Kristina DiRosario was recognized as the top player in the A-10 tournament. Along with seniors Erin O'Brien and Nicole Phelan, DiRosario brings experience to the Minutewoman backfield.

"She was an absolute rock in both games," Sowry said. "She's been a rock all season, so she got a nice reward there."

The Spiders (6-13, 5-3 A-10) defeated UMass in the conference championship game in 2004 and 2005, but Friday's matchup was the second time the teams met this season. This time UMass added a conference tournament victory to their 1-0 regular season win on Oct. 21.

Cher King got the Maroon and White on the scoreboard with her team-leading eighth goal of the season five minutes before halftime. King took a pass from DiRosario off a penalty corner and found the left corner of the net to break the scoreless tie.

UMass averaged slightly over one goal a game this season and King is a player they need to provide offense. Sowry says the sophomore brings a new dynamic to the team when she's in the game, but says King must work on her consistency for next season, as she is currently unable to play entire games.

After Richmond evened the score at one just 1:46 into the second half, UMass quickly responded with its second goal. Bonaccorsi received a chance off a penalty corner and she converted her fourth goal off a corner this season. She has five goals overall. DiRosario and Parker assisted on their second goals of the game.

We were able to stick to the game plan," Sowry said. "Our penalty corner unit that did some phenomenal and was solid [on] defending goals. We absolutely deserved it. ... Special shout-out to another redshirt junior [Parker] who has been a second line threat this season."

The Spiders once again outshot the UMass attack, but Parker and goalkeeper Becky Cleaveland were up to the challenge. Cleaveland finished with seven saves and Parker made three saves against Richmond and one against St. Joe's. Her record now stands at 9-7, and she has gone 8-2 since starting the season 1-5.

Walker fights back from injury to play

By Steve Games
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts redshirt senior goalkeeper Kristin Walker thought her season was over last month, however she made a surprising return to the field for the season finale against George Washington.

During a conference match-up against Fordham on Oct. 19, Walker injured her knee when she collided with an opposing player. After the game UMass coach Jim Rudy was devastated that her season ended early, Rudy had coached her since she was a freshman. With only a month left in the season, Walker and the training staff didn't think she would ever play at UMass again.

"No definitely not, not from what our trainers said," Walker said about playing in another game after the injury.

Last Thursday, Walker and sophomores Sydney Stoll and Cristina Adams went to the orthopedic doctor to get examined for their injuries. Stoll broke her collarbone against Rhode Island, while Adams suffered a high ankle sprain against La Salle. Walker and Adams received some good news from the doctor.

"Adams and I both got cleared to play, which was a very surprising thing," Walker said. "They just explained it to me and it was great and my hopes changed 100 percent."

It's been five years since Walker came in as a walk on for the team. She came in as a third-string goalkeeper and worked her way to a full-time starter for four years.

"I have great appreciation for Walker, she came here to be [third string] and she knew it," Rudy said. "No scholarship money and she knew that coming in. She said I want to come to this school and I want to play for you. I said that's the type of person we want to have."

Rudy didn't address the team any differently because of senior day. He didn't want to add more pressure to the game. Coming into the last two games the Minutewomen knew they didn't make the playoffs, however they wanted to finish the season with two more wins. They almost accomplished that by defeating Richmond on Friday, 2-1, in double overtime and tying GW, 2-2, in double overtime.

"We didn't make the playoffs and that's fine, but if we're just going to give up then that tells a lot about a team," Walker said. "The fact that we didn't and we fought to the end really showed who we were."

Walker, a co-captain for the team, showed that she could still play even with a large knee brace. The brace protected her right knee and restricted her mobility, however she was able to make a couple of diving saves to keep her team in the game.

"I was just cautious because I knew I wasn't able to do [what] I usually do, but overall I think it went well and I was happy with what I was able to do," Walker said.

With the restriction on her right leg, she used her left leg to pass off to her teammates. Before the game she let her teammates know that she wanted them to kick the ball to her left foot although she thinks she could have used her right leg, if needed.

"It kind of worked out," Walker said. "[The team] knew and they really paid attention and did a good job."

Walker played all 110 minutes and made six saves. In her four years as a starter, Walker compiled 373 saves. She is grateful to have played in the last game; she didn't want her season to end a month early.

"I just assumed that it was going to be the end of my season a couple weeks ago and I think this is huge that I was able to come out and play this last game," Walker said. "I mean I'm sad that soccer is over, but you have to grow and I think it will be fun to come back and watch them play."

Even though she was at UMass for half a decade, as she looks back on her career, she feels that it went by too fast.

"Coming into college, everyone says it's going to fly by and I never believed them," she said. "But standing here now and saying that –being here for five years – it's definitely flown by."

UM plays to tie in final game

Seniors conclude careers under Rudy in double-overtime draw

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

It seemed like the seniors just didn't want their collegiate careers to end, as both of the Massachusetts women's soccer team's games this weekend went into double overtime. The Minutewomen tied George Washington, 2-2, yesterday after beating Richmond, 2-1, Friday.

UMass	2
GW	2

UMass finished the season 9-6-2 4-6-1 in the Atlantic 10 – and its seniors saw their college soccer days come to a close against the Colonials (8-9-1, 4-6-1 A-10).

"You've got to give [GW] a lot of credit. We took a lot of shots on goal," said UMass coach Jim Rudy. "Our kids gave it their all. They gave everythi..g they had. Two overtime games, with our injury situation. I'm proud of them."

UMass scored first when it registered an all-senior goal in the 39th minute. Kaelyn Caldwell's free kick in GW territory went to Britt Canfield, who took it on the left side of the field and fired off a shot that was blocked by Colonial goalkeeper Amie Kern. Jenny Roehrig gathered the deflection and gave it a boot. The shot was blocked by Kern, but the retry found its way to the back of the net.

There was a bit of controversy in the Colonials' first tally. What appeared to be a great save by Kristin Walker was nullified on a UMass tripping penalty in the 58th minute. Kerry Philbin put the ensuing penalty kick past Walker to tie the game.

In the 59th minute, sophomore Cristina Adams received a through ball from midfield and tried to outrun some GW defenders. The ball made its way to junior Vanessa Patry, who tried to dribble it forward. One of her taps flew through the air and over Kern's head. Kern attempted to chase after the ball, but it sneaked in past the left post.

It looked as though UMass would pull away with the victory until GW tied the score in the 66th minute. After Walker blocked an initial shot, sprawling to the ground, the Colonials' Dara Rosen wound up and launched a shot into the middle of the net.

After two uneventful overtime periods, the game ended with two fatigued teams, but no victor.

"I would have liked to win our last game. Again, we had more injuries and we hit like a million posts and the keeper [Kern] played really, really well," Caldwell said. "We really came together as a team and played hard, so it was good. I'm happy to be a part of the team."

The injuries continued for UMass, as Katie Ruggles suffered a knee injury and Alyssa Visconti re-aggravated an upper groin pull she has been nursing.

On Friday, the Minutewomen pulled off a dramatic 2-1 win in double overtime against Richmond (7-11-2, 6-4-1 A-10). Canfield nailed a hard turnaround shot over the goalkeeper's head with less than four minutes left in the second OT.

"I've been on a scoring drought for some time so it just feels good to get the ball in the back of the net again," Canfield said.

Canfield finished the weekend with a team-leading eight goals and 10 assists.

The Spiders scored the first goal in the 16th minute when Sarah Hilt bested UMass sophomore goalkeeper Lauren Luckey. The initial shot by Anne Hazel was stopped by Luckey, but Hilt put away the rebound. UMass tied the game just over 25 minutes into the second half when, at 65:11, Canfield received a pass from freshman Kelsey Anderson on the right side, dribbled and took a shot. Richmond goalkeeper Kate Hudson leaped to swat it down, but the ball deflected off her hand and into the lower left corner.

In the game's 107th minute, the exhausted Minutewomen put the game away. It was Canfield once again, as she scored on a pass from sophomore Jacquelyn Desjardins for the winning goal.

"She played awesome, like usual," Caldwell said. "It's about time. I think that she's just been getting some unlucky hits. She's had a lot of posts in the past couple of games and so she definitely got what she deserves in getting both goals."

"My team this year is amazing. We're so full of energy," Canfield said. "We're all tight. We're just like a close little family. I'm definitely going to miss that."

Senior captain Jenny Roehrig and the Minutewomen concluded their season Sunday in a 2–2 tie against George Washington at Rudd Field. UMass finished the injury riddled season with a 9–6–2 record.

Striking first important for Minutemen

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

In any sport, once a team takes a lead, there can be a tendency for a player's mindset to switch to a defensive focus, instead of continuing what the team does best. On the soccer field, it can be an even harder habit to break, due to the infrequency of scoring.

But the Massachusetts men's soccer team avoided that fate this weekend with a pair of victories over Atlantic 10 opponents. In matches against Fordham and LaSalle, the Minutemen scored first and successfully preserved the lead.

UMass coach Sam Koch understands the importance of getting the first goal in terms of its impact on the game, but he also knows his team shouldn't alter its style of play at any point in the match.

"Just because we score – it doesn't mean the game changes," Koch said. "The next five minutes are where a lot of goals are scored on you. It's very important that you keep focus to deny them opportunities."

After the goal, Koch told sophomore forward Bryan Hogan to play forward and that it was a 0-0 game, in an effort to remind his team not to get too comfortable with the lead.

And the team heeded Koch's advice, as it continued to create genuine scoring chances after going ahead.

Against Fordham, UMass created 11 shots after its goal five minutes into the second period, including several near goals by sophomore midfielder Mark DeSantis.

Koch emphasized the importance of making smart decisions with the ball after the goal, but encouraged his players to continue their pressure on offense – especially his offensive-minded midfielders.

"[Koch] told me that he didn't want me to dribble through people," freshman midfielder Ben Arikian said. "He wanted me to get it in the corner and try to hold it and try to get a cross. Just play it safe instead of trying to do everything on our own."

The performances come in contrast to the team's previous game, a 3-1 loss to Rhode Island on Oct. 27. In that match, the Maroon and White scored within the first minute, but allowed URI to score three unanswered goals.

The Minutemen failed to create more chances on offense after striking first and played much of the remainder of the match on defense. In fact, the team managed zero shots after the goal and only two in the second.

"Against Rhode Island, since we went up 1-0, we relaxed and let off the gas," Koch said. "We kept the tempo going for the next five minutes, then slowly but surely, Rhode Island started to take control of the game. You have to make them get out of their game and chase you. We just didn't do it."

One of the ways the Minutemen create offensive chances is through the counterattack. This strategy involves taking advantage of the opponent's positioning by quickly turning a defensive stop into an opportunity on offense.

The wet conditions and the strong play of the Ram defense limited UMass's success on the counterattack in that match.

"We normally try to use the [counter attack] to our advantage," Arikian said. "But against Rhode Island it was tough, since they have a good defense."

But against Fordham, the Minutemen turned several defensive stands into scoring chances. In the 70th minute, UMass stifled a Fordham corner kick and quickly moved the ball up field. The play resulted in a shot from freshman midfielder Stuart Amick that slipped past the left side of the net.

Though the Minutemen ceded a goal against La Salle Friday in the final minute of play, the team had scored its second goal five minutes earlier as a result of continuing to pressure on offense.

UMass nets pair of conference victories

0 lead. Rappaport and Cook received assists on the goal. Rappaport now leads the team with three.

Against Rhode Island last weekend, the Minutemen scored early and the forwards immediately began playing more cautiously. Rather than looking for opportunities, they tried to take time off the clock and eventually allowed the Rams easy chances, which led to two second half goals and a lopsided 3-1 score.

Moments after Mike DeSantis' goal Sunday, his brother, Mark DeSantis dribbled into the right flank and made space for himself. With Bryan Hogan poorly marked in the penalty area, he crossed the ball into the box where Hogan got a head on it, but Hajducky got to it.

Koch screamed to his forwards after the score to play as if the score was still 0-0. With two underclassmen leading your scoring attack and another Arikian as your primary offensive midfielder, it's essential to remind them not to stop playing.

Hajducky kept the Rams in the game with five second-half saves. Aside from the stop of the Hogan header, an Arikian corner led to a chance for redshirt junior Chris Brown.

Brown got open in the box and tried to redirect the ball down, but Hajducky scooped it off the turf.

Down 1-0, a UMass miscommunication in the defensive third gave Fordham its best chance of the game. Steve Woitch struck the ball, but didn't get it low enough and Simmons dove to his right and deflected it before it was cleared.

The win over Fordham was especially satisfying for Cook, Greg Cirillo and Trevor Singer as it was Senior Day. Cook and Cirillo both started and have all season, but Singer has missed most of the season with an injury.

Rappaport, Brown and Simmons are all redshirt juniors and have a year of eligibility remaining, but are academically seniors. Rappaport mentioned that it is unlikely that he will return next season.

Rhode blocked

UMass running back Matt Lawrence and the Minutemen struggled offensively against Rhode Island, losing 12-6 in overtime Saturday at Meade Stadium in Kingston, R.I. for their first conference loss of the season. The weather had a large impact in the game, with hard rain and heavy wind gusts exceeding 40 MPH.

UM drops first CAA game of season in OT

KINGSTON, R.I. — Saturday's contest between the Massachusetts football team and the Rhode Island Rams was meant to be quarterback Liam Coen's homecoming.

The final collegiate game he would play in his home state, Coen was set to pass Todd Bankhead on the UMass all-time passing list and set himself firmly in the record books as the greatest passer any UMass team has had under center.

UMass	6
URI	12

As it turned out, a record was set in the Colonial Athletic Association matchup, but it had nothing to do with passing. The Rams — and more so, Mother Nature prevented Coen and Company from accomplishing anything they had set out to do, save for tie an NCAA record with three safeties against Rhode Island.

Constant rain, temperatures in the mid-40s and an overpowering, consistent wind blowing to the south caused the UMass (7-2, 5-1 Colonial Athletic Association) offense to completely disappear. Depending on opportune defense and a pair of special teams gaffes by the Rams (2-7 1-5 CAA), the Minutemen stuck with their CAA rivals until overtime, when the Rams scored the only touchdown of the game and kept UMass out of the end zone, winning a rain-soaked thriller, 12-6, in front of 4,118 at Meade Stadium in Kingston, R.I.

"Nothing came easy out there on a day like today," UMass coach Don Brown said following KINGSTON, R.I. — It doesn't matter how many football games you've been to, you haven't seen it all.

But if you were fortunate enough – or unfortunate enough, considering the horrendous weather – to attend Saturday's game between Massachusetts and Rhode Island, you're that much closer.

Because maybe you've seen a football game with eight fumbles.

Maybe you've seen a game with winds so strong that a punt traveled negative yardage.

And maybe you've been to one of the few NCAA games when one team recorded three safeties.

But never have you been to a football game that has ever featured all of these things, and a whole lot more.

That is, unless you went to Saturday's game between Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

"We feel very fortunate to be able to beat the No. 3 football team in the country," URI coach Tim Stowers said after the game.

Considering the cold weather coupled with the hard rain and gusts of at least 40 MPH wind, those involved in the game probably felt fortunate just to head back to their respective locker rooms.

But the heated press conference room was no solace to UMass coach Don Brown and Matt Lawrence, who appeared dejected after their first conference loss of the season.

"Nothing came easy out there in a day like today," Brown said in his opening statement to the media. "Special teams were an absolute nightmare all day long. I thought we did a decent job in handling the elements, but we just didn't do enough on a day like today."

What UMass (7-2, 5-1 Colonial Athletic Association) did do was record three safeties on defense in the game, a feat only accomplished one other time in Football Championship Subdivision history — also by the Against Providence last Friday, the Massachusetts hockey team took 21 shots. UMass coach Don Cahoon demanded that his team take more. He didn't want his players to take bad shots for the sake of taking shots; he simply demanded that they send more pucks to the net.

One night later, UMass took 41 in a 3-3 tie against the Friars and it became a trend in Saturday's 5-1 win over Merrimack (4-3-0, 1-3-0 Hockey East). The Minutemen (3-2-2, 1-1-2 Hockey East) peppered sophomore net minder Andrew Braithwaite with 35 shots and forced more scoring chances than they had in any game this season.

"We have to get more shots, that's something our coaches have put an emphasis on," sophomore winger Will Ortiz said. "One of our team goals tonight was that we wanted to get 35 shots and I think we actually had 35.

"The coaches just emphasized that we need to get pucks on the net. A couple games ago we didn't even reach 30 total shots."

Ortiz took two of those 35 shots on Saturday; the second of which resulted in his third goal of the season. A scrum in front of the net forced the puck into the air and Ortiz batted it by Braithwaite, giving UMass a 2-0 lead.

The win was the first Hockey East win of the season for the Minutemen, who played to ties against UMass-Lowell and Providence in their first two home conference games. Their next action comes this weekend with matchups at Boston University on Friday and UMass-Lowell on Saturday.

Freshman Mike Lecomte got UMass started with a goal at 7:13 of the first period and finished the scoring with a tally at 6:05 of the third.

James Marcou stripped Merrimack defenseman Brandon Sadlowski and quickly found a streaking Lecomte, who blazed into the MC zone; Marcou trailed the play, setting up a 2-on-1 for the Minutemen. From the middle of the left face-off circle, Lecomte hesitated and Braithwaite peeked over at Marcou, anticipating the pass. Lecomte blistered a low

Koch and Co. defeat Rams, Explorers; improve positioning

By Joe Meloni

There was no shortage of back story to the Massachusetts men's soccer team's pair of games this weekend. Hit the link, thought on the mind of the Minutemen was that next weekend cannot be the end to their season.

UMass moved two steps closer to postseason, defeating Fordham, 1-0, Sunday and La Salle, 2-1, on Friday.

The Minutemen began A-10 play with three consecutive wins before dropping matches to Charlotte and Rhode Island. They are now in fourth place behind Saint Louis, Charlotte and URI with two games remaining. UMass ends its regular season next weekend with a trip to Philadelphia for matches with Saint Joseph's Friday and Temple Sunday.

Junior midfielder Mike DeSantis scored his second goal of the season in the 50th minute, and redshirt junior goalkeeper Zack Simmons made four second half saves, leading the Minutemen (10-6-0, 5-2-0 Atlantic 10) to the win over Fordham.

Another player who features primarily on defense got the UMass offense started against La Salle. Chris Brown got to a lob by freshman Ben Arikian off a free kick and directed it into the Explorer net. Sophomore Bryan Hogan added another to make it 2-0. La Salle's Ryan Richter added a goal in the 90th minute, but La Salle had no time to equalize.

The late goal frustrated the UMass defense and motivated them to work hard for a clean sheet Sunday.

"[Saturday], I felt much better. After the [win over La Salle], I was a bit down for giving up that goal in the last minute," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "Our guys were down, too, and, to be honest, that was the best thing. To see them upset that we gave up that goal at the end was a good sign of where our team is."

The Minutemen hadn't converted on a corner kick in more than a year when redshirt junior Doug Rappaport lined up for a set piece Sunday. Rappaport sent the ball into the penalty area and senior captain Kenny Cook headed it toward the back post to a streaking Mike DeSantis.

DeSantis didn't hesitate, lining the ball past Fordham goalkeeper Dan Haydock to give the Minutemen a 1-

It was evident from senior forward Etienne Brower's emphatic block in the first minute that the score was not going to be close. But for the Massachusetts men's basketball team, the goal of the game was to find continuity with the players on the floor and improve areas of weakness.

The Minutemen won their final exhibition game, 107-80, over Concordia Saturday at the Curry Hicks Cage. The team opens regular season play in the BTI Tip-Off Tournament in Iowa Friday through Sunday.

"We know what we need to work on," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "And we will — we have a week [until the regular season begins] and that's why we play these [exhibition] games."

UMass shot nearly an identical percentage from beyond the arc to its first exhibition game, making 14-3-pointers from 33 attempts Saturday.

"I wasn't happy with some of our decision making on passes and things like that," Ford said. "I thought we took some bad shots and I wasn't very happy with our offensive execution."

But the Minutemen's ability to quickly push the ball up the court was the difference against Concordia. UMass scored 35 points off turnovers, with 30 points on the fast break.

Ford limited the frequency of his substitutions compared to the first exhibition game in an effort to become more comfortable with player combinations. Ford limited his rotation to 13 players, including giving freshmen Papa Lo, Trey Lang and Matt Hill less than five minutes of work each.

"We're getting to know the spots each other likes on the floor," said senior forward Gary Forbes. "Some of us have been playing together for a few years now and we're trying to get to know the young guys."

One area of concern for the team heading into the regular season is its inability to control the frontcourt. Despite having a decided height advantage Saturday, the Minutemen only out-rebounded Concordia by one.

"The way we pushed the ball, we were out of rebounding position the way we're playing," Ford said. "We don't want to use that as an excuse, but we just need to get better at that."

Students choose bus rides over cars

By Stella Cernak
Collegian Staff

Motivated by the prospect of saving both money and the environment, an increasing number of University of Massachusetts students are leaving their cars at home and opting for free rides with UMass Transit and the Pioneer Valley Transportation Authority.

Compared to 2006, UMass Transit ridership was up by about eight and a half percent in July, about 14 percent in August and by about four percent in September, according to General Manager of UMass Transit Al Byam.

The PVTA also had increases in ridership this summer, citing a seven and a half percent increase in July and a four percent increase in August, according to the agency's figures. These increases are particularly rare in the summer months, as the number of riders usually decreases when students stop taking classes and workers take vacations. Byam and the PVTA director of marketing and public relations, Jill E. Holliday, feel the increase in riders has a lot to do with high gas prices.

The price of gas in Massachusetts, which averaged about $2.88 a gallon in July and $2.71 a gallon in August, stagnated at about $2.65 a gallon for most of September and October until a recent rise to $2.87, according to GasBuddy.com. Yet, Rideshare Coordinator at UMass Parking Services, Robert Hendry, feels that this sudden jump in prices has had little affect on those who drive to campus.

"Post Hurricane Katrina, we saw a change when prices really spiked, but gas hasn't gone up as much as that period," he said.

According to Hendry, 8,000 parking permits have been issued so far this year. The percentage of students that purchased remains about the same as last year, with 24 percent of freshmen parking their cars on campus. However, he does point out that the number of students bringing their cars to UMass has decreased over the past five years, as the number of freshmen who bought permits used to be around 35 percent. He connects this decrease with the cost and inconvenience of parking on campus, rather than rising gas prices.

Some students do not bring cars to UMass due to the high cost of parking permits, which has doubled in the past five years. While others, like first year transfer student, Danielle Lamontage, do not restrain from bringing their cars on campus for financial reasons, but due to shear inconvenience.

UMass student indicted

A Hampshire County Grand Jury returned an indictment against Murtaza Hanan Qutab, 20, of Holden, Mass on Oct. 30.

Qutab was charged with two counts of home invasion, one count of assault with intent to murder, one count of aggravated assault and battery with a dangerous weapon [baseball bat], one count of assault and battery with a dangerous weapon [knife], one count of armed robbery and one count of larceny from a building.

Qutab allegedly entered his former suite in McNamara Dormitory in the Sylvan Residential Area and hit a former suitemate in the head three times with an aluminum baseball bat. When someone came to separate the two, Qutab allegedly stabbed the interfering student in the hand following a brief struggle.

According to University of Massachusetts spokesman Ed Blaguszewski, Qutab then left the scene with two laptops, two cellular phones and an iPod. Shortly after leaving the building, Qutab was arrested on route nine in Belchertown.

The case has been much discussed on campus after both victims were unable to receive timely medical attention as first aid kits are not present in cluster offices on campus. Pre-med student Nellie Stevens called for first aid kits in cluster offices after she was unable to give aid to the student who was struck in the head with the bat when no rubber gloves were available to form a barrier between her hands and the victim's blood. She estimated that police arrived 10 minutes after the call was made to the University of Massachusetts Police Department.

Qutab is currently being held without the right to bail at Hampshire County House of Correction.

Going Green

By Will McGuinness
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Solid Waste Manager John Pepi doesn't necessarily turn trash to treasure; instead, he works with his staff at Tillson Farm to reduce the amount of waste and educate students on how they can dispose of trash responsibly.

The 1970's broached the notion of going green for the good of the environment, but Pepi said it was not until the mid-80s that municipalities took notice.

As landfills … well, filled, cities and towns were forced to create new ways to deal with trash and create restrictions for those using them.

This is where John Pepi steps in. When the town of Amherst severely limited UMass's use of its waste facilities in the early 90's, the University turned a former horse riding arena on Tillson Farm and converted it into a multi-million dollar recycling facility and now uses it to dispose of 3,500 tons of trash per year. The facility handles 400 tons of cardboard per year, 100-200 tons of computer

Digital Commonwealth hosts new Web portal for culture

By Joshua Wadovich
Collegian Staff

The Digital Commonwealth of Massachusetts, a gateway to digital assets hosted by Massachusetts cultural institutions, launched its new Web portal on Oct. 25.

The cultural institutions hosted by the Digital Commonwealth include libraries, museums, historical societies, archives, research institutions and other repositories of cultural heritage.

The Digital Commonwealth, often referred to as a "Web portal," is a site on which users can search the digital collections of member institutions throughout the state for manuscripts, images, historical documents and sound files from over 80 separate collections held by cultural organizations and libraries.

"This is a wonderful project that allows researchers to browse and search the digital collections of member institutions from our portal one-stop shopping from a single Web site," said Vivian Goldman, President of the Digital Commonwealth and Trustee at the Public Library of Brookline. "We now have over 100 members and as more institutions join this statewide effort by contributing their digital collections, the Digital Commonwealth will become increasingly rich and important to those looking for information held in our repositories."

The portal is similar to an Internet search engine, which displays information about Web pages and provides links to them but does not display the pages themselves. The Digital Commonwealth only collects metadata about the objects because the rights to them belong to their home institutions. Any Massachusetts cultural institution that has digitized collections or that have collections that they wish to digitize are welcome to add to this access of digital assets.

"I am very excited about the potential that this Digital Commonwealth has and its availability to students, faculty and researchers," said Marilyn Billings, the Executive Board member of the Digital Commonwealth.

Billing, along with 11 other committee members meet monthly and discuss what content should be put on the portal, ways to communicate with the community and training methods for the usage of the site, along with other logistical factors relating to the Digital Commonwealth.

Marla Miller, an associate professor and Director of the Public History Program at UMass, leads the exploration of the uses and everything that technology is transforming how history is preserved as it created powerful database that includes forthcoming research and the new tools, particular Web-based applications, for developing and sharing historical insight.

The History Department expects to expand its ability to collaborate with all kinds of new opportunities like the Digital Commonwealth to bring history to new audiences — so much so that we have dedicated a new faculty position to the subject of "Public History and New Media," she said.

The portal was designed by Sourcefabb, a private Web design firm with the participation of Digital Commonwealth members under a contract with the Boston Public Library. The portal is funded by a federal Library Services and Technology Act from the Institute of Museum and Library Services administered by the Massachusetts Board of Library Commissioners. The Digital Commonwealth of Massachusetts can be accessed at www.digitalcommonwealth.org.

'I'm Intiative' program launched to help donate to social causes

By Ashley Coulombe
Collegian Staff

Windows Live Messenger recently introduced a new program called I'm Initiative in which users can donate to one of 10 social causes just by having a conversation online.

Two University of Massachusetts students, senior Seho Lee and junior Spencer Goldman, are part of a 12-week plan to encourage fellow students to download the instant message program.

"We walk around to all of the dorms telling people about Windows Live Messenger and showing them how it works," said Goldman. "Sometimes they're hesitant to download it because everyone's so used to AOL Instant Messenger, but as soon as you tell them more about it they become more interested."

Windows Live Messenger "connects ten of the world's most effective non-profit organizations" to its users. After downloading the program, users choose between 10 social causes including the American Red Cross, The Humane Society of the United States and the Sierra Club.

"Every time you sign on and have a conversation using Windows Live Messenger, Microsoft donates a portion of the advertising revenues to the social cause that you chose," said Lee.

Lee also explained that Microsoft has no maximum amount to donate to each social cause. They do, however, have a $100,000 minimum for each organization during the program's first year. To date, they've raised over $143,000 combined.

In order to raise students' awareness about I m Initiative, Lee and Goldman have been going to various dorms and registered student organizations urging students to download Windows Live Messenger. In the final six weeks of their work to spread the word, Lee and Goldman intend to hold raffles and other fun prizes to help students "become initiative."

Students interested in the I'm Initiative program can download Windows Live Messenger and select the social cause of their choice at imtotalcause.com.

equipment and handles other material that other, smaller schools cannot dispose of. The recycling center has created between 10 and 15 jobs compared to three generated by simply throwing material into a landfill, a practice the National Recycling Coalition estimates is seventeen times less efficient than recycling.

During a tour of the facility, his dedication to conservation was evident. He was clearly upset after a truck dumped paper into the wrong bin.

"There's some high-grade paper in there. Some of that can be made into better quality paper than rest of the stuff in there," he said

Pepi and his staff were pioneers in the field of college campus recycling. He entered the University into the "Recycle mania" competition, which pits over 500 colleges and universities against one another. Losers must take out advertisements in the winner's university newspaper promoting the college's recycling program. Pepi said the University has done well in years past scoring within the top ten in food waste and in the top 20 in waste reduction by pound.

However, due to budget cuts, Pepi has been unable to enter the competition; something he said was instrumental in sparking student interest in taking part in the recycling process.

"I want to do aggressive and innovative things to appeal to students. We used to have bus ads, ads in The Collegian, throw pizza parties for the most efficient dorms and do well in Recyclemania," he said.

"We are good at the things we can regulate because people have few other choices besides bringing their lab chemicals and old refrigerators to us," he said. "It's the stuff that we can control – that students can control – that need work."

"A hope I have that I can connect with people and tell them that recycling doesn't hamper lifestyle, unlike giving up a SUV. It takes an extra two minutes as has a major effect on green house gas via manufacturing," he said.

Pepi's staff recycles approximately 40 to 50 percent of all material they control. But he's not satisfied with going at anything half-way.

"There's lots of room for improvement," he said.

The improvement is simple in some cases, he added. Switching light bulbs alone has had a significant impact on how much the University spends on lighting. New, more efficient toilets have reduced water waste by 40 percent. Emptying cans before recycling them saves money as the University is charged for the added weight, and not using plastic bags to hold the cans also saves headaches, he added.

Less room in the budget has also nixed ads and promotions completely as the department is forced to promote its message on signs displayed on its own aging vehicles.

The average age of each truck in his fleet is 15 years-old. The newest truck is seven.

Pepi said must become more creative with a consistently shrinking budget that forces him to constantly reevaluate his department's finances.

"It's just a lot of wasted time." He stressed 'wasted' with a certain contempt only others in his line of work could muster.

Food waste from dining commons is processed into fertilizer for local farmers, computers are dissembled and their raw metals are sold, discarded wood is chipped and made into landfill cover and older mattresses are shipped to foreign countries for use. Even the textbooks that could not be sold back find a home as they are shipped to "Hands Across the Water" a group that distributes old books to knowledge-hungry citizens of third world countries.

Waste is to be avoided at all cost, or perhaps more fittingly now, at the least possible cost.

UMPD Police log

Ghouls Gone Wild

Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald of University of Massachusetts Police Department said this Halloween was a relatively quiet one but that it contrasts sharply with the past two weekends – a time that usually features fewer calls as temperatures fall. Contrary to tradition, the UMPD has been busy.

Sarah M. Townley, 19, of Centerville, Mass was charged with domestic assault and battery. Townley was allegedly involved in a shouting match with another female resident of McNamara Dormitory in the Sylvan Residential Area at 2:35 a.m. The victim said Townley "pounced" onto her, and clawing and scratching injuries resulted. The victim did not require medical attention and a restraining order has been placed on Townley.

Jeffrey B. Fine, 21, of Sharon, Mass was pulled over at 11:50 p.m. on Friday night and charged with operating under the influence of liquor, marked lanes violation, one way street violation, negligent operation of a motor vehicle and failure to signal. Officers on scene said Fine was traveling west on Commonwealth Drive before cutting across to James Drive, briefly driving on the wrong side of the road in the process. Fine failed four field sobriety tests, and a breathalyzer test recorded his blood alcohol content at .16, twice the legal limit.

William D. Cycz, 19, of Whatley, Mass was charged with possession of a class D substance, possession of a class B substance, possession of a class D substance with intent to distribute, two charges of speeding and not having an inspection sticker. Officers said Cycz, or "Billy the Kid" was traveling at an estimated 50 mph on Massachusetts Avenue before turning onto North Maple Street and continuing to speed at an estimated rate of 65 miles per hour in a 40 mph zone. Upon pulling him over, the officer on scene made note of his bloodshot, glossy eyes and the odor of marijuana. After patting him for weapons, police found a bag of marijuana. While taking inventory of the car before towing it, officers found cocaine, a glass pipe and additional amounts of marijuana.

"It's a pain to park on campus," she said. "It's hard and far away. Plus, taking the bus is also better for the environment."

Hendry points out that the school discourages students from using their cars as a result of a mandate from the Massachusetts Department of Environmental Protection. The state's air emissions regulations not only affect the price of permits, but also stand behind the University's reasoning for making students park in "perimeter" lots that are often a good distance from dorms and classes. Hendry feels this keeps students from driving to and from classes and encourages them to use their cars less often.

"Parking on campus can get pretty pricey, whereas any bus run by UMass Transit or the PVTA is free," she said. "I keep a car on campus, but I generally don't use it unless I go home. I walk to work and class, or I take the bus when it's convenient."

Cummings also pointed to "outrageous" gas prices as a reason why she and other students take the bus instead of driving. Many students however, claim that the inconvenience of parking on campus is their primary motivation for taking the bus.

"Gas prices haven't really affected my decision," said junior Megan Lapointe. "It's easier for me to take the bus because I live off campus. I drive just a few times a week.",

Junior Jodie Rigali also takes the bus from her apartment off-campus due to the inconvenience of parking at UMass.

"I wish I hadn't bought my parking pass," she said. "I end up taking the bus everyday because my parking spot is so far away that it's inconvenient."

For UMass exchange student Zhen Wang, the bus is her only mode of transportation from her apartment in the Boulders to her classes. Although she claims that even if she had a car, she is not sure if she could afford to pay for gas; she points out that the bus does have its flaws.

"I like it, but on Sundays the first bus isn't until 1 p.m.," she said. "There's nothing I can do except sleep. In China, buses are more powerful and more convenient."

MASSPIRG fights credit scam by mocking card companies

penalty fees.

Last Thursday, MASSPIRG students at Amherst College combated these credit card deals by openly criticizing the companies. They dressed up like people who come to normally represent a credit card company (which they called FEESA), but instead they had students sign principles for responsible credit card marketing. It is their hope that the college will adopt these principles too. They range from banning the practice of giving a free gift to a student who applies for a credit card to limiting the flyers or one-on-one time the credit card salesmen have with the students.

"I think a lot of students knew about the bad deals from credit card companies, but I don't think a lot of them know that there are solutions to these problems," said MASSPIRG student Molly Chafetz. "All of the students were really supportive of the principles because they had never really thought about them before."

Chafetz also said that they got a lot of "positive responses" to their fake credit card company and many students were "excited about the principles."

"I had no idea how bad these scams were," said University of Massachusetts student Mary Ritchie. "I mean, I knew about the really obvious ones, but I didn't know before looking at the Web site that they could be so terrible. I can't believe that nothing has been done about it at colleges yet."

The set of principles made by MASSPIRG students could change that. For more information, visit www.truthaboutcredit.org.

Holy staph germs, Batman

Joshua H. Wilder

These days, more reports of the so-called potentially fatal "superbug" are popping up all across the country, leaving doctors and public health officials looking for answers.

Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus, also known as MRSA, used to be found only in hospitals and would spread between sick patients living in close contact. The strange thing now, however, is that the illness is popping up all across the country in young, healthy people.

ABC News reports that MRSA has threatened the lives of previously healthy young people not confined in a hospital bed but living in their own cities and towns.

In Victoria, Texas, a 12-year-old girl battled the infection at the expense of several surgeries and major lung damage. Others were not so lucky. Three children died from MRSA last month in Missouri, New Hampshire and Virginia. The youngest of the deceased was four years old.

The fact that people throughout America needed major surgeries to stay alive in the face of this superbug is very serious. According to ABC News, doctors are still in the dark as to why MRSA is starting to affect youths in random communities throughout the United States.

Government officials released a study last month warning that 90,000 people could become infected with MRSA this year. Is this something that we should worry about here at UMass?

Some may argue that a widespread MRSA epidemic wouldn't be realistic here in Amherst. After all, the Pioneer Valley is still quite isolated compared to eastern Massachusetts and the Boston area. Unfortunately, the rural nature of a community has nothing to do with this.

If MSRA ever caused a crisis on campus, they would probably send out an e-mail with vague instructions.

This humble columnist has never been someone to abandon a level head and switch into panic mode. However, certain characteristics of MRSA seem to be striking reasons to raise the UMass superbug color-coded warning system – if we ever had one.

The warning level would immediately go up to red, also known as "uh-oh this is serious," and here is why –

MRSA is spread through simple contact with someone already infected with the disease. This includes slapping hands, sharing drinks and those more intimate moments, of course.

One of the most essential parts of being a college student is living in close quarters with other co-eds. Whether it is in the overcrowded dorms or simply sharing an apartment with a few roommates, the opportunities to come in contact with germs and spread them are never-ending.

If MRSA can make its way to New Hampshire and North Carolina in the same month, what would make us think that Amherst is suddenly immune to it? If we can have bomb threats, baseball bat attacks, riots and hit-and-runs, I think this campus is qualified for superbugs, too.

Just think about one of the busiest buildings on campus – the library. In any given day, probably close to 100 students might use the same computer. Who knows how many students pushed the buttons on the elevators or put their hands on the railings near the staircase? If just one student here had MRSA and decided to go to the library, the superbug could spread like wildfire.

Now we all know that the University means well. They really want to benefit the students by raising tuition and building "New Dirt" all over campus. But in a time of possible danger, they seem to be a little in the dark about what to do. If MRSA ever caused a crisis on campus, they would probably send out an e-mail with vague instructions. This is not enough.

But even if we do get an unwanted visitor this winter or at any other time, there is hope. Avoiding an MRSA outbreak is a lot easier than you might think. It comes down to doing simple things like washing your hands.

A study released in March by Livescience.com found standard soap and 10 seconds of scrubbing to be among the most effective ways to get rid of bacteria. So if we ever were to have such a threat on campus, being proactive against the bug would be as simple as washing your hands a couple times a day.

So remember, keep those hands clean and cover your mouth when you cough or sneeze. The little things could help keep a very big bug out of Amherst this semester.

Internet equality

John Gruenenfelder

Last year's Net Neutrality debate, which sort of fizzled without any resolution, is back in the news again thanks in part to local cable provider, Comcast. Comcast has been accused of intentionally blocking BitTorrent traffic on their network. A coalition of consumer groups has asked the Federal Communications Commission to investigate the matter and possibly fine Comcast.

Net Neutrality states that all data on the Internet is equal and that no bit should be treated differently because of its origin or content. This should be familiar to most people since this is largely how the Internet has functioned since its beginning.

BitTorrent, a protocol on the Internet, is used to transfer very large files in an efficient manner. It has been used to illegally copy files, but each day there are more and more legal uses of BitTorrent, particularly by media companies transferring movies to customers.

Comcast should be familiar to anybody who lives off campus as they are essentially the only game in town for cable television or broadband Internet. The remaining offerings for Internet service are DSL providers, but they are easily 10 times slower than cable and not always available depending on your distance from the telephone office and the quality of your line.

Along with many other Internet service providers (or ISPs), Comcast is running into many problems as of late. For years, they have billed their service as "unlimited," but of course, there is no unlimited commodity. Now that customers are using programs like BitTorrent, Internet phones and YouTube, bandwidth use has exploded.

Most ISPs, however, have spent too little money to expand their capacities and now they're in a crunch. Rather than own-up and deal with this in a sane manner, they've opted to work in the shadows. The BitTorrent blocking issue is the latest effort to stem the tide.

Along with many other Internet service providers (or ISPs), Comcast is running into many problems as of late.

Comcast has only admitted to "delaying" the traffic, and even this admission came only after several stories in the media. Beyond that, Comcast's executive vice president, David Cohen, has maintained that they "engage in reasonable network management." If true, that would be reasonable.

This is where Net Neutrality comes back into the picture. Cable Internet providers are not "common carriers" as the telephone companies are. Rather, they are "information carriers." This subtle distinction means they are, to some extent, responsible for what data they carry, but it also gives them greater freedom over what they can and cannot do with their network.

In a perfect world, it wouldn't matter. You would just pick another provider like you would if you were unhappy with your cell phone service. But outside of major cities you are not very likely to have a choice. One of the goals of the Net Neutrality legislation is to make all Internet providers play nice and not mangle any of the data.

There is danger in the solution as well. In order to have teeth, it must not be written by an industry shill, but at the same time, it must account for the finer details so as not to hobble an important part of the economy.

Sadly, bureaucracies are generally not very good at this balancing act.

ISPs need to manage their traffic at some level. Using a method known as "quality of service," an ISP can preferentially treat, for example, Internet phone traffic, which must be delivered as fast as possible to be of any use. Bulk BitTorrent traffic can similarly be put at the back of the line without actually blocking it. Any new law must not be so strict as to disallow this type of management.

Yet even here, large ISPs have demonstrated an inability to do the right thing. Some customers of Vonage, an Internet phone company, have alleged that companies like Comcast have sufficiently delayed Vonage traffic to the point of having bad service. The idea is that an unhappy customer will drop Vonage in favor of Comcast's own phone offering.

Net Neutrality is something of a regulatory Hail Mary, and large ISPs are scared to death of it. Not wanting the government to make the situation worse than it already is, the legislation should be seen as a final resort. But what alternative is there? Without competition in many places, the U.S. has broadband Internet prices much higher than many other countries with the added benefit of providers shrink on their own poster.

If I had any choice in the matter, I would drop Comcast in a heartbeat. But at my apartment in Amherst, you either get Comcast or get nothing. Net Neutrality legislation will not make my Internet service cheaper or open me to new providers, but it will ensure that the connection I have is free from severe tampering. In the end, the Internet will be better off with it.

Examining the income gap

Greg Collins

The "rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer" is a mantra frequently mentioned during presidential campaigns but rarely examined deeply by supporters of government-provided welfare programs. For instance, John Edwards and Barack Obama have highlighted the growing disparity between the rich and the poor to justify expanding social services like universal health care.

But the fact that socio-economic inequalities exist under U.S. style capitalism does not mean that this is a bad thing. Rather, it signals a sign of a healthy economy, which benefits not a particular socio-economic group but all people.

Why is the income gap not necessarily a negative force in America? The feeling that income inequality reflects the power of the rich and the oppression of the poor assumes that capitalism is a zero-sum system, in which what is gained by one party is inevitably lost by another party. That is, if Wal-Mart generates $30 of revenue from a customer, then this customer will not gain anything from the transaction. The only party that will obtain the advantage is big business.

Yet the customer will obviously receive a kind of benefit from Wal-Mart, such as if he acquires $30 worth of food. This voluntary transaction reveals a unique characteristic of free markets – it would be illogical to make transactions if the parties involved felt that they had nothing to gain from trading or exchanging various forms of wealth.

Similarly, say that you worked at a company which paid you $20 an hour, and your friend worked at another company which paid $10 an hour. But after a year you move on to a different company which pays you $35 an hour, and your friend also switches to a different employer which pays him $20 an hour.

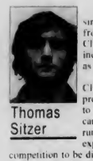
Supporters of government intervention in the economy would immediately highlight the income gap that is more pronounced in the second instance. Yet, analysed within the context of each individual employee, the percentage of your friend's income growth was greater than the percentage of your income rise, even if the overall income gap had increased. It is clear that the advancement of your friend did not inhibit your advancement.

This scenario exemplifies why free markets operate not based on zero-sum results but on mutual, beneficial relationships for both poorer people and richer people. Contrast this feature with Edwards' health care program, which would create zero-sum relationships by taxing people an explicit amount of money in order to give this exact amount to other people. What would be gained by one party would be lost automatically by another.

The fact that socio-economic inequalities exist under U.S. style capitalism does not mean that this is a bad thing.

Of course we need to define who the rich and who the poor are, since these vague terms dictate public discourse involving government programs and social class critique in general. The income bracket distributions used to label someone as "poor," such as people making less than $20,000, are deceptive because they assume people do not move from one bracket to another throughout their lives.

It is highly likely that a college student will be defined as "poor" at one point in his life – when he works at an entry-level job right out of college – and later on be labeled as "rich," when he has acquired the necessary experience and skills to move on to higher-paid positions. Simply put, the fact that a person is poor at one particular point in his life does not mean that he will continue to be poor later on.



This characteristic of income gaps is in direct contrast to that under government-controlled economies. For instance, socio-economic mobility was severely limited in the former Soviet Union where income distribution was much more static. In this case, inequality was a problem not because incomes were not equal rather, the issue was that the Soviets' command-and-control institutions did not create the necessary preconditions that would have enabled people to generate wealth. For example, there was a lack of incentives for people to be innovative and entrepreneurial, since the state claimed responsibility for these goals.

Compare this structure with U.S. capitalism, and it is evident how Americans have achieved incredible progress even while the income gap has expanded. Consider the time periods of our grandparents and great grandparents. Even the richest of the rich then never had access to products we take for granted nowadays, like televisions, air conditioning and computers, commodities even the "poor" possess today. Many of these products have enhanced our education, improved our health and enabled those less fortunate than us to have the same access to services as we do.

Be wary of politicians and professors who espouse the detrimental effects of the income gap without specifying that disparities are not necessarily a bad thing. Due to mutually beneficial decision-making processes encouraged by competitive free markets, incomes change frequently over time, even if the dogma of big government advocates does not.

Clinton pulling the gender card

Thomas Sitzer

In November, the sins of the Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton are becoming increasingly criticized as debates intensify.

No doubt Senator Clinton feels unique pressure in respect to her "first woman" campaign. As a front-runner, she must also expect the brunt of the competition to be directed toward her in every debate. It must be very tempting for a woman in her position to reason that her party opponents gang up on her because she is a woman – obviously an ineligible applicant for the "boy's club."

In a video produced by Hillary's campaign team commonly know as the "pile-on" compilation, footage is compiled to show each time Clinton is addressed on an issue.

Big deal, says I; she is a front-runner and ought to expect this sort of attention. Furthermore, she portrays herself as a strong, fighting competitor. I know that she wields those boxing gloves with confidence, but I wonder if her next complaint will be, "I could have been a contender."

This "six-on-one" mentality portrayed to voters is probably not the image Clinton wants to illustrate. I think that it is unwise to move her focus from relentlessly attacking President Bush to setting-up her opponents on the podium. An interview by the Today Show's Matt Lauer with Senator Barack Obama makes this abundantly clear.

NBC's Lauer asks, "this idea that when the guys challenge the gal at this debate this week, that in some ways you were ganging up on her, and you heard what Senator Clinton said at Wellesley yesterday.

She said that in some ways, that all women's college prepared her for the all-boys club of presidential politics. It sounds to me, Senator, that I just heard the gender card drop. How are you going to deal with it?"

Clinton should plainly ignore any threats or reflections of "guys versus girls" because it only distracts her from the issues.

In smooth response, Obama, "well, look, I am assuming, and I hope that Senator Clinton wants to be treated like everybody else, and I think that that's why she's running for President. He went on to compare her attacks to the Iowa debate in which he claims he, too, was assaulted with foreign policy challenges for the first 15 minutes.

He reasoned that in the case that he pulled the race card, he could claim that these questions were densely directed toward him because he "looks different from the rest of the folks on stage."

Clinton should plainly ignore any threats or reflections of "guys versus girls" because it only distracts her from the issues, and the voter-turn then attention from Hillary to her opponents. All attention of Clinton's campaign should be focused on the direction that she wants to take the country. The American people will not forget that she is a woman – this fact speaks for itself.

By pulling the gender card, Clinton would only weaken her image of a fighting Democrat. In general, I think it is a shot against women as well, but I do not think it would take away from the female contingency behind her. In fact, feminists and Wellesley students probably excited her cultivate instances that lead her to declare presidential politics an "all boys club."

As a man however, this kind of attitude looks particularly undesirable in a female candidate. I would not want to vote for a woman who considers any part of the race unfair on any account. Comments like these are undesirable and acts like the video are utterly distasteful.

Many Clinton supporters take pride in the fact that, as ASCMI President Gerald McEntee said, "Six guys against Hillary. I'd call that a fair fight. This is one strong woman." Really, there is no need for Clinton to take an approach on the campaign that suggests any form of weakness.

I think most of America understands and is sensitive to the profundity of Clinton's potential nomination. A stoic approach is probably the safest – and later in the race especially in the case of nomination, would be an admirable one to fall back on in the case of serious attacks of feminine inaptitude.

The problem is a conflict between the propensity for politicians to attack their opponents in any way possible and to avoid rubbing public opinion the wrong way. Here, Clinton risks losing favor in opinion by raising issues of gender, which could affect her later on in the race.

Nobody wants to talk about gender in race, because the race is supposed to be fair. For a feminist, the sword is a double-edged one, and Hillary Clinton plays a risky balancing act on the edge of conformity and some vaguely militant female aggression.

Dull album has high point

Taking Back Sunday guitarist comes out with new solo disc

By Michelle Abbasciano
Collegian Staff

Fred Mascherino, guitarist, back-up vocalist and songwriter for the pop-rock band Taking Back Sunday, has departed from the band he has been with since 2003 to pursue his own solo-project. The project, which he dubbed The Color Fred – after the name got the most votes on an online poll he posted – actually started back when he was in a band called Breaking Pangaea before he joined the Taking Back Sunday lineup.

"Bend To Break," The Color Fred's first full-length album released, officially came out on Oct. 30, and is already a success. The album includes 11 tracks of honest, emotional acoustic and alternative rock-sounding songs.

The project got underway when the first track entitled "Heading Back East," was featured on Equal Vision Records' CD in 2005. Mascherino played a handful of live shows, and exposed the raw, stripped-down versions of his music to a very receptive and interested audience, opening for his friends in bands such as My Chemical Romance and Dashboard Confessional.

Another important track in this band's career entitled "Turning" is an epic 12 minute song featured on The Color Fred's website, but it unfortunately did not make it onto the final product. "Turning" is a haunting, melodic song with raw vocals, and even though the lyrics are somewhat repetitive, musically the song has an interesting, unique range. It is a disappointment that this song was not put on "Bend To Break" because it could have given the album some depth and much-needed diversity.

The majority of the songs are three to four minutes long, with the stand out track, "Don't Pretend," reaching just over six minutes. This track is definitely the odd ball, consisting of a mixture of melodic beats with a heavier guitar sound in the background, and soft, yet emotional vocals.

"Bend To Break" does a fair job of providing a mixture of songs but lacks creativity and imagination. The album quite literally alternates one acoustic song followed by a faster, more pop-sounding song. Some of the slower, more melodic tracks such as "It Isn't Me," "Empty House" and "I'll Never Know" are all sound similar with Mascherino playing acoustic guitar in the background and his smooth, yet sincere sounding voice in the forefront.

Some of the CD's faster, catchier songs such as "Minnesota" and "I Didn't See" are much more upbeat and fun to listen to but still sound fairly similar to one another.

While The Color Fred's Myspace page only lists Fred Mascherino as a band member, the musician did have some help from his close friends with the recording of this album.

"I played all the bass and guitars on the record. I also had a little help with some backup vocals by P.J. Bond, who will be playing bass on the road," Mascherino said. The album's recording sessions was rounded-out by drummer Steve Curtiss, who will also be in tow when The Color Fred embarks on extensive roadwork to support "Bend To Break."

Select critics and fans alike have deemed The Color Fred a "reincarnation of faking Back Sunday." Well, they just might be right. The opening track on the album, entitled "Get Out," sounds remarkably reminiscent of the band, with both Mascherino's guitar and vocals mirroring previous faking Back Sunday songs.

One song that does stand out against the other ten tracks is the incredibly catchy single "If I Surrender." This one is sure to be a radio hit in no time, with its video already up for MTV's Total Request Live video line-up.

Although many of the songs on this album are appealing and enjoyable, it comes up short. The music itself is put together well and are decent songs when standing alone, but the CD as a whole is not incredibly unique.

Mascherino is an outstanding, driven musician, and although this was a decent attempt at a solo project, his vocals are generic sounding. The music sounds like a carbon copy of the hundreds of other aspiring pop-rock bands trying to make it in the genre. Overall, "Bend To Break" is a solid album and deserves listeners' attention at least one time through.

Michelle Abbasciano can be reached at mabbasci@student.

In his first full-length solo release, Fred Mascherino fails to prove that he can produce music on his own.

Band stays true to popular sound in fourth new release

By Chase Wheeler
Collegian Correspondent

Who says that the concept album is a dead commodity of days past? Emerged from the ashes of rock phoenixes such as Pink Floyd, Rush and Iron Maiden is Coheed and Cambria, New York's progressive rockers and concept album gurus. Exploding onto the rock arena in 2001, Coheed and Cambria's montage of volatile guitar riffs, fantastically melodramatic lyrics and complex rhythmic styles quickly garnered them much acclaim. Choosing to release a chain of interwoven concept albums, Coheed and Cambria hit an early zenith in 2005 when it's third album, "Good Apollo I'm Burning Star IV, Vol. 1: From Fear Through the Eyes of Madness" reached number seven on the Billboard charts.

Enter "Good Apollo I'm Burning Star IV, Vol. 2: No World For Tomorrow," Coheed's fourth and final chapter of its musical chronicle. Outlining the account of Coheed and Cambria, two lovers who have turned their affection for each other into wrathful world-razing animosity. "No World For Tomorrow" faces the tall task of closing out a powerful, emotional story while maintaining the exceptional musical standard set by its three preceding installments.

"No World For Tomorrow" raises the curtain with a haunting and forbidding number in "The Reaping," which quickly escalates into the album's hardest hitting tune "No World For Tomorrow." Guitarist Claudio Sanchez's narrative progresses through with a synthesizer-happy, Pink Floyd influenced track entitled "The Hound of Blood and Rank," followed by the best track, "Feathers."

The only missing element in this epic, pulsing melody (reminiscent of Van Halen's "Panama") is a strong percussion performance from reputable guest drummer Taylor Hawkins of the Foo Fighters. This trend is prevalent throughout much of "No World For Tomorrow" as with only the occasional thoughtful fill contributed, Hawkins fails to deliver anything more than a mediocre exhibition.

On a brighter note, it was encouraging to see bassist Michael Todd enter the fray, driving the catchy anthem "The Running Free" and providing the track with a humming counterpoint to Sanchez's tumbling guitar licks. Sanchez's efforts are focused more on lyrics in "Mother Superior," an excellent change up to the previous four tracks' intensity. Taking advantage of the subdued instrumentals, Sanchez demonstrates his impressive vocal talents crowing, "no, they know you're just a boy. So grow up and be a man."

Sanchez then pays homage to his metal and classic rock influences in "Gravemakers and Gunslingers," integrating the styles of Ozzy Osbourne and Black Label Society guitarist Zakk Wylde and Van Halen into his main solo.

The latter segment of "No World For Tomorrow" illuminates "The End Complete" in five separate entries. Of these songs, another notable vocal performance from Sanchez manifests itself in the appropriately dramatic "The Road and the Damned," one of the best edited and acoustically-blended pieces on the album. "On the Brink" draws "No World For Tomorrow" to a tasteful conclusion with the guitars exuding a western twang over a classic bluesy backdrop.

Despite its intermittent weak entries, Coheed and Cambria's "No World For Tomorrow" brings the album to a satisfying close. In retrospect, a more consistent vocal performance from Claudio Sanchez and a superior effort on the part of drummer Taylor Hawkins would have vaulted this compilation past the solid three out of five stars it is being allotted. However, "No World For Tomorrow" imparts Coheed and Cambria with a world of musical opportunity to explore in the wake of its impressive saga.

Mobius Band releases new album onto computerized pop/punk scene

By Emma Reed
Collegian Correspondent

Mobius Band, the Brooklyn-based electro-experimental trio, brings worldliness and strife to the pre-pubescent based genre of computerized pop-rock. Mobius Band's fourth album "Heaven" (Misra 2007) sounds like Hello Goodbye but with a backbone.

Mobius Band's new, self-produced album entitled "Heaven," released on Oct. 2 of this year, is made up of distorted Casio keyboards, understated musical reinforcement and poetically grounded lyrics. The album's catchy lyrics and provocative beats ground the album's experimental aspect giving the album a more natural flow. Despite being predictable and repetitive at times, "Heaven" is quite charming as a whole.

The experimental sampling and computerization that is "Heaven" generates the feeling of being trapped inside the wiring of an old radio. The down-to-earth lyrics and subtle musical interludes provide a contrast to the distortion, and transforms "Heaven" from radio noise into actual music.

"Heaven" is the result of a trying, 19 month period full of heartbreak and bereavement. The emotional lyrics driving this album are the accounts of three musicians – Ben Sterling, Peter Sax and Noam Schatz – living on the road and dealing with issues from financial burdens to emotional and physical exhaustion and at times to extensive isolation. Motifs of questioning control and mental limitations resonate throughout this album when Ben sings, "time so heavy, buried under sand" on "Under Sand."

On "Black Spot," there is a sense of animalistic desire when Ben sings, "desert keeps on wanting, drains away your conscience," and then he jumps into the refrain: "Always just a little behind," leaving listeners with the conundrum of the constant confusion that is life.

Mobius Band's innovation of electromagnetically-charged music is a valiant attempt to create their version of the Radiohead-esque style of computerized pop-rock. The sentimental ballad "Hallie" and the pseudo-lullaby "Control" are progressive yet satisfyingly familiar. "Friends Like These" falls noticeably short of innovative genius with its combination of New Kids on the Block/Divo style repetition and cheesiness. "A Hint of Blood" and "Secret Language" are brimming with sing-songy lyrics supported by a downpour of electronic raindrops.

Mobius Band covers all the basics with "Heaven." Snaps, crackles and pops maneuver this album through a labyrinth of ex-girlfriends, friendship and betrayal, the banality of the everyday ("Tie a Tie"), and the recurring theme of anticipation ("Leave the Keys in the Door"). "Heaven" transforms pre-existing assumptions of what makes a progressively fresh yet comfortingly familiar album and runs with it.

The Bride, Christa Elliot, runs away from her wedding with Leonardo, Tyler Wilhjelm, who is caught and killed in "Blood Wedding."

Bloody theater production entertains students during Halloween weekend

By Teresa Reilly
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Theater Guild put on the perfect scary production this past week. "Blood Wedding" incorporated all of the blood and screaming that is usually associated with All Hallows Eve into a well-crafted play.

With characters like Death, who was personified in the form of a beggar, and the costume choice of a bridal gown covered in blood, it is obvious that the play was meant to be performed in late October.

The play opens with an eerie scene of two men being killed. No words are said, but the actions speak loudly enough. The curtains close over dead bodies and a wife mother weeping over her men.

The Mother, played by Lila Weingast, gave the best performance in the production with a loud and dominant stage presence. Her hand motions were in sync with her boisterous voice and powerful tone. Weingast pulled a lot of emotion out of the small character and brought the audience into the heart of this old, saddened woman.

The old woman's passion is carried throughout the play and is neutralized by her son, the Bridegroom, played by Peter Storey. The Bridegroom is optimistic and perhaps love struck, as he calms his mother and convinces her to allow him to marry. The energetic vibrancy of the young man is obvious, but his foreseeable doom puts a dark cloud over his character.

The play was meant to be poetic but probably sounded better in its original Spanish language. The play was originally written in 1932 by the Spanish dramatist Federico Garcia Lorca.

While most of the meaning was able to be portrayed beyond words, there was an obvious lack of flow, especially in a song sung by the Mother-in-Law to her grandson. The song was meant to foreshadow the coming tragedy in the play but even though actress Amanda Lehan sang it nicely, there was a clear lack of rhythm.

Despite the lack of flow, the play was easy to understand. A woman (the Bride) betrays both societal norms and the Bridegroom by running off on her wedding day with her true beloved, Leonardo.

The Bride and Leonardo's love breaks them away from their families and destroys their spotless image within this early 20th century Spanish drama. In an attempt to perhaps save his own name and that of his new wife, the Bridegroom rides off into the forest after the disloyal couple.

Here, the set dramatically changes. The back curtain is lifted and the best set of the play emerges. Dark green decorations dangle from the ceiling, giving the illusion of a nighttime forest. A light is shown in the backdrop, representing the moon.

The personified Moon, played by Ali Harrington, appears and expresses the morality of the situation. The Moon discusses her distaste for humankind in general and her desire for the jealous and the disloyal to die by her light.

Death enters the play, and shortly after, screams are heard in the background of the forest. The next scene reveals that Leonardo and the Bridegroom had killed each other over the Bride. The Bride, played by Christa Elliott, emerges into the Mother's presence covered in the blood of her two men.

The play ends with the Mother and Bride discussing their own tragedies.

Huskies, Rams turn CAA upside down

Murray leads NU past UNH

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

After this weekend's Colonial Athletic Association games, it has become clear that no team can overlook another and expect to win, especially in the rain.

In addition to No. 9 Massachusetts' (7-2, 5-1 CAA) falling to Rhode Island (2-7, 1-5 CAA), No. 14 New Hampshire (6-3, 3-3 CAA) couldn't secure a home win against Northeastern.

The Husky offense was on the field for 48 minutes, which constitutes 80 percent of the game. They ran the ball 76 times for 282 yards, which enabled them to kill the clock and keep the Wildcat offense off of the field.

"Maurice Murray's being the CAA Offensive Player of the Week was largely due to some very good play from the men up front and Mo doing a super job of keeping his pads low and running on the inside and breaking tackles," Northeastern coach Rocky Hager said in this week's CAA teleconference.

Murray carried the majority of the load for the Huskies (2-7, 1-5 CAA) – his 55 carries broke former UNH standout Jerry Azumah's record of 53 in a CAA game. He ran for 206 yards and three touchdowns, and Northeastern went the entire game without punting for the first time since 1973.

The senior also broke multiple school records. He is now the all-time Northeastern leader with 39 touchdowns, 764 carries and is 215 rushing yards shy of passing L.J. McKanas in the school record books.

"They just finished drives all day long," UNH coach Sean McDonnell said. "When you have drives of 11 [plays], 16, 15, 14, 13 and 11, you tend to wear a defense down, and they did that to us all day long."

Rain and wind was a factor in the game, but McDonnell said that other games around the CAA were played with worse conditions and it did not factor into their loss.

When the UNH offense was on the field, it turned the ball over. Running back Robert Simpson lost a fumble, and quarterback Ricky Santos threw two interceptions. The two miscues by Santos were his first interceptions since throwing two in the season opener against James Madison on Sept. 8.

Though they didn't throw the ball often, quarterback Anthony Orio was effective when he did. He completed 11-of-12 passes for 153 yards, and his 91.7 completion percentage put him atop the Northeastern all-time completion percentage mark with at least 10 pass attempts.

RUNNING BACKS IMPRESS

Hofstra's Kareem Huggins didn't play Saturday due to an ankle sprain, but the other two CAA running backs on the Walter Payton Watch List made strong cases for claiming their spot as the best offensive player in the Football Championship Subdivision.

Tim Hightower had a season-high 36 carries for 187 yards and a touchdown and enabled No. 8 Richmond (7-2, 5-1 CAA) to defeat Villanova this weekend.

"He really worked hard to cut some weight, cut percent body fat, become more explosive, become faster," Richmond coach Dave Clawson said. "He's just worked extremely hard to do that, and it's great to see him see the results for his work."

Hightower has passed 1,000 yards rushing in 2007. He comes this season needing 1,000 yards on the season – he finished his 2005 season with 1,298 yards and 2006 season with 1,246 yards against Northeastern. Hightower is averaging 6.7 yards per carry and has 19 overall touchdowns on the season.

Delaware's Omar Cuff has already broken the Delaware single-season touchdown record, but it appears he doesn't want anyone surpassing him anytime soon.

The senior running back rushed for 101 yards and three touchdowns in the Blue Hens' 47-14 victory over James Madison.

Cuff's average of 4.9 yards per carry is slower per yards less than Hightower's average but 1.01 of touchdowns are good enough to give him an average of more than three touchdowns per game.

"When he's doing the things this year you really like to see starting to do those things early in last year's season before the high ankle sprain, game in, Delaware coach K.C. Keeler said.

"He's gotten better and better in pass receiving, he's gotten better in running his routes, he's gotten better in pass protection and those are all the things we asked him to get better at. I don't know if he can get a whole lot better at running the ball."

CAA HONORS PLAYERS

Cuff Yancey had a career day for the No. 15 Dukes (6-3, 4-2 CAA), but it wasn't enough in the 47-34 loss to Delaware. However, the running back was honored as the CAA Rookie of the Week.

Yancey gathered 323 all-purpose yards in the loss, including 171 yards rushing and 152 kick return yards. The rushing yards gave Yancey a personal best and was good enough for second all-time on JMU's single-game rushing list.

"He's got good speed, he can catch the ball out of the backfield and he's getting better every week," JMU coach Mickey Matthews said. "He's very competitive, plays hard on Saturday and is a good guy."

Due to a shortage of running backs, Matthews decided to move Yancey from wide receiver to running back last year and he redshirted. The freshman only seen 48 carries last season but he leads the Dukes in total yards with 758 on 108 carries.

Maine recorded its CAA-high back-to-back wins for the first time this season and the play of Jovan Belcher helped the Black Bears escape with a 17-14 victory over Towson.

"I think probably more than anything this is an accumulation of just some great play from that young man over the course of the last few weeks," Maine coach Jack Cosgrove said regarding Belcher winning the award. "I thought he was our standing two weeks ago against Northeastern and again on this past weekend."

The junior defensive end made seven tackles – including one for a 13-yard loss – and a fumble and also backed up quarterback Sean Schaefer. The Maine defense is a great intangible. Schaefer threw for 207 yards as the Tigers (3-6, 1-5 CAA) had 38 rushing yards.

through the back of the field and is the Tigers' main striker on penalty corners. She is second on the team in points with 21 from eight goals and five assists.

Bortz leads Princeton with 12 goals and seven assists to total 31 points. Sowry said that she wants the defense to limit the opportunities of both players and make them a non-factor in the game.

She also talked about Princeton's offensive style. Sowry said that the Tigers play a more open and up-tempo style of field hockey. She noted that the Tigers outlet the ball really well and can find seams in the defense and turn them into scoring chances. She also expects that the game will move quickly because of the surface and the playing style of both teams.

Similarly, UMass struggled early in the year starting the season 5-6 through 11 games but won eight of its last 10 games, including the A-10 Tournament. The Maroon and White outscored its opponents 17-5 in those games. The only losses were against Temple and another Ivy League team, Dartmouth.

UMass set the school record for most conference wins in a season (six). It also led the A-10 in shutouts (nine), goals-against average (0.94) and shots allowed per game (7.2). The Minutewomen also posted team bests since 2000 in regular season and overall wins with 11 and 13 respectively. They also allowed the fewest goals in the regular season (18).

Junior Katelyn Orlando got her first playing time since the Oct. 14th game against Saint Joseph's. She was used in a reserve role in both games and registered an assist in the championship game against St. Joe's.

Justin McGrail can be reached at jvmcgrai@student.umass.edu.

F. HOCKEY from page 8

76-26. UMass didn't win any of these games, but they did give UConn a challenge. The Huskies are currently ranked No. 4 in the STATSHCA Division I Coaches Poll but were forced to score two goals in the final seven minutes to escape with the 3-2 home victory on Sept. 22.

Along with their strong finish to the season, results such as these should give the Minutewomen the confidence they need matched against teams like Princeton.

The Minutewomen also played two non-conference teams that continued for three wins on the season. In these games, UMass had two one-goal victories over Brown and Siena, but now it must step up and try to execute against tougher opponents.

The team's other victories came against Sacred Heart, Rutgers and Harvard. None of these teams finished the season with a winning record, and the Minutewomen's 5-0 victory over the Crimson on Sept. 2 was their signature non-conference victory of the season.

Winning road non-conference games has been the biggest problem for the Minutewomen. They are 2-5 on the road in these contests with wins against Harvard and Siena.

These previous games and statistics may prove meaningless, depending upon how well the Minutewomen know and defend the Princeton gameplan. The result of field hockey games can be decided by a particular bounce or a single miscue by either team. It's different from basketball, in which the most dominant team often overpowers the underdog. This does happen in field hockey but not as often.

Sowry continually preached that her team must "have the belief." It took three months, but they have now adopted the mantra completely. A victory over a top non-conference team in the NCAA Tournament would certainly go a long way in instilling belief in anyone involved or following the team.

Five-goal third lifts BU to win over UML

Ricci returns after suspension

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Detractors of Boston University immediately dismissed the team's chances this season after the graduation of goaltender John Curry and several other seniors. Curry was statistically the second-best goalie in Hockey East last season, and his departure left a gaping void in net.

With BU's 0-4-1 start to this season, it looked like BU coach Jack Parker's naysayers were finally correct. But after a pair of conference wins last weekend, BU's season is anything but finished.

UMass-Lowell (2-2-1, 0-2-1 Hockey East) appeared to have the Terriers on the ropes Saturday with a 4-2 lead at the end of the second period, but BU erupted with a five-goal effort in the third period for a 7-4 victory.

If the Terriers have a successful season, they may look at that period as its turning point.

To put the period in perspective, it took BU until January to score five goals in a game last season – though the River Hawks don't represent the conference's best competition.

However, the Terriers (2-4-1, 2-1-0 Hockey East) have been slow starters in recent years. Last season BU tied five of its first 13 games, as the team struggled to get out of the gate in Hockey East play.

However, the weekend results were not enough for BU to crawl back into either national poll.

Beast first line

There is no secret how to beat New Hampshire. Shutdown the team's top line.

UNH coach Dick Umile traditionally sticks his first line with his two most talented forwards and best center.

This year is no exception.

With freshman James vanRiemsdyk and senior Matt Fornataro on the wings and senior Mike Radja in the center, Umile has an offensive group capable of matching the production of any line in the country.

The trio's impact on No. 6 UNH's result on the ice was evident last weekend. In the team's seven-goal outburst against Northeastern (2-4-0, 2-3-0 Hockey East) Friday, each member of the line scored a goal and finished with eight points.

Yet Saturday's game yielded the opposite result for the Wildcats (4-1-0, 2-1-0 Hockey East). The Wildcats lost to NU 2-1, as the trio failed to score.

Not only was the loss New Hampshire's first of the season, it was also the first time the team's line was held scoreless.

In UNH's four wins, the trio registered 23 total points, including nine goals.

Not only are the three skaters arguably the team's three most talented offensive players, they each bring something different to the game. Fornataro provides a scoring touch similar to departed Wildcat Trevor Smith, who left for the NHL after leading UNH in scoring in 2006-07.

On the other side, vanRiemsdyk is the line's power forward – adding physical play and the ability to occupy a large space in front on the net.

Husky recruits

Northeastern goes up against BC, BU and Harvard in the Beanpot every March. But the Huskies also compete with the three schools (and the rest of Hockey East) for local recruits. Given the tradition of some of the other Hockey East programs, it's not surprising that NU coach Greg Cronin looks elsewhere to fill out his roster.

Though the team has eight players from the Bay State, the Huskies' most productive players hail from faraway. Junior forward Joe Vitale – the team's only drafted player – is from St. Louis. Though a traditional hockey region, most players from the Midwest enroll at schools in the WCHA or CCHA.

The conference named Vitale its Player of the Week after his three-point weekend against New Hampshire; he also leads the Huskies in scoring with five points.

The Huskies also have four players with connections to Iowa. Three players, including Vitale, played junior hockey there, while sophomore forward Chad Costello is from Johnston, Iowa.

In a similar vein, the team has two other players from the nontraditional hockey locales of Arizona and Virginia.

Triumphant return

Before his career at Merrimack (4-2-0, 1-2-0 Hockey East) ends, sophomore forward Rob Ricci may develop into one of the conference's top scorers.

In his freshman campaign, Ricci lead the team in scoring with 10 goals and 15 assists. Though playing on a six-win team, the accomplishment placed Ricci among the conference's most promising freshmen.

However, MC coach Mark Dennehy suspended Ricci for the entire 2006-07 season for an unspecified violation of team rules.

Coming into this season, it was unclear whether the forward could continue the pace he set for himself two years ago.

Apparently a year away from the college game did Ricci some good, as he leads the Warriors with eight points. The Ontario native is also in the midst of a four-game scoring streak, including tallying the team's only goal against Massachusetts (3-2-2, 1-1-2 Hockey East) in Saturday's 5-1 loss.

Mr. October

For junior Ben Bishop, October lends itself to good goaltending. Finally playing at full strength since suffering a groin injury late last season, Bishop led No. 12 Maine to a 4-2-1 record in net, despite dropping two road games at Denver.

He received Hockey East Goaltender of the Month, as he ranks third among Hockey East goaltenders with a 1.99 goals-against average. Coincidentally, the award marks the third straight October that Bishop has received the honor.

Top frosh

In a sport where the most talented athletes leave school early to test the waters of the NHL, it's becoming much more common for underclassmen to dominate the sport. In fact, several freshmen throughout the country have already established themselves as among the best, such as UNH's vanRiemsdyk and Wisconsin's Kyle Turris.

But an unheralded freshman Joe Whitney of No. 7 Boston College (3-1-3, 2-0-2 Hockey East) leads the conference in scoring with 11 points in seven games.

Though Whitney had no shortage of accomplishments in junior hockey, most experts did not expect Whitney to have such a significant impact with the Eagles. Playing on the team's third line, Whitney scored two goals against Merrimack on Oct. 26 ... Apparently, the BU power play lends itself to short-handed goals. Providence (1-5-1, 1-2-1 Hockey East) scored its only two goals on the penalty kill in Thursday's 5-2 loss ... In the two wins over the weekend, 17 different players registered a point for Boston University.

end of the third quarter and into the fourth quarter. But his ninth run fell short of the two yards he needed, on what was a crucial fourth-and-goal at the URI 2-yard line.

"I just went with my players on that one," Brown said of the decision to go for it on fourth down. "They felt they could get [the touchdown]. It would have been a nail in the coffin. We've gone for it on fourth down a lot and had success. That's one of many calls you reconsider in this football game when you lose a tight one like that."

Three and out

Both teams had significant problems moving the ball with the weather conditions, but the struggles for the Minutemen were more pronounced.

UMass recorded seven first downs in the game, including one through the air. Although the Rams had 10 first downs, they had better success on third downs – converting 5-of-19, while the Minutemen went 2-of-16. UMass also failed to convert on both fourth-down attempts.

After the Rancher fumble on the first play from scrimmage, the Minutemen went three-and-out in seven of the next eight drives. UMass ended that stretch with six consecutive three-and-outs, and then followed that up with a four-and-out, missing a 32-yard field goal that would have given the team a 7-6 lead in the third quarter.

The Minutemen had nine drives of less than 10 yards, and punter Brett Arnold was forced to punt nine times. The Minutemen also failed to score on their three trips to the red zone.

Power play making progress

mented after the game that while his shot isn't where it needs to be to pose a serious threat, he saw the play-making ability that earned Fenton the job in the first place.

"Before the season's done, you'll see some of the upperclassmen having the big nights and carrying the load," Cahoon said. "Sometimes the puck just doesn't fall. PJ made a beautiful play on a pass to Marcou toward the end of the game, and he gets nothing to show for it. It was an absolutely gorgeous setup."

Despite the absence of a prolific power play, the Minutemen produced eight goals in their last two games. While the power play isn't producing as much as the Minutemen would like, the production in even strength situations has curtailed the effects.

"I thought we moved it OK [on the power play]. We're still not burying the puck often enough. As I said, I'm not displeased with the personnel, but we need to get sharper to be a little more threatening," Cahoon said. "We need to keep working on that. Fortunately, the power play wasn't as essential tonight as it normally is. Hopefully we get it organized for next week and get some production out of it." ... Freshman Shawn Saunders played his second-career game for UMass, he featured at left wing next to Brian Keane and Will Ortiz

Watson is questionable for the weekend's action against Boston University and UMass Lowell ... Lecomte and defenseman Justin Braun were named to Hockey East's top weekly performers for their games against MC ... UMass is No. 20 in the USCHO/CSTV Division I College Hockey poll and unranked in the USA Today/USA Hockey Magazine Men's College poll.

Toughest challenge awaits

Maroon and White challenge Ivy champs

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

The 2007 season has been a monumental year for the Massachusetts field hockey team. Its wins have increased by seven, it won its first conference championship since 2001, and UMass coach Justine Sowry was named Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year. However, if the team had one weakness, it was its inability to consistently win non-conference games.

The Minutewomen are a dominant 8-1 in A-10 games, including their two recent conference tournament victories over Richmond and Saint Joseph's.

They now travel to Princeton, N.J., to take on a No. 18 Tigers team that is 13-4 and 7-3 record in non-conference play. UMass went 5-7 in the regular season against non-conference foes, and although most of those games were in the beginning of the season, the Minutewomen did drop their most recent against Dartmouth on Oct. 24. The Big Green were at the bottom of the Ivy League, the same conference Princeton captured, and the Tigers handled Dartmouth 4-1 on the road on Sept. 15.

Sowry feels the Minutewomen benefited from these non-conference games, and the key to future success is to continually challenge her team to play unfamiliar opponents. An indicator of how much they've learned thus far may come today when they take on a team that dominated its competition throughout the season.

When all the records of UMass's non-conference opponents are combined, the record stands at 118-108. Some of these teams have been ranked top in the country while others had forgettable seasons.

Vermont, Syracuse, Boston University, Albany and Connecticut were the top five teams ranked teams the Minutewomen faced in non-conference play. Those teams' combined records equal

Minutewomen take on Tigers in play-in game

By Justin McGrail
Collegian Staff

After winning the Atlantic 10 Championship for the first time since 2001, the Massachusetts field hockey team is set to take on Princeton in a play-in game on Tuesday for a bid to the NCAA Tournament.

This match will be the first meeting between the two teams. Despite never playing each other, they shared four common opponents this season. Both teams played Harvard, Brown, Richmond and Dartmouth. Princeton beat all four and UMass lost to one, Dartmouth.

UMass has played one game at Princeton's Class of '52 Stadium: a 1-0 loss to Penn State in the 1998 NCAA Tournament.

Princeton (13-4, 6-1 Ivy League) is coming off its fourth Ivy League Championship in five years. The Tigers clinched the title with a 3-1 win against Pennsylvania in the final game of the season.

The Tigers began the season slowly, posting a 4-4 record through eight games before going 9-0 for the rest of the season, outscoring their opponents 36-8 during the stretch. Princeton's last loss, 4-3, was against Cornell and the other three losses were against ranked opponents, No. 16 American, No. 6 Penn State and No. 2 Maryland.

Princeton is aiming for its third consecutive trip to the NCAA Tournament and its 13th overall. This is the first time the Tigers have played a play-in game because they received an automatic bid the other 12 times.

UMass coach Justine Sowry has scouted the Tigers well and said that UMass (13-8, 6-1 A-10) will focus on two specific players, senior midfielder Paige Schmidt and sophomore forward Christina Bortz.

Sowry said that Schmidt works the ball well

Berry shines for Mass Attack

Burto continues hot streak

By Joe Melloni

Junior Alex Berry's shorthanded goal in the second period of Saturday's 5-1 win over Merrimack was the second of the season for the Massachusetts hockey team. Chris Davis, who assisted on Berry's goal, scored the first on Oct. 13 against Saint Lawrence.

Last season, the Minutemen scored one shorthanded goal, and it didn't come until the last game of the regular season, a 5-3 win over Maine that clinched home ice in the quarterfinals of the Hockey East Tournament. In 2005-06, the Minutemen tallied four shorthanded goals but allowed six.

Berry also finished the game with a plus-4 rating, the highest so far this season for a UMass player. Against Connecticut last October, both Davis and Cory Quirk rated plus-5 in an 8-1 win. Plus/minus is a statistic used to measure a team's goal differential when a specific player is on the ice.

At times the number can be quite circumstantial, but against Merrimack Berry's plus-4 was a product of his hard work on both special teams play and even strength situations.

No UMass player is minus for the season and five Minutemen have a team high plus-3 rating for the season entering this weekend's action.

Freshman James Marcou and Berry are the only UMass forwards with the plus-3 mark. The pair has skated on the same line in every game this season, and prior to his injury, sophomore Brett Watson centered the line. Jordan Virtue took over for Watson in the weekend series against Providence and against Merrimack freshman Michael Ecomte manned the role.

Berry and Marcou compliment each other very well. Marcou a small, shifty playmaker and Berry, the hefty forward every team needs. Their offensive-mindedness demands that the pivot between them must be a talented defensive player. Watson's cerebral style allows the wingers to take a few more risks offensively knowing he will always be in position.

Burto won't stop

Senior Matt Burto scored the Minutemen's fourth goal against Merrimack pushing his point-scoring streak to four games.

He spent the evening on a line with Virtue and junior Scott Crowder. Crowder is among UMass's most feisty defensive forwards and Virtue does a great job filling in where the Minutemen need him. But the trio worked the puck well to get Burto the chance.

He fired a shot from the left face-off circle, which Merrimack goaltender Andrew Braithwaite appeared to squeeze in between his left arm and chest, but it smack out and dropped across the goal line.

The line also combined for UMass's lone goal against Providence on Oct. 26 when Burto smacked a Virtue rebound by Providence's Chris Mannix.

"They've found a nice rhythm together. It's three experienced players with two juniors and a senior," Cahoon said. "It's a nice situation to be able to match up sometimes against lines that don't have a lot of experience."

Burto has four points on the season and is already halfway to his 2006-07 point total of eight. His career high is the 13 he recorded as a freshman in 2005-06.

"Matt has an offensive flair to his game, and if he keeps throwing pucks at the net, some are going to go in," Cahoon said.

Looking up

After an 0-for-4 performance against Merrimack, the UMass power-play unit's conversion rate is at 10 percent (5-for-50) on the season.

The fluidity of the top unit's puck movement pleased Cahoon against Merrimack.

Senior P.J. Fenton looked more comfortable in the role than he had at any point this season. Cahoon com-

UMass drops in poll

Rancher on sideline as UM falls in Kingston

By Eli Rosenswaike

The 12-6 loss against Rhode Island cost the Massachusetts football team five spots in this week's Sports Network Football Championship Subdivision Poll, but didn't cost the team the lead in the conference standings.

UMass (7-2, 5-1 Colonial Athletic Association) dropped from No. 3 to No. 8 in the poll, ranking one spot behind defending FCS National Champion Appalachian State. Next week's opponent, New Hampshire, fell six spots to No. 14 following a loss to Northeastern Saturday.

The Maroon and White lead the CAA North Division with a 5-1 conference record, leading Hofstra by one game and UNH by two. The Minutemen will take the Wildcats at home this weekend, followed by a game at Hofstra on Nov. 17.

UMass has more wins (45) against URI than any other opponent in school history. Second on that list is UNH as the Minutemen defeated the Wildcats 41 times including twice last season.

The Minutemen had won 17 of their last 21 against the Rams entering Saturday's contest and have won four of the last five against UNH.

Conspicuously absent

A familiar 6-foot-5 frame was noticeably absent on the final play in overtime in the loss to Rhode Island.

UMass wide receiver Rasheed Rancher leads the team with five touchdown receptions and ranks second in both catches (26) and yards (534) – but he was seated on the bench when URI's Adrian Owen intercepted Liam Coen's fourth-down pass to end the game.

Rancher had a rough afternoon, particularly in the first half. On UMass's first play from scrimmage, Rancher fumbled on an end-around, giving the ball to the Rams at the UMass 13-yard line. Place-kicker D.J. Giannecchini drilled a 26-yard field goal into the wind four plays later to take a 3-0 lead.

Coen tried for Rancher five times, with all five resulting in an incomplete pass. Rancher flat dropped the ball several times, while it appeared that there was some miscommunication between the two on others.

UMass coach Don Brown was asked after the game why Rancher wasn't on the field during the game's final play.

"We're rotating guys through there, and it's just a coach's decision," he said.

Lawrence cracks 1,000

Coen fell short of the 99 yards he needed to become the school's all-time leader in passing yards, but redshirt senior Matt Lawrence got the 17 rushing yards he needed to reach the 1,000-yard plateau for the season.

After gaining 11 yards on six carries in the first half, Lawrence got his 999th yard on a 5-yard carry early in the third quarter. He got exactly the 1-yard he needed on his next carry on the following possession. He finished the game with 1,066 yards on the year.

Lawrence's production improved in the second half, and the play calling reflected that as he was handed the ball on nine straight plays at the

TEI sponsors water lecture

By Kristen Healy
Collegian Correspondent

Charles Vörösmarty, a research professor from the University of New Hampshire, spoke about challenges faced by the Earth's water sources at an on-campus lecture Tuesday.

The lecture titled, "Global Hydrology: Lessons from the U.S. Northeast Corridor" is the third of four lectures in the Environmental Lecture Series this semester, which all focus on water sustainability.

Dr. Vörösmarty, who is from the Institute for the Study of Earth, Oceans and Space at UNH and is the founder and director of the Water Systems Analysis Group at UNH, focuses on developing computer models and geospatial data sets in order to study interactions between the water cycle, climate, biogeochemistry, and anthropogenic activities.

According to the the Environmental Institute (TEI) Web site, his research is based around "local, regional, and continental to global-scale modeling of water balance, discharge, constituent fluxes in river systems, and the analysis of the impacts of large-scale water engineering on the terrestrial water cycle."

His talk focused mainly on the many challenges to Earth's water sources, which are due to urbanization, industrial activity and engineering initiatives like dam construction and irrigated agriculture that require great amounts of our water resources.

He also discussed how the Northeast is illustrative of innovations taking place all around the

UM students join national rally

MassPIRG promotes renewable energy bill

By Lucas Correia
Collegian Staff

Several University of Massachusetts students attended Power Shift 2007, a national rally in Washington, D.C., on Monday to lobby for a new bill that should help reduce the effects of global warming.

UMass students, representing the Massachusetts public interest research group (MassPIRG), numbered 25 out of the roughly 6,000 students who took part in the event. Students from more than 500 colleges and 300 congressional districts were in attendance.

The rally was part of the first national youth conference for global warming awareness and marked the largest global warming conference in the history of the United States. Organizers hoped the rally would focus the attention of Congress and current U.S. presidential candidates on the issue of global warming.

"It is widely accepted that the next U.S. president must make global warming a priority for us to solve the crisis before we reach a point of no return," read the organization's Web site. "With youth voting rates on the rise, we have the opportunity to drastically affect the 2008 presidential election and ensure our next president puts us on a path to stopping climate change."

UMass junior Corey Hodges described the event as "in their [Congress's] face," delivering the simple message "this is what we want; this is what we need." Hodges thought Power Shift will have an enormous impact on Congress's decision on the bill.

The trip to Washington was funded by MassPIRG, the Office of Community Service Learning, the UMass Department of Natural Resources and the UMass Alumni Association.

Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi, Massachusetts Congressman Ed Markey and human rights activist Van Jones were among those who came out to speak during the event.

The proposed bill supported by Power Shift would cut the amount of U.S.-produced emissions an estimated 80 percent by 2050.

According to Hodges, the first goal of this bill is to create five million "green jobs" by 2020. The bill would cut subsidies from oil and coal companies, allow

Grass grows greener on 'New Dirt'

Going Green

By Nick Hesse
Collegian Staff

Campus may seem a little greener in the future as the University of Massachusetts has not hesitated to integrate environmentally-friendly technology into "New Dirt" construction.

"Green building" is the practice of improving the efficiency of buildings and their use of energy, water and materials. The goal of green design is to reduce a building's impact on human health and the environment, through methods of design, construction, operation, maintenance and removal.

There are numerous ways to ensure the creation of an environmentally friendly building. One is to use building materials that did not provide environmentally toxic waste products and will not create them in the future. By constructing a properly insulated building, the potential loss of energy to leaking can be stopped.

"Building green involves asking a lot of questions," said UMass architecture professor Ray Kinoshita. "What are the building materials, and where are they coming from? Can they be recycled? How can we reduce the energy that this building consumes?"

Green architecture is one of the most important shifts in the field right now, according to Kinoshita. "In a few years, it will be the standard," he said. "Photovoltaic cells are useful, but they are very expensive still. Geothermal energy systems that harness ground warmth also could contribute in future designs."

A method of improving the "greenness" of buildings becoming more common is the addition of energy supplementation systems. These sometimes-expensive measures can add up, so a significant initial investment is often necessary to make sure a building goes green.

However methods like placing panels of photovoltaic cells on the rooftop of a building give back to those that install them. Such panels can capture sunlight and convert it into electricity that the building can use and will eventually pay themselves over the course of many years.

UMass's first photovoltaic system rests on the roof of the Knowles Engineering Building, and recently the Mullins Center parking lot replaced its streetlight with photovoltaic models, saving the University $3,400 in energy costs.

Another emerging form of energy efficiency method is land recycling. [illegible] Hampshire [illegible] UMass is building an Integrated Science Building that will

Five Colleges AIDS and STD awareness project on display

A quilt decorated by students on the topic of HIV and AIDS is on display in the Student Union Art Gallery this week as part of the "Beyond the Names" project.

In 1992, the Five College AIDS Committee began "Beyond the Names" as a way for students in the colleges to "express all they felt about this epidemic" and memorialize those lost to HIV/AIDS, said Amanda Collings Vann, a University Health Services (UHS) educator and the director of the Women's Health Project and the Not Ready for Bedtime Players.

Recent survey finds declining number of new law students

Fewer applicants, but little effect on level of competition

By Anya Shiff
Collegian Staff

The number of people applying for law schools around the country is on the decline while admission requirements have not changed, according to a survey recently conducted by Kaplan Test Prep and Admissions.

According to the report, of the 190 law schools surveyed, half said their school has seen a decline in applicants over the last two years.

Initially, this would seem to give prospective applicants greater odds of admission. However, 59 percent of the schools surveyed said the decline has not made their admissions process any less competitive.

This, according to Carina Wong, the communications director at Kaplan, is because though the pool of applicants is getting smaller, the qualifications of the applicants has not leveled.

"These results seem unrelated to each other, but applicants in many areas – competition, our admissions officers are seeing that [in] the case," said Wong. "The statistics that the quality of the applicant pool is getting stronger."

According to Steve Mariotti, the Kaplan Test Prep and Admissions Pre-Law Program Director, "[there is] a 4.8 percent decrease in law school applicants around the country. However applications are down [...] 4 percent."

Mariotti said while the number of law school applicants are down post graduate degrees [illegible] are not. The application numbers in other postgraduate degrees, such as engineering and biology, have risen.

"The strength of the economy, the availability of jobs has made it difficult for some students choose graduate [illegible]," said Mariotti. Jailed leader of sect attempted suicide

Students use burnt cookies for torture

Two students at Southern Illinois University in Charles Lindh suffered kidnapped, paralyzed and burned a young man with freshly baked cookies after a drug deal went bad, prosecutors said.

On Monday, Madison County prosecutors charged Kenneth Parker, 20, and Jordan Nalls, 20, each with two counts of aggravated kidnapping and one count of robbery and aggravated battery.

Both were jailed Tuesday in $150,000 bail.

Sheriff's Capt. Brad Wells said that Friday night, three men went to James Hester Friday night to buy marijuana, but two of them grabbed the drugs and fled, leaving the third behind. The suspect held that man, Alby, in his late teens, and told him he needed to find $400 for the drugs, Wells said.

The suspects beat the man with a wooden paddle, burned his neck and shoulders with cookies immediately after taking them from the oven, shaved off some of his hair and poured urine over him from a soda bottle, Wells said.

"It was just sheer torture," Wells said.

Hours later, Wells said, the victim managed to escape and call police after the suspects drove him to a house in trying to get money for the drugs.

The victim sustained severe burning but was not hospitalized.

Both suspects were arrested Saturday morning.

There was no evidence that James or Kathleen had been using drugs before or during the alleged torture, Wells said Tuesday.

"Basically, they ripped them off of their drugs, and they took exception to that," Wells said.

Museum operator arrested

By Sarah McLaughlin
Associated Press

The chief operating officer of the National Children's Museum in Washington was arrested Tuesday on child pornography charges accused of using his work computer to send and receive images of them, according to court records and police.

Kenneth J. Singer, 49, was arrested at his home in Fairfax County, Va., charged with one count of transporting images in a interactive setting as a sexually exploitative act, and one count of possession of child pornography, police said.

Singer was identified in the criminal complaint as a spokesman for the National Children's Museum, which opened in November 2004. The museum, which plans to reopen in 2010 in the Ronald Reagan Building, is not affiliated with the Smithsonian Institution.

The museum's chief executive officer, Jane Chu, said in a statement that Singer was placed on administrative leave Monday and that the museum was cooperating with police.

Police said Singer used the screen name "Baby Doll" to initiate contact with the detective in a chat room. Singer sent the detective about 40 explicit images, including photographs of his wife and home computer, the complaint said.

The images sent from Singer's museum computer depicted sexually explicit behavior between adults, the complaint said. Singer also sent the detective two images with instructions to "just delete it when you are done," it said.

Singer also exchanged images with other people while sending the photographs to the detective in August and September, the complaint said.

Singer was charged with two counts of distributing child pornography in interstate commerce. He was detained Tuesday pending a bail hearing later in the week. If convicted, he could face a prison term of up to 40 years on the most serious charges.

A man who answered the phone at Singer's residence Tuesday said that there was no one to immediately comment on the arrest and that it was not clear who his lawyer might be. Later in the day, a message left at the number for comment was not immediately returned.

The complaint also accused Singer of boasting in his e-mail communications that he worked near "all your favorite" monuments.

MIT sues architect Gehry

The design of MIT's Stata Center, undertaken by Los Angeles-based Gehry Partners, is at the center of the Institute's lawsuit.

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology, citing concerned architect Frank Gehry's ongoing work on Stata Center, is suing Gehry Partners for $3 million in damages for what it contends is poor and rushed design.

The school asserts that the center, completed in spring 2004, has persistent water leakage problems and mold growing in the walls. Four years after completion, water and ice have fallen dangerously from multiple floors and inner areas of the center, causing emergency evacuations and damage.

The suit says MIT paid Los Angeles-based Gehry Partners $15 million to design the Stata Center and then spent $300 million more to build it, which also included fees to Skanska USA Building Inc. The suit filed Oct. 17 seeks unspecified damages.

Gehry Partners did not immediately respond to a call from The Associated Press seeking comment Tuesday, and did not respond to calls and e-mails Monday from The Boston Globe. A spokesman for MIT declined to comment because of the pending lawsuit.

An executive at Skanska's Boston office said Gehry ignored warnings from Skanska and a consulting company before construction that there were flaws in the design. "This is not a construction issue, never has been," said Paul Hewins, executive vice president and area general manager of Skanska USA.

Gehry's work includes the Guggenheim Museum in Bilbao, Spain, and the Walt Disney Concert Hall in Los Angeles.

'Octo-girl' goes under knife to have extra limbs removed

By Gavin Rabinowitz
Associated Press

Revered by some in her village as the reincarnation of a Hindu goddess, a two-year-old girl born with four arms and four legs was undergoing surgery Tuesday to leave her with a normal body.

The girl named Lakshmi is joined to a "parasitic twin" that stopped developing in the mother's womb. The surviving fetus absorbed the limbs, kidneys and other body parts of the undeveloped fetus.

A team of 30 doctors was removing the extra limbs and organs, surgery that if successful would give her a good chance to live past adolescence. They have already separated the fused spines and the next step is to remove the extra limbs and the rest of the "parasite," said Dr. Sharan Patil, the orthopedic surgeon leading the operation.

"As of now, the child has been responding very well," Patil said several hours into the operation.

Children born with deformities in deeply traditional rural parts of India, like the remote village in the northern state of Bihar that Lakshmi hails from, are often viewed as reincarnated gods. The young girl is no different – she is named after the four-armed Hindu goddess of wealth and her parents say she is revered in her village.

"Everybody considers her a goddess at our village," said her father, Shambhu, who goes by one name.

All this expenditure has happened to make her normal. So far, everything is fine."

Others sought to make money from Lakshmi. Her parents kept her in hiding after a circus apparently tried to buy the girl, they said.

The complications for Lakshmi's surgery are myriad. The two spines are merged, she has four kidneys, entangled nerves, two stomach cavities and two chest cavities. She cannot stand up or walk.

"It's a big team effort of a lot of skilled surgeons who will be putting their heart and soul into solving the problem of Lakshmi," Patil said earlier in the day. "It's going to take many, many hours on a continuous basis to operate on the baby. So these issues definitely make it complex."

Patil put the risk of losing Lakshmi between 20 and 25 percent. Doctors have said the best-case scenario after the surgery is that she will walk and function as a normal child.

Doctors at Sparsh Hospital in Bangalore, where the girl is undergoing surgery, said she is popular among the staff and patients. The hospital's foundation is paying for the operation because the girl's family could not afford the medical bills.

"She's a very cute girl," Dr. Patil Mamatha said. "She's very playful and gets along well with others."

Speaker discusses climate change and water systems

world. In a map showing the construction of dams and reservoirs in the United States over the past 200 years, the majority of developments occurred in the Northeast.

With this trend in mind, Vörösmarty asked, "How and why did hydraulic engineering works evolve in the Northeast corridor?"

Theorizing that this trend is emblematic of water development globally, he asked, "What is its likely trajectory in the future?"

The lecture posed many questions still being pondered by specialists in global hydrology. Vörösmarty offered the theories he, his colleagues and his students have been researching and developing.

He addressed the climate change occurring globally and how it has affected the Earth's water systems. The strong signature of climate change has had and continues to have dramatic effects on not only people, but animals like polar bears in the arctic regions.

"Issues that have to do with the well being of humans automatically have to do with water," said Vörösmarty. "If we look at our lives in terms of food security, cleaning and bathing, aquatic ecosystems that have a number of advantages for humans, and water for development such as dams and reservoirs, every aspect of our lives is affected by our water systems."

In today's world, scarcity and sanitation of water are major issues for many countries, especially in Asia and Africa. About 1.1 billion people globally don't have clean drinking water and 2.6 billion people lack basic sanitation for their water. There are millions of deaths every year from diseases due to a lack of the availability of healthy drinking water, according to Vörösmarty.

"Increasing population growth and increase in aspiration for standard of living will mean a need for more control structure to serve the needs of these people," Vörösmarty said.

This will bring out the development of more irrigation systems, dams, reservoirs, and inter-basin transfer and flow diversions, he said. The earth system sciences have also been developing satellite systems to track water systems globally.

"Contributions from earth system sciences are creating new ways to view the global water crisis," Vörösmarty said.

Lecture series are organized every semester to bring social scientists, natural scientists, engineers and policy makers to the University to examine a particular environmental issue from various viewpoints. Environmental issues from past semesters have included energy for the future, disasters, environment and public policy, the global environment and health, global climate change, and hazardous wastes. The lecture series planned for spring 2008 will focus on food systems and the environment.

Those involved hope to inform more people on policies and improve management of the water supplies because each area of the globe is being constantly affected by the Earth's water supplies and how they are managed.

Campus construction integrates green tech employ a heat recovery wheel for lab areas, which will remove latent heat in the summer and add heat during the winter.

Rainwater from the ISB's roof will also be recycled and stored, lowering the amount of water discharged into the campus sewer system. The building will also feature a "roof garden" of grass turf, which can help keep a building cool in the summer and warm in the winter.

During the planning of the in the recently constructed North Residential Area Apartments, designers also integrated green technology. Each apartment has two zones of temperature control of its space, with one zone in the living room areas and one zone for the bedrooms. This environmentally-friendly system minimizes overheating and over-cooling.

The North Apartments also feature a building automation system that lets occupants know when they should open their windows, with indicator lights in each lobby.

The new Studio Arts Building under construction will incorporate many green design concepts. South-facing widows will be equipped with sun-shading devices that allow winter sun energy to be brought in to the building, but shade the building from summer heat. The building will also employ occupancy sensors to turn lights off automatically when rooms are unoccupied.

A $43 million energy conservation project for the entire campus is now being undertaken by the UMass Physical Plant. The project includes more energy-efficient lighting and lighting controls, and water conservation measures including low flow toilets. To date there has been a 24 percent reduction in steam, 9 percent reduction in electricity, and 36 percent reduction in water consumption compared to 2004.

The new Central Heating Plant under construction should reduce the amount of greenhouse gases by 700 percent, and will implement the latest pollution control technologies. These include advanced combustion turbine low NO_x burners, which are gas burners that significantly reduce the formation of nitrogen oxides, and advanced selective catalytic reduction and oxidation catalyst pollution control technologies.

When the Central Heating Plant opens in the spring of 2008, it will utilize technologies not available before its construction. It will also feature some of the most stringent air quality permit requirements for a facility of its kind in the United States.

The plant will also use recycled municipal wastewater for its boilers, which should reduce the demand for processed water on the local public drinking water system – currently fed by groundwater wells – by up to 200,000 gallons per day. A heat recovery steam generator will use the exhaust heat from the gas turbine to produce steam for campus heating year-round.

UMass has a high-tech computerized energy management system in place. Microprocessor control systems have been set up so each building on campus is monitored for its minute-by-minute usage of electricity, water and steam through centralized controls and timers.

The campus won a Demand Response Management award from energy provider ISO New England for reducing its power requirements by 1.5 megawatts in response to a heat wave in the summer of 2006, a direct result of this system's being in place.

A large part of building "green" involves incorporating the LEED certification process into a project. The Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design (LEED) Green Building Rating System is the national and worldwide benchmark for the design, construction and operation of high-performance green buildings. The LEED process provides a form of independent, third-party verification, and guarantees that a building is environmentally responsible, profitable, and a healthy place to live and work.

The new Central Heating Plant, set to be finished in the spring of 2008, will feature stringent air quality requirements and use recycled municipal wastewater for its boilers.

LEED certified buildings on sliding scale, with the highest certification being platinum, followed by gold, silver, bronze and certified. Yet, building completed by the Massachusetts State Government costing over $50 million must have at least certified rating, including projects done by UMass.

the workers to move to jobs working with renewable resources such as solar and wind power and aim to eliminate coal completely as a power source.

The next component of the bill would increase fuel efficiency. The average fuel efficiency rate is currently 27 miles per gallon (mpg) for cars, and 21 mpg for trucks. The bill sets out to create a standard minimum of 35 mpg for all vehicles.

According to the student PIRG Web site, the bill would require a new renewable electricity standard. At least 15 percent of the resources used by all power companies must be renewable resources by the year 2020. This excludes nuclear waste, municipal solid waste or other non-organic wastes. Additionally, subsidies would be cut for liquid coal and nuclear energy.

(ABA). According to the ABA, the national law school enrollment and law degree distribution has steadily increased since 2000.

According to the ABA numbers, 132,464 people were enrolled in law schools in the 2000-2001 academic year, while 148,698 people were enrolled in law school in the 2006-2007 academic year. The ABA also reported the first-year enrollment totals have increased from 43,518 in 2000 to 49,937 in 2006.

Marietti warns that the numbers reported by the Kaplan surveys could change drastically from year to year and should not be weighed heavily.

"The events we see in place here are really relative to the current time period," he said. "These statistics will have their ups and downs, just like any other sort of statistical graph. What this means, though, is that students need to take advantage of the stats."

Quilt exhibition marks 15th anniversary

1992 and 1998 decorated fabric squares addressing. "This is how I feel about HIV and AIDS." The individual squares have been sewn together into quilt-sized panels. The project is similar to a collection that used to be displayed in Washington, D.C., but has been tucked away since 1996, the last year it has been displayed in its entirety.

At this 15th anniversary exhibit, visitors can add their voices to the project by creating their own quilt square, according to the event Web site – a reminder that this issue is not ready to be contained in the history books yet.

Statements such as "Don't be silly, wrap your willy" and reminders that "HIV is not a death sentence" mingle with squares memorializing individuals lost to disease.

At the opening reception last night, Vann introduced the project and other programs through the University such as "the Everywoman's Center as ways to 'make great new strides fighting this disease.'"

Dr. Wilmore C. Webley, an assistant research professor of microbiology, was the keynote speaker. He receives many invitations to speak on sexually transmitted infections, including HIV/AIDS and his current research on chlamydia. This exhibit, he said, is one he knew "he actually wanted to do."

His speech covered the history of the HIV epidemic, framing the time in terms familiar to many college students today. In 1981, "the year of MTV ... and Madonna became popular," the first case of HIV was detected in the United States, without headlines or powerful imagery to bring it into the population's general mindset. In 1985 that would no longer be the case, as it had a name: AIDS.

From 1985 to 1992 more cases of the disease and more media coverage helped to increase awareness and testing within the general population.

This is no longer the case, according to Webley. "No one talks about HIV/AIDS anymore," he said.

Because of this, the number of individuals with this disease has increased in the past three years. Approximately "20,000 people in the U.S will die from the disease this year," he said.

The Massachusetts Department of Public Health cited 27 cases of HIV/AIDS in Amherst first month and 38 cases recorded in Northampton.

The exhibit reminds visitors that the best way to combat the epidemic is not to ignore it. Along with the display is a resource table with information about resources on campus and in the area. Anonymous HIV testing is available at UHS and is encouraged for anyone who has had unprotected vaginal, oral or anal sex, shared needles or syringes, or shared piercing equipment, according to their Web site.

The 15th anniversary exhibition of the "Beyond the Names" quilt is currently being housed in the Student Union Art Gallery.

No qualms about scabbing

Dan Nicastro

Pretty soon you may start to notice that there's nothing new on television, and that's not a metaphor. Twelve thousand members of the Writers Guild of America (WGA) walked off the job Monday, forcing networks to only show reruns of shows such as "Late Show with David Letterman" or "The Daily Show." This is a battle that may last for a long time, leaving television studios scrambling to find new programming.

While I generally try not to support big corporate conglomerations, I must begrudgingly admit that I hope this labor strike is not settled anytime soon. It's not that I'm anti-union. On the contrary, I enjoy the weekend greatly, I've known who Studs Terkel was since I was seven and I've even seen his horribly dated play, "Working." No, I'm supporting the networks because I think I may have a chance to make it in Hollywood as a scab.

In order to prove my worth and pass out my talent to all the major television studios, I've compiled a list of my own, completely original plot outlines to current television shows.

"The Late Show with David Letterman" is a good place to start. David Letterman is a very funny man with very funny writers. However, anyone can effectively execute a Top Ten List and I have tons of ideas. How about "Top Ten Reasons Paris Hilton Should Be Lindsey Lohan's Sponsor in Therapy," or "Top Ten Reasons Why Larry Craig Was Tapping His Foot?" In fact, it's amazing Letterman has been able to do this for so long without anyone else ripping him off, as the jokes pretty much write themselves.

I have dreamed of writing for "The Daily Show" since I was about 14 and now that dream is closer than ever to coming true. The writers are often credited with being extremely intelligent and witty, as they are able to take complex issues and break them down into biting satire.

However, there's definitely a formula to the madness. The three main staples of "The Daily Show" are Larry "wide stance" Craig references, allusions to Dick Cheney shooting an old man in the face and Jon Stewart's doing a hunched over impression of George W. Bush. Seeing as I pretty much do all three in normal conversation (in fact, I've already made a Larry Craig joke in this column), I think I'm golden. Plus, if Comedy Central gave a show to Carlos Mencia, there is no reason they should not give one to me.

I'm supporting the networks because I think I may have a chance to make it in Hollywood as a scab.

As with many actors and writers, I can also suddenly switch tone and make the jump to drama. Since I've seen more "Law & Order" than any sane person should, I think I could probably muddle through the subtle nuances of a police procedural. Here's my plot outline:

Random strangers find body, bidden in bushes in Central Park (dun dun); detectives arrive on the scene, make some grumbling reference to CSI, and start investigation with victim's spouse. Detectives then talk with several other acquaintances and possible work-related motives before returning to the spouse as the culprit; possibly in killer-for-hire situation (dun dun). DA prosecutes and is disgusted at degeneration of society. Judge suppresses key evidence because of botched handling by detectives (dun dun). Just when case is about to be wrapped up, there's a special twist no one will see coming (dun dun).

Done and done. NBC, my e-mail address is at the end of this column. I expect to be hearing from you very soon.

The best part about some of these shows is that I will fit right in as a replacement writer. For example, if you watched the third season of "Lost" you would think a writer's strike had already taken place. "Lost" is a show that would be easy to write for, since anything can happen on the mysterious island the characters inhabit. Here's my idea for the plot twist in the upcoming Season Four: the survivors of the crash from Season One find out that instead of being stranded on a mysterious island, they were actually in an uninhabited part of Cuba. After a death-defying escape, several of the passengers are captured and detained in Guantanamo Bay. It's a concept which is both entertaining and topical. Everybody wins.

These are just a small sample of my untapped creativity. To any and all television executives who spend their time poring over college newspapers, I want to say that there are plenty more ideas like these which could revitalize and reinvent the television industry. So if any media conglomerates are listening, remember that I'm available at your convenience and I'm not at all above working as a scab.

Ron Paul's no 'real' Republican

Ben Duffy

Republican presidential candidate Ron Paul has a cult following that reminds me of ... well, a cult. His followers are everywhere. The Cult of Paul irritates me to me to no end.

OK, so maybe that's too harsh. In reality, there are two kinds of Ron Paul supporters – the genuine Paul supporters, and the ones who don't know a thing about him, they just think it's cool that he's an "anti-war" Republican. The phony Paul supporters definitely win the prize for most annoying. The genuine Paul supporters are slightly less annoying.

Where I disagree with Paul the most is where he has solidified his support – namely, opposition to the Iraq war. The invasion was justified, the fight to secure Iraq is winnable, and the consequences of leaving the job unfinished are dire.

So you can imagine how I feel whenever a Ron Paul supporter starts reading his talking points to me. There I am, just sitting there at the Republican Club table in the campus center, and along comes a member of the Ron Paul Faithful.

"Whatever happened to fiscal conservatism? Do you know how much this war is costing?" he lectures. "I don't know where the Republican Party went wrong, they used to be anti-imperialist."

The lecture sounds especially disingenuous coming from someone who doesn't actually want a Ron Paul presidency. Nothing angers me more than a dishonest debater – someone who reiterates arguments he really doesn't believe, just to win a debate.

Conservative commentator Tucker Carlson set these people straight on "Real Time with Bill Maher." The courageous conservative appeared on the air with three ultra-liberals: Jos. Behar, Paul Krugman, and of course Hill Maher. All three liberals were singing the praises of Ron Paul as the only sane man remaining in the Republican Party. I nearly died laughing when Carlson commented, "Can we all stop pretending to love Ron Paul?"

Seriously, people. If Paul were president, Behar, Krugman and Maher would despise him. They like Paul because he is an irritant to the Republican Party, someone they can point to and say, "See, now there's a good Republican."

I have a friend named Dennis who is a die-hard Ron Paul supporter. Dennis and I saw Congressman Paul speak at the Conservative Political Action Conference last March. Afterward, we had a chance to meet him. When Dennis looked at Paul, he saw a great leader; I saw a man with senility creeping in.

Where I disagree with Paul the most is where he has solidified his support – namely, opposition to the Iraq war.

But Dennis is not a fake supporter – he likes the entire Ron Paul package. I think Paul's ideas are just too radical. "What's radical about following the Constitution?" Dennis retorts.

Well, nothing and everything. Ron Paul is radical because he's probably the last man in Washington who really cares about a constitutional doctrine called enumerated powers. The enumerated powers doctrine means the federal government is authorized to do only what is explicitly permitted by the Constitution. We've gotten into the habit of thinking the federal government can do whatever it wants as long as the Constitution does not specifically prohibit it. Just google "10th Amendment," and you'll see.

Over time, the 10th Amendment has been lost. Both political parties and all three branches of government share the blame for the demise of enumerated powers.

For example, the Constitution does not call for a federal law enforcement agency, and yet I can count three – the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Agency, and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. It doesn't permit funding higher education, yet we have the U.S. Department of Education.

It's staggering to think how different our country would be if every government official followed the Ron Paul philosophy. Tucker Carlson explained to his fellow roundtables guests what Ron Paul means when he says that he wants to follow the Constitution: "...following the Constitution means getting rid of all the middle class subsidies, and all the things we take for granted, and actually taking responsibility for yourself. And nobody really wants to do that."

Carlson is right. Nobody does want that; they just jump on Paul's bandwagon in order to stir up revolt in the Republican ranks.

The ultimate example of disingenuous Paul cheerleading came this summer when The Valley Advocate ran a flattering Ron Paul cover story. So now the hyper-liberal Advocate loves Ron Paul too? Give me a break. The writer, Phil Maymin, sounded like the most dishonest debater I have ever heard. He even compared Paul to Ronald Reagan, which must have made the Advocate cringe. Am I supposed to believe that the Advocate ever had anything nice to say about Reagan while he was in office?

The most ignorant line of the entire article is when Maymin stated: "Both [Reagan and Paul] believed in a strong military, for defensive purposes only, not empire building."

What we are doing today in Iraq and Afghanistan is hardly "empire-building," but if you consider all interventions in foreign affairs to be "empire-building," then the two men have absolutely nothing in common. Ron Paul prides himself on staying out of foreign affairs. Reagan was a super-interventionist. Reagan sent Marines to Lebanon, invaded Grenada, and bombed Libya. He supported anti-Communist forces in Central America, and anti-Soviet Mujahideen in Afghanistan.

The Reagan-Paul comparison is ludicrous, and it's simply a reiteration of the hackneyed lecture that Paul is a "real Republican." If I have to listen to another Ron Paul supporter lecture me about how Paul represents "real Republicans," I am going to vomit.

Ben Duffy writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at bduffy@student.umass.edu

Ron Paul supporters tout the Republican candidate as one even Ronald Reagan would be proud of. However, there is more to Paul's policies than meets the eye.

Proliferating problems in Pakistan

Evan Powers

When Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf declared a state of emergency Saturday, he called it a move that would best quell the steadily-increasing militant attacks and prevent any further interference of government policy by the country's judiciary members.

As part of his emergency declaration, Musharraf has shut down the country's constitution, fired the chief justice of the Supreme Court and ordered the military to take over TV broadcasting stations. This emergency declaration comes exactly two weeks before Pakistan's Supreme Court was scheduled to rule on the legality of Musharraf's candidacy for another term as president, something that the Pakistani population is increasingly opposed to.

With his back seemingly against the wall with unhappy countrymen and women over the legitimacy of his presidency, continuing pressure from the United States to combat al-Qaida along the border of Afghanistan, and growing criticism of his attempts to make Pakistan a democratically-run country, it's becoming more and more apparent to me that this is an attempt to quiet those who oppose him. Doesn't it seem hypocritical for Musharraf to claim that his goal is to establish democracy, which by definition is a government of the people, and then turn around and take away their basic rights?

With the expulsion of the country's constitution, some of the rights granted to the people that are now taken away from them include the right to free speech, protection of property rights, and the right to free movement.

In his overhaul of the country's media, Musharraf has also declared that broadcasters will receive a three-year jail sentence if they're found to be ridiculing the government or members of the armed forces.

It's clear that Musharraf is highly unpopular among Pakistani citizens, stemming from his questionable legitimacy as leader of the country after he appointed himself from chief executive to the President after a military coup in 1999, and from accusations of corruption in office and allowing poverty to grow out of control. With tension mounting from the public, talking away their basic human rights will certainly not help Musharraf's cause.

Pakistan's supreme court sides with the public's opinion. Chief Justice Iftikhar Mohammed Chaudhry declared the state of emergency illegal and claimed Musharraf had no power to suspend the constitution. Soon after his comments, Chaudhry was relieved of his duties, thereby silencing another critic of his decision. Hand-picked by Musharraf, many believe Chaudhry was expelled because Musharraf was worried that he would put a hold on his army chief post in the upcoming fall 2007 presidential elections, thereby making him only a civilian president.

Many Pakistanis strongly contest that Musharraf should not take part in the upcoming election, but he clearly does not want to go quietly. I can't begin to understand how Musharraf expects people to be able to reason with him on this decision, especially considering the growing amount of protestors in Pakistan who are voicing their support for Chaudry and their displeasure with the president's attempt to extend his time in office for another five years.

Even the Bush administration has to be nervous about the current situation in Pakistan, as they have long been trying to form long-term relations with citizens to avoid losing them to Islamic extremism and al-Qaida. With the state of emergency declared and tension between Musharraf and the public reaching a head, things could quickly spiral out of control for both sides.

Despite being considered by the United States to be an ally against terrorism and someone who vows to make Pakistan a country governed by democracy, Musharraf is doing anything but that by issuing a state of emergency. I don't see any democracy in a decision made by one man – not only the president of a country, but also the leader of the military – to take away fundamental rights given to people.

I can't see how taking away the power of the justice system and removing all basic rights from the people is really for the good of the country.

Under the Pakistani constitution, it was written that Musharraf couldn't run for another term while serving both as president and military leader. So what has he done to solve this? He's eliminated the one document that keeps his powers in check, and he's silenced the entire country from speaking out against his actions. Anyone that does speak out against him, by his ruling party, and the military that he's currently commanding to keep the media from broadcasting the news faces legal punishments.

Does this remind anyone of the Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi-led secret police and the Iranian Revolution 25 years ago?

Is this someone who should be leading a country toward democracy? Musharraf says his decision to declare a state of emergency was "for the good of Pakistan." When a country enters a period of turmoil, I can't see how taking away the power of the justice system and removing all basic rights from the people is really for the good of the country. Former Pakistani Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto says Musharraf is becoming a dictator in Pakistan, the very opposite idea of a leader heading a democratically-run country.

It seems rather unconstitutional to strip people of the rights mandated by constitution. But I guess when the highest court in a country is facing a crisis, it's about power, and not about the laws.

Good 'Gangster'

Denzel Washington and Russell Crowe share screen in latest Ridley Scott film

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Correspondent

Set in the early 1970s against a backdrop of urban decay and corruption, "American Gangster" aims to be more than another crime drama. It tries to show that Harlem's gangsters aren't crooks, but rather businessmen with dreams.

Denzel Washington stars as Frank Lucas, a debt collector and driver for legendary crime boss Bumpy Johnson (Clarence Williams III). When Johnson kicks the bucket early in the film's narrative, his death provides a vacuum of power on the streets of Harlem that Lucas is all too eager to fill.

Tapping his predecessor's system of Mafia partnership and free turkeys at Thanksgiving, Lucas takes the crime game one step further when he begins importing heroin direct from Southeast Asia.

Selling speed at half the price for twice the potency has profits running high for Lucas and his trail of associates.

To ensure the integrity of his product, Lucas drives out the competition with a mixture of violence and swift business acumen. Cuba Gooding Jr. gets off with a stern warning, but other pushers do not fare as well. In a move straight out of "New Jack City," Lucas also enforces a strict nudity policy at the mixing tables.

Frank Lucas occupies half the script's concentration; the rest belongs to Richie Roberts (Russell Crowe), a straight-laced New Jersey detective whose reputation precedes him. After turning in a million dollars in unmarked bills, Roberts finds himself ostracized from a department known largely for taking handouts. To compound his troubles, he and his wife (Carla Gugino) are going through a divorce. Lucky for him, law school provides a distraction.

Clocking in at just over two and a half hours, the film allows time for each side of the story to unfold. However, director Ridley Scott ("Alien," "Gladiator") seems out of form navigating through Harlem's criminal underbelly. It's a solid effort, but it lacks brutality. Set and costuming conspire to give the film a pulp feel that is lacking elsewhere.

Similarly Denzel Washington's performance is up to suspect. He wears Lucas' ruthlessness with rigidity. The performance is a crossroads, with the actor reconciling his love of playing the hero with the success he's found in the past playing more villainous roles. The result, a villain with a heart of gold, seems insincere.

Russell Crowe fares better, but his performance is reined in. Among his talents is an ability to act through the trappings of a period drama to deliver a strong performance, and it is no different here. He's not deterred by what might normally trip up the everyday actor – wigs, costumes, accents, and mannerisms are all his friends.

The script, adapted from Mark Jacobson's article "Return of Superfly," plays out methodically. It's insistence on giving equal screen time to Lucas and Roberts serves as a detriment to pacing. Frankly, Roberts' life just isn't as exciting as the life of a millionaire drug boss. Much of what comprises his segment of the story appears excessive – his divorce and his womanizing, while interesting factoids to the character, are unimportant to the story at hand.

Another dilemma is that it takes Roberts and Lucas too long to finally face off. Those in the audience waiting for a satisfying Russell Crowe/Denzel Washington square-off are left hanging until the very end.

Ultimately, the film wants to make a case for Lucas as a legitimate businessman, or nothing more than an example of American entrepreneurialism. In doing so, it turns the villain into something more akin to a tragic hero. But which is the greater truth? The simple answer is that he is both, but the script fails to provide an intersection between these two identities.

Sure, Lucas indulges his family, employs his brothers, and takes his mother to church every Sunday. He has all the trappings of a decent man, but the character seems devoid of humanity. After all, a man who can so easily set another man on fire and pump him with bullets as he burns can't be a good man underneath it all – or can he?

As much as Lucas is an allegory for success, so Roberts, who stands behind his morals, is not. This is clearest during a montage of the holidays. Lucas, the man who has set principle aside for gain, is seen happy, surrounded by a loving family. Roberts, the man who refuses to compromise, stands alone in his kitchen eating out of a can, with only the soft murmur of the television to keep him company.

The film serves as an indictment of a capitalist system which turns poor men into villains and principled men into saps. Where Roberts and Lucas intersect, however, there is catharsis, for even though capitalism may not deliver to each man his just desserts, the legal system does.

As social commentary, "American Gangster" has something interesting to say. However, as a crime drama, "American Gangster" falls short of the mark, relying on recycled material to get the story where it needs to go.

Those expecting something akin to "Good Fellas" will likely leave disappointed. Here, crime is just the medium employed to deliver a larger message: the rise and fall of Frank Lucas, nothing more than a shroud over the true objectives of the film.

Denzel Washington and Russell Crowe team up in "American Gangster." The film is based on the article "Return of Superfly" by Mark Jacobson.

Heat clouds judgment: a report from afar

French couple debates about the perfect postcard

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

Pau, France takes a while to warm up. I'm no expert on the weather, but being so close to the Pyrenees Mountains, I know this is not surprising. Those massive ranges mess everything up as far as consistent weather goes, no matter where you are.

Pau is a city unknown to many, even many Parisians don't know where it is. It's the capital of the Pyrenees-Atlantiques, a land of rugby and wine. In the morning, the whole city takes a breath and, for the most part, leaves time for its residents to be dazed and scrambling for a cafe au lait – that is, until around 12:30 or 1 p.m. Then something pretty drastic happens. The city itself actually starts to sweat. It's as though it's showtime – the clouds part and the sun takes center stage. And once it happens, forget it.

I've most of the days my international group and I have been here, this routine has followed suit. If you're fortunate enough to witness the event under the cover of shade, the progression is rather quite amusing. While accustomed residents know to relax and gauge the sun's trajectories, tourists and international students are almost always caught off guard.

It was a sunny day, and reasonably warm when a British couple strolled down the Boulevard de Pyrenees, eyeing the different shops and cafes. The sun had yet to hit that special spot in the sky. It was 12:40 p.m.

"Oh, let's go get a postcard, send it to Leslie or something," the woman had said. She was donning a long-sleeved Polo shirt, tugged by a sweat-shirt around the shoulders, and wearing tight denim jeans. In the morning, this outfit was a reasonable choice. It's not out of the ordinary to actually see a bit of your breath if you wake up early enough. A bit misleading, certainly, but it's all part of Pau's routine.

"Oh, what a good idea. Let's." Her husband was older and wearing a somewhat cooler outfit – a grey, button down T-shirt and long Polo shorts. In a matter of 10 minutes, these shorts wouldn't make any difference.

Pau France is the capital of Pyrenees-Atlantiques, but is still widely forgotten by most residents of France. The casual atmosphere and high afternoon temperatures make the city a great place for outsiders to people-watch.

They were a simple couple, a bit particular and both very proud fans of Polo, but certainly not out of place. Pau is a popular hub for English tourists, and has been for ages. Along with the First Anglican Church, Pau is home to Europe's first golf course. It is a golf fanatic's Mecca. The train station also harbors nine round trips to Paris every day. There is a healthy mix of residents and foreigners around the city but once you hit the international huts near the train station, you start to notice more luggage tags, freckled skin, and names like Robert, Franklin and Chet popping up.

Following the couple around the tourist booth, I could see their agitation growing.

"That one. You want to buy that one honestly? How about this one instead?"

"That one is hideous. The bear looks like it's been Photo-shopped."

The man wiped sweat from his brow. On a sign down the street, the temperature had already risen several degrees.

"Let's get going, eh? We can buy one later."

"No. We're here already, Harold, let's have a look. Oh, 7."

The weather was stirring up the wife quite nicely, just a few minutes into the ordeal – and now she simply had to buy a postcard. So at this point, I enlist, I guess, would really love a postcard from Pau, even if it was Photo-shopped.

"See that one – you could have just as easily taken that one. Just push this back, push it back."

The husband was now trying, for some reason, to describe the picture-taking process. It was as if he thought his wife would head out to the Pyrenees that afternoon and snap her own picture. He held his hand on the now-limp sweaty postcard, and told her exactly how he thought the picture was taken. He did so by trying to push the rocky cliff in the foreground "back." I have to admit I was lost – but so was the wife. She merely looked at him as bewilderment as she dropped her sweatshirt and unbuttoned her Polo.

"Give me one euro, Harold."

"Just push it back. Harold shrugged his body twisted his hips. He was growing uncomfortable, getting louder, getting greasier with sweat, but getting nowhere with the postcard. I still couldn't find his reasoning in capturing this picture, even as I hilariously (and vicious) attempted to follow his instructions myself. I wanted to cry for people like Leslie. Harold, in blazing heat, crying would be too much either.

"A euro, Harold. Now!" but she demanded.

Both parties were red in the face, and as Harold shook, dropped the euro into the hand, the two now had beads of sweat dribbling down their foreheads. They bore a look of utter contempt, how I've seen other and me Photo-shopped bear. The humidity had straightened any passion they once had. It was going to be a hot day in Pau.

The sequence of confusion and utter frustration was amazing to watch from a safe distance. In the course of one afternoon, a pleasant trip to the Boulangerie in Gelos or an Square or a short visit to the Chateau de Pau can turn hellish. This sort of heat can drive people to pull out hair by the roots in large clumps, can divide whole families after several hours, can set off a catastrophic series of events at any moment. I have seen this here before – this sort of heat simply ruins lives.

No qualms about scabbing

Dan Nicastro

Pretty soon you may start to notice that there's nothing new on television, and that's not a metaphor. Twelve thousand members of the Writers Guild of America (WGA) walked off the job Monday, forcing networks to only show reruns of shows such as "Late Show with David Letterman" or "The Daily Show." This is a battle that may last for a long time, leaving television studios scrambling to find new programming.

While I generally try not to support big corporate conglomerations, I must begrudgingly admit that I hope this labor strike is not settled anytime soon. It's not that I'm anti-union. On the contrary, I enjoy the weekend greatly. I've known who Studs Terkel was since I was seven and I've even seen his horribly dated play, "Working." No, I'm supporting the networks because I think I may have a chance to make it in Hollywood as a scab.

In order to prove my worth and pass out my talent to all the major television studios, I've compiled a list of my own, completely original plot outlines to current television shows.

"The Late Show with David Letterman" is a good place to start. David Letterman is a very funny man with very funny writers. However, anyone can effectively execute a Top Ten List and I have tons of ideas. How about "Top Ten Reasons Paris Hilton Should Be Lindsey Lohan's Sponsor in Therapy," or "Top Ten Reasons Why Larry Craig Was Tapping His Foot?" In fact, it's amazing Letterman has been able to do this for so long without anyone else ripping him off, as the jokes pretty much write themselves.

I have dreamed of writing for "The Daily Show" since I was about 14 and now that dream is closer than ever to coming true. The writers are often credited with being extremely intelligent and witty, as they are able to take complex issues and break them down into biting satire.

However, there's definitely a formula to the madness. The three main staples of "The Daily Show" are Larry 'wide stance' Craig references, allusions to Dick Cheney shooting an old man in the face and Jon Stewart's doing a hunched over impression of George W. Bush. Seeing as I pretty much do all three in normal conversation (in fact, I've already made a Larry Craig joke in this column), I think I'm golden. Plus, if Comedy Central gave a show to Carlos Mencia, there is no reason they should not give one to me.

I'm supporting the networks because I think I may have a chance to make it in Hollywood as a scab.

As with many actors and writers, I can also suddenly switch tone and make the jump to drama. Since I've seen more "Law & Order" than any sane person should, I think I could probably muddle through the subtle nuances of a police procedural. Here's my plot outline:

Random strangers find body hidden in bushes in Central Park (dun dun); detectives arrive on the scene, make some grumbling reference to CSI, and start investigation with victim's spouse. Detectives then talk with several other acquaintances and possible work-related motives before returning to the spouse as the culprit, possibly in killer-for-hire situation (dun dun). DA prosecutes and is disgusted at degeneration of society. Judge suppresses key evidence because of botched handling by detectives (dun dun). Just when case is about to be wrapped up, there's a special twist no one will see coming (dun dun).

Done and done. NBC, my e-mail address is at the end of this column. I expect to be hearing from you very soon.

The best part about some of these shows is that I will fit right in as a replacement writer. For example, if you watched the third season of "Lost" you would think a writer's strike had already taken place. "Lost" is a show that would be easy to write for, since anything can happen on the mysterious island the characters inhabit. Here's my idea for the plot twist in the upcoming Season Four: the survivors of the crash from Season One find out that instead of being stranded on a mysterious island, they were actually in an uninhabited part of Cuba. After a death-defying escape, several of the passengers are captured and detained in Guantanamo Bay. It's a concept which is both entertaining and topical. Everybody wins.

These are just a small sample of my untapped creativity. To any and all television executives who spend their time poring over college newspapers, I want to say that there are plenty more ideas like these which could revitalize and reinvent the television industry. So if any media conglomerates are listening, remember that I'm available at your convenience and I'm not at all above working as a scab.

Ron Paul's no 'real' Republican

Ben Duffy

Republican presidential candidate Ron Paul has a cult following that reminds me of ... well, a cult. His followers are everywhere. The Cult of Paul irritates me to me to no end.

Ok, so maybe that's too harsh. In reality, there are two kinds of Ron Paul supporters – the genuine Paul supporters, and the ones who don't know a thing about him, they just think it's cool that he's an "anti-war" Republican. The phony Paul supporters definitely win the prize for most annoying. The genuine Paul supporters are slightly less annoying.

Where I disagree with Paul the most is where he has solidified his support – namely, opposition to the Iraq war. The invasion was justified, the fight to secure Iraq is winnable, and the consequences of leaving the job unfinished are dire.

So you can imagine how I feel whenever a Ron Paul supporter starts reading his talking points to me. There I am, just sitting there at the Republican Club table in the campus center, and along comes a member of the Ron Paul Faithful.

"Whatever happened to fiscal conservatism? Do you know how much this war is costing?" he lectures. "I don't know where the Republican Party went wrong; they used to be anti-imperialist."

The lecture sounds especially disingenuous coming from someone who doesn't actually want a Ron Paul presidency. Nothing angers me more than a dishonest debater – someone who reiterates arguments he really doesn't believe, just to win a debate.

Where I disagree with Paul the most is where he has solidified his support – namely, opposition to the Iraq war.

Conservative commentator Tucker Carlson set these people straight on "Real Time with Bill Maher." The courageous conservative appeared on the air with three ultra-liberals: Joy Behar, Paul Krugman, and of course Bill Maher. All three liberals were singing the praises of Ron Paul as the only sane man remaining in the Republican Party. I nearly died laughing when Carlson commented, "Can we all stop pretending to love Ron Paul?"

Seriously, people. If Paul were president, Behar, Krugman and Maher would despise him. They like Paul because he is an irritant to the Republican Party, someone they can point to and say, "See, now there's a good Republican."

I have a friend named Dennis who is a die-hard Ron Paul supporter. Dennis and I saw Congressman Paul speak at the Conservative Political Action Conference last March. Afterward, we had a chance to meet him. When Dennis looked at Paul, he saw a great leader; I saw a man with senility creeping in.

But Dennis is not a fake supporter – he likes the entire Ron Paul package. I think Paul's ideas are just too radical. "What's radical about following the Constitution?" Dennis retorts.

Well, nothing and everything. Ron Paul is radical because he's probably the last man in Washington who really cares about a constitutional doctrine called enumerated powers. The enumerated powers doctrine means the federal government is authorized to do only what is explicitly permitted by the Constitution. We've gotten into the habit of thinking the federal government can do whatever it wants as long as the Constitution does not specifically prohibit it. Just google "10th Amendment," and you'll see.

Over time, the 10th Amendment has been lost. Both political parties and all three branches of government share the blame for the demise of enumerated powers.

For example, the Constitution does not call for a federal law enforcement agency, and yet I can count three – the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Agency, and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. It doesn't permit funding higher education, yet we have the U.S. Department of Education.

It's staggering to think how different our country would be if every government official followed the Ron Paul philosophy. Tucker Carlson explained to his fellow roundtables guests what Ron Paul means when he says that he wants to follow the Constitution: "...following the Constitution means getting rid of all the middle class subsidies, and all the things we take for granted, and actually taking responsibility for yourself. And nobody really wants to do that."

Carlson is right. Nobody does want that; they just jump on Paul's bandwagon in order to stir up revolt in the Republican ranks.

The ultimate example of disingenuous Paul cheerleading came this summer when The Valley Advocate ran a flattering Ron Paul cover story. So now the hyper-liberal Advocate loves Ron Paul too? Give me a break. The writer, Phil Maymin, sounded like the most dishonest debater I have ever heard. He even compared Paul to Ronald Reagan, which must have made the Advocate cringe. Am I supposed to believe that the Advocate ever had anything nice to say about Reagan while he was in office?

The most ignorant line of the entire article is when Maymin stated: "Both [Reagan and Paul] believed in a strong military for defensive purposes only, not empire building."

What we are doing today in Iraq and Afghanistan is hardly "empire-building," but if you consider all interventions in foreign affairs to be "empire-building," then the two men have absolutely nothing in common. Ron Paul prides himself on staying out of foreign affairs. Reagan was a super-interventionist. Reagan sent Marines to Lebanon, invaded Grenada, and bombed Libya. He supported anti-Communist forces in Central America, and anti-Soviet Mujahideen in Afghanistan.

The Reagan-Paul comparison is ludicrous, and it's simply a reiteration of the hackneyed lecture that Paul is a "real Republican." If I have to listen to another Ron Paul supporter lecture me about how Paul represents "real Republicans," I am going to vomit.

Ben Duffy writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at bduffy@umdcnj.umass.edu.

Ron Paul supporters tout the Republican candidate as one even Ronald Reagan would be proud of. However, there is more to Paul's policies than meets the eye.

Proliferating problems in Pakistan

Evan Powers

When Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf declared a state of emergency Saturday, he called it a move that would best quell the steadily-increasing militant attacks and prevent any further interference in government policy by the country's judiciary members.

As part of his emergency declaration, Musharraf has shut down the country's constitution, fired the chief justice of the Supreme Court and ordered the military to take over TV broadcasting stations. This emergency declaration comes exactly two weeks before Pakistan's Supreme Court was scheduled to rule on the legality of Musharraf's candidacy for another term as president, something that the Pakistani population is increasingly opposed to.

With his back seemingly against the wall with unhappy countrymen and women over the legitimacy of his presidency, continuing pressure from the United States to combat al-Qaida along the border of Afghanistan, and growing criticism of his attempts to make Pakistan a democratically-run country, it's becoming more and more apparent to me that this is an attempt to quiet those who oppose him. Doesn't it seem hypocritical for Musharraf to claim that his goal is to establish democracy, which by definition is a government of the people, and then turn around and take away their basic rights?

With the expulsion of the country's constitution, some of the rights granted to the people that are now taken away from them include the right to free speech, protection of property rights, and the right to free movement.

In his overhaul of the country's media, Musharraf has also decreed that broadcasters will receive a three-year jail sentence if they're found to be ridiculing the government or members of the armed forces.

It's clear that Musharraf is highly unpopular among Pakistani citizens stemming from his questionable legitimacy as leader of the country after he appointed himself from chief executive to the President after a military coup in 1999, and from accusations of corruption in office and allowing poverty to grow out of control. With tension mounting from the public, taking away their basic human rights will certainly not help Musharraf's cause.

Pakistan's supreme court sides with the public's opinion. Chief Justice Iftikhar Mohammed Chaudhry declared the state of emergency illegal and claimed Musharraf had no power to suspend the constitution. Soon after his comments, Chaudhry was relieved of his duties, thereby silencing another critic of his decision. Hand-picked by Musharraf, many believe Chaudhry was expelled because Musharraf was worried that he would put a hold on his army chief post in the upcoming fall 2007 presidential elections, thereby making him only a civilian president.

Many Pakistanis strongly contest that Musharraf should not take part in the upcoming election, but he clearly does not want to go quietly. I can't begin to understand how Musharraf expects people to be able to reason with him on this decision, especially considering the growing amount of protestors in Pakistan who are voicing their support for Chaudry and their displeasure with the president's attempt to extend his time in office for another five years.

Even the Bush administration has to be nervous about the current situation in Pakistan, as they have long been trying to form long-term relations with citizens to avoid losing them to Islamic extremism and al-Qaida. With the state of emergency declared and tension between Musharraf and the public reaching a head, things could quickly spiral out of control for both sides.

Despite being considered by the United States to be an ally against terrorism and someone who vows to make Pakistan a country governed by democracy, Musharraf is doing anything but that by issuing a state of emergency. I don't see any democracy in a decision made by one man – not only the president of a country, but also the leader of the military – to take away fundamental rights given to people.

I can't see how taking away the power of the justice system and removing all basic rights from the people is really for the good of the country.

Under the Pakistani constitution, it was written that Musharraf couldn't run for another term while serving both as president and military leader. So what has he done to solve this? He's eliminated the one document that keeps his powers in check, and he's silenced the entire country from speaking out against his actions. Anyone that does speak out against him, his ruling party, and the military that he's currently commanding to keep the media from broadcasting the news faces legal punishments.

Does this remind anyone of the Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi-led secret police and the Iranian Revolution 25 years ago?

Is this someone who should be leading a country toward democracy? Musharraf says his decision to declare a state of emergency was "for the good of Pakistan." When a country enters a period of turmoil, I can't see how taking away the power of the justice system and removing all basic rights from the people is really for the good of the country. Former Pakistani Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto says Musharraf is becoming a dictator in Pakistan, the very opposite idea of a leader heading a democratically-run country.

It seems rather unconstitutional to strip people of the rights mandated by constitution. But I guess when the highest court in a country is facing a crisis, it's about power, and not about the laws.

Good 'Gangster'

Denzel Washington and Russell Crowe share screen in latest Ridley Scott film

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Correspondent

Set in the early 1970s against a backdrop of urban decay and corruption, "American Gangster" aims to be more than another crime drama. It tries to show that Harlem's gangsters aren't crooks, but rather businessmen with dreams.

Denzel Washington stars as Frank Lucas, a debt collector and driver for legendary crime boss Bumpy Johnson (Clarence Williams III). When Johnson kicks the bucket early in the film's narrative, his death provides a vacuum of power on the streets of Harlem that Lucas is all too eager to fill.

Tapping his predecessor's system of Mafia partnership and free turkeys at Thanksgiving, Lucas takes the crime game one step further when he begins importing heroin direct from Southeast Asia.

Selling speed at half the price for twice the potency has profits running high for Lucas and his trail of associates.

To ensure the integrity of his product, Lucas drives out the competition with a mixture of violence and swift business acumen. Cuba Gooding Jr. gets off with a stern warning, but other pushers do not fare as well. In a move straight out of "New Jack City," Lucas also enforces a strict nudity policy at the mixing tables.

Frank Lucas occupies half the script's concentration; the rest belongs to Richie Roberts (Russell Crowe), a straight-laced New Jersey detective whose reputation precedes him. After turning in a million dollars in unmarked bills, Roberts finds himself ostracized from a department known largely for taking handouts. To compound his troubles, he and his wife (Carla Gugino) are going through a divorce. Lucky for him, law school provides a distraction.

Clocking in at just over two and a half hours, the film allows time for each side of the story to unfold. However, director Ridley Scott ("Alien," "Gladiator") seems out of form navigating through Harlem's criminal underbelly. It's a solid effort, but it lacks brutality. Set and costuming conspire to give the film a pulp feel that is lacking elsewhere.

Similarly, Denzel Washington's performance is up to suspect. He wears Lucas' ruthlessness with rigidity. The performance is a crossroads, with the actor reconciling his love of playing the hero with the success he's found in the past playing more villainous roles. The result, a villain with a heart of gold, seems insincere.

Russell Crowe fares better, but his performance is reined in. Among his talents is an ability to act through the trappings of a period drama to deliver a strong performance, and it is no different here. He's not deterred by what might normally trip up the everyday actor – wigs, costumes, accents, and mannerisms are all his friends.

"American Gangster" is not Russell Crowe's first film with Ridley Scott. Crowe has previously worked with Scott on the film "Gladiator."

Denzel Washington and Russell Crowe team up in "American Gangster." The film is based on the article "Return of Superfly" by Mark Jacobson.

The script, adapted from Mark Jacobson's article "Return of Superfly," plays out methodically. It's insistence on giving equal screen time to Lucas and Roberts serves as a detriment to pacing. Frankly, Roberts' life just isn't as exciting as the life of a millionaire drug boss. Much of what comprises his segment of the story appears excessive – his divorce and his womanizing, while interesting factoids to the character, are unimportant to the story at hand.

Another dilemma is that it takes Roberts and Lucas too long to finally face off. Those in the audience waiting for a satisfying Russell Crowe/Denzel Washington square-off are left hanging until the very end.

Ultimately, the film wants to make a case for Lucas as a legitimate businessman, as nothing more than an example of American entrepreneurialism. In doing so, it turns the villain into something more akin to a tragic hero. But which is the greater truth? The simple answer is that he is both, but the script fails to provide an intersection between these two identities.

Sure, Lucas indulges his family, employs his brothers, and takes his mother to church every Sunday. He has all the trappings of a decent man, but the character seems devoid of humanity. After all, a man who can so easily set another man on fire and pump him with bullets as he burns can't be a good man underneath it all – or can he?

As much as Lucas is an allegory for success, so Roberts, who stands behind his morals, is not. This is clearest during a montage of the holidays. Lucas, the man who has set principle aside for gain, is seen happy, surrounded by a loving family. Roberts, the man who refuses to compromise, stands alone in his kitchen eating out of a can, with only the soft murmur of the television to keep him company.

The film serves as an indictment of a capitalist system which turns poor men into villains and principled men into saps. Where Roberts and Lucas intersect, however, there is catharsis, for even though capitalism may not deliver to each man his just desserts, the legal system does.

As social commentary, "American Gangster" has some thing interesting to say. However as a crime drama, "American Gangster" falls short of the mark, relying on recycled material to get the story where it needs to go.

Those expecting something akin to "Good Fellas" will likely leave disappointed. Here, crime is just the medium employed to deliver a larger message, the rise and fall of Frank Lucas, nothing more than a shroud over the true objectives of the film.

Heat clouds judgment: a report from afar

French couple debates about the perfect postcard

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

Pau, France takes a while to warm up. I'm no expert on the weather, but being so close to the Pyrenees Mountains, I know this is not surprising. Those massive ranges mess everything up as far as consistent weather goes, no matter where you are.

Pau is a city unknown to many, even many Parisians don't know where it is. It's the capital of the Pyrenees-Atlantiques, a land of rugby and wine. In the morning, the whole city takes a breath and, for the most part, leaves time for its residents to be dazed and scrambling for a cafe au lait – that is, until around 12:30 or 1 p.m. Then something pretty drastic happens. The city itself actually starts to sweat. It's as though it's showtime – the clouds part and the sun takes center stage. And once it happens, forget it.

For most of the days my international group and I has been here, this routine has followed suit. If you're fortunate enough to witness the event under the cover of shade, the progression is rather quite amusing. While accustomed residents know to relax and gauge the sun's trajectory, tourists and international students are almost always caught off guard.

It was a sunny day, and reasonably warm when a British couple strolled down the Boulevard de Pyrenees, eyeing the different shops and cafes. The sun had yet to hit that special spot in the sky. It was 12:40 p.m.

"Oh, let's go get a postcard, send it to Leslie or something," the woman had said. She was donning a long-sleeved Polo shirt, hugged by a sweat-shirt around the shoulders, and wearing tight denim jeans. In the morning, this outfit was a reasonable choice. It's not out of the ordinary to actually see a bit of your breath if you wake up early enough. A bit misleading, certainly, but it's all part of Pau's routine.

"Oh, what a good idea. Let's." Her husband was older and wearing a somewhat cooler outfit – a grey button down T-shirt and long Polo shorts. In a matter of 10 minutes, these shorts wouldn't make any difference.

They were a simple couple, a bit particular and both very proud fans of Polo, but certainly not out of place. Pau is a popular hub for English tourists, and has been for ages. Along with the First Anglican Church, Pau is home to Europe's first golf course. It is a golf fanatic's Mecca. The train station also harbors nine round trips to Paris every day. There is a healthy mix of residents and foreigners around the city but once you hit the international bars near the train station, you start to notice more luggage tags, freckled skin, and names like Robert, Franklin and Chet popping up.

Following the couple around the tourist booth, I could see their argument growing.

"That one you want to buy that one honestly. How about this one instead."

"That one undersells the bear looks like it's been Photoshopped."

The man sped-sweat from his brow. On a sign down the street, the temperature had already risen several degrees.

"Let's get going, eh. We can buy one later."

"No. We're here already, Harold, let's have look, f--k."

The weather was stirring up the wife quite nicely, just a few minutes into the ordeal – and now she simply had to buy a postcard. Not at this point, Leslie, I guess, would really love a postcard from Pau, even if it was Photoshopped.

"Not that one – you could have just as easily taken that one. Just push this back, push back."

The husband was now trying, for some reason, to describe the picture-taking process. It was as if he thought his wife would send out to the Pyrenees that afternoon and snap her own picture. He held his hand out the now-free sweats postcard, and told her exactly how he thought the picture was taken. He did so by trying to push the rocky cliff in the foreground back. I have to admit I was lost – but seemingly his wife she merely looked at him in bewilderment as she dropped her sweatshirt and continued her Polo.

"Give me one extra, Harold."

"Just push it back." Harold [illegible] twisted his hips. He was somewhat [illegible] able, getting louder [illegible] but getting nowhere with the postcard. I couldn't find his reasoning as a subject for the picture, even as I [illegible] I tried to follow his [illegible] I wanted to cry for peeing out [illegible] Harold's blazing heat, even as [illegible]

"A euro, Harold. [illegible] demanded.

Pau France is the capital of Pyrenees-Atlantiques, but is still widely forgotten by most residents of France. The casual atmosphere and high afternoon temperatures make the city a great place for outsiders to people-watch.

"1964 -The Beatles Tribute" formed in 1982. Although the four members are all American, their onstage banter has British accents and pop culture references. To make their sound authentic, their bassist plays left-handed despite the fact he is right-handed.

The next best thing in music today

Beatles Tribute band to play at Calvin Theater in Northampton

BY PETER RIZZO
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Bad news.

The Beatles are broken up and the band that set the bar for rock 'n' roll has not been a major musical force for decades. This leaves fans whose birthday falls after 1960 with many unfulfilled dreams of seeing the legends live.

On Friday, Nov. 9, however, you can see the next best thing live at the Calvin Theater in Northampton. "1964 – The Beatles Tribute" calls itself, quite modestly, the "#1 Beatles Tribute in the World!"

The show takes its title from the year of the bands "invasion" of America, and through their show they attempt to recreate the experience of seeing the Beatles during the era of classic rock.

While there are many tribute bands that tour across the nation, many people are skeptical about spending their money on this type of performance. Tribute performers are usual thought of as performances that reside in low-rent bars and provide mediocre karaoke at best.

This band, however, has spent years honing the details of its show, conducting painstaking searches for specific amplifiers to replicate the Beatles' authentic sound.

This ethic doesn't apply only to the sound, but also its appearance. The group spent years scouring vintage clothing stores to recreate the look of the legendary band from Liverpool, England.

They are so meticulous about the details that the bass player, despite being right-handed, learned how to play the bass left-handed like Paul McCartney for a more authentic sound. These efforts demonstrate the extent of this tribute band's devotion to the original band.

The band is also particular about their song selection. Most of the songs played at their shows are from the Beatles' catalog prior to 1964. This includes classics like "Day Tripper" and "A Hard Day's Night" – tunes that showcase the band's earlier pop-inspired tastes. However, the band does incorporate later classics like "Yellow Submarine" and "Eleanor Rigby," which are from the "Revolver" era.

While this is a factor that might turn off ardent fans of the Beatles' later catalogs, it is all in the spirit of creating a unique show. And despite what detractors say, "1964 – The Beatles Tribute" has the critical acclaim to back up their self-promotion.

The band has received high praise from the likes of Rolling Stone Magazine and Dick Clark; the latter is quoted as saying they are "hands down the best Beatles show out there today."

Upon reading one of the band's fan sites, one can see that people associated with the actual Beatles have nothing but praise for their newer incarnation. One site even goes so far as to claim that Louise Harrison, the sister of guitarist George Harrison, was so moved after a performance that she threw a party in honor of "1964."

The tribute band was originally formed in 1982, and their performances intertwine both music and live theater. The band, composed of Mark Benson as John Lennon, Gary Grimes as Paul McCartney, Terry Manfredi as Ringo Starr and Tom Work as George Harrison, strive for the cinematic reconstruction of the "Fab Four's" performances. The musicians – all of whom are from America – get into character onstage, even learning cockney accents to banter onstage, improvising as live actors would.

Some might consider the band's attention to detail crazy and it speaks volumes about today's celebrity-obsessed culture. But this is the Beatles, who 30 years after their demise still cast a huge shadow over rock 'n' roll.

Anyone who thinks otherwise needs only to sit in one of the Dining Commons and count the number of Beatles T-shirts.

All this devotion to the band has paid off. The tribute band has lasted longer than the actual band – over 20 years. And when attempting to recreate some of the most beloved icons of all time, one could argue that for a true tribute, they deserve nothing less.

UMass downs Princeton in play-in

The Minutewomen earned their first bid to the NCAA Field Hockey Tournament since 2001. Head coach Justine Sowry led the team to an Atlantic 10 title, also the first since 2001, in her first year at the helm.

Wray, giving UMass the 2-1 lead. Gillespie, who missed a significant amount of time due to injury, was used on a whim, according to Sowry.

"We started substituting quite a lot and Gillespie hadn't played in a number of games, and then we just thought, 'What the heck, we'll put her out there and see what she can do,'" Sowry said.

The experiment worked because Gillespie netted her fifth goal of the season and her team-leading fourth game-winning goal.

Despite trailing by a goal, Princeton kept attacking. The offense kept pressuring the Minutewomen defense and forced Letourneau to make a lot of saves. Two of her most important saves came on Princeton penalty corners.

The Tigers were awarded three consecutive penalty corners with less than two minutes left in regulation. Letourneau saved the first two and the defense came up and blocked the third attempt to seal the victory for UMass. Letourneau finished the game with 12 saves, 10 of which came in the second half. The same cannot be said of Wray, who saw just three shots the entire game and let two of them past her.

Sowry lauded the play of her defense.

"I think the entire backfield was outstanding. That's the most pressure we've had to absorb this season," Sowry said after the game.

The defense played a huge role in yesterday's game by not allowing Princeton to run its offense the way it usually does and neutralizing Schmidt, one of Princeton's biggest threats, in normal playing situations.

"We put her under a lot of pressure and tried to disrupt her rhythm. We tried to defend her hard and I think we did a pretty good job," Sowry said of the team's ability to handle Schmidt.

Though Schmidt had the penalty corner goal, she had three other shots that Letourneau kept out of the back of the net.

UMass also made Bortz a non-factor. Bortz is the Tigers' leading scorer, but she had just two shots at Letourneau. Though she did tally an assist on the penalty corner goal.

The biggest impact on the game was the play of Letourneau. Princeton kept firing shots at her and she kept making saves to keep the game close and give the Minutewomen a chance to win.

UMass has not had a winning season since its last tournament appearance in 2001 and the seniors on the team have not enjoyed a winning season in their career. Led by stingy defensive play and clutch goalkeeping, the Minutewomen look poised to make a run at the national championship.

Letourneau saves the game

was named to the Atlantic 10 All-Conference first-team.

In the team's early 3-2 loss to UConn Sept. 22, the Minutewomen faced three offensive threats that have at least 10 goals this season. Lizzy Peijs got just one shot on goal and didn't score. In 22 games this season Peijs has 15 goals and 62 shots on goal. UConn's other two main offensive threats are Lindsey Leck and Lauren Aird. The former had no shots on goal and the latter scored once, but holding these three players who have combined for 35 goals this season to one is an accomplishment.

The concern yesterday was 2006 Ivy League Player of the Year Paige Schmidt, who starts the offensive attack from the back. Schmidt scored the lone Princeton goal of the game, but Sowry was pleased with her team's ability to prevent Schmidt from taking over the game.

UMass has won seven of its last eight games, including six one-goal victories. Three of these have been 1-0 games, while team's last three games have resulted in 2-1 wins.

In the two A-10 tournament games, goalkeeper Becky Letourneau only needed to make four saves. Against a better Princeton team, Letourneau made 12 saves, including 10 in the second half.

"She had a high number of saves and was really calm and composed towards the end of the game as well," Sowry said. "She made the crucial saves."

Letourneau's progression from last season and the first half of this season to the second half of this season has been phenomenal. She finished last season with a 1-7 record and a .579 save percentage, and she began this season 1-5 with a .656 save percentage. Since then, she has gone 9-2 with a .872 save percentage, including the team's six regular season conference wins coming via shutout.

Sowry was proud of the defensive unit as a whole for its effort in the Princeton game, and they too, similar to Letourneau, have improved their play over the second half of the season. The Minutewomen allowed three goals in three separate games from Sept. 8 to Sept. 30. Discounting a 2-1 loss to Temple Oct. 12, the Minutewomen haven't allowed more than one goal per game since the late September game against Albany.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu.

Kara Murphy's penalty-corner goal as time expired in the first half gave UMass the early lead. The Minutewomen never trailed, winning 2-1.

16-team field set for NCAA Field Hockey Championship

Minutewomen pitted against regional rival UConn in first round

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The 2007 NCAA Division I Field Hockey Championship bracket was released last night, with North Carolina securing the No. 1 seed. The Tar Heels (20-0, 5-0 ACC) won their 16th Atlantic Coast Conference Championship in an overtime victory against No. 3 Wake Forest back on Sunday, 4-3.

UNC is also the only Division I team to go undefeated this season. The Deacons (14-5, 3-2 ACC) won three straight NCAA titles from 2002-2004. Maryland, the host of semifinals and championship and ranked No. 2, are 10-0 at home this season.

No. 4 Connecticut won its fourth straight Big East Title, beating Providence, 1-0, Sunday. The Huskies (20-2, 5-1 Big East) will host Massachusetts in the opening round of the tournament Nov. 10.

UNC VS. STANFORD

UNC will open the tournament on their home turf against visiting Stanford. The Cardinal (13-7, 5-1) won a play-in game against Lock Haven Tuesday. The Tar Heels, who are making their 24th appearance in the NCAA tournament, are 5-1 against Stanford. The teams last met during the 2004 season, in a game UNC won, 4-0. North Carolina has won four titles and has reached the Final Four on eight separate occasions.

JAMES MADISON VS. DUKE

JMU won its second-straight Colonial Athletic Association title Sunday, defeating Old Dominion 1-0 in overtime. The Dukes (18-3, 7-1 CAA) were ranked No. 7 in the STX National Field Hockey Coaches Association Division I poll this season, and became the only school other than ODU to repeat as CAA champions.

James Madison is heading back to the tournament for its eighth appearance, while Duke is making its eighth appearance as well. The Blue Devils (11-8, 1-4 ACC) have made the Final Four every year since 2003. Duke last played JMU during the 2006 season, an overtime game they won, 3-2.

IOWA VS. BOSTON UNIVERSITY

BU will take on Big Ten Champion Iowa Saturday, Nov. 10 in the first round of the tournament. The Terriers (17-5, 5-0 America East) are making their 10th appearance in the tournament. BU beat Albany in the America East Championship, 4-1, Sunday. The Terriers had four unanswered goals en route to their third straight league championship.

The Hawkeyes (17-3, 4-2 America East) defeated top-seeded Michigan, 4-1, Sunday for their third Big East Tournament Championship. Iowa, which is ranked sixth nationally, is one of four Big Ten schools (Penn State, Michigan State and Michigan) selected to play in the tournament.

MASSACHUSETTS VS. CONNECTICUT

UMass defeated Ivy League champion Princeton in a play-in match yesterday, 2-1, to clinch a spot in the tournament. The Minutewomen (14-8, 6-1 A-10) will face UConn, a team they lost to, 3-2, Sept. 22. UMass will make its first tournament appearance since 2001, while the Huskies will be making their 19th appearance. UConn is 13-5 in NCAA Tournament first-round games, and have qualified for the tournament 11 of the past 12 years.

WAKE FOREST VS. MICHIGAN STATE

The Deacons are ranked No. 2 in the STX NFCHA Coaches Poll, and will face Michigan State Sunday in a first-round match-up. The Spartans (16-5, 8-1 Big Ten) were shut out by Wake Forest, 2-0, Sept. 30. The Deacons have an all-time record of 7-1 against Michigan State, with six of the seven victories by shutout. The ACC has three teams (UNC, UMD, and Wake) in the tournament this year. Michigan State lost to Iowa in overtime in the Big Ten semifinals, 3-2, Saturday.

MICHIGAN VS. OHIO

The No. 6 Wolverines (16-5, 5-1 Big Ten) will play in a first round match-up against Ohio Saturday. The Bobcats (18-4, 9-1 MAC-10) defeated American University, 3-2, in a play-in game yesterday. They also won the MAC regular-season and tournament championships.

Michigan last played Ohio on Sept. 12, 2003, beating the Bobcats, 6-0. Michigan has a 7-0 record against the Bobcats, who are making their second ever appearance in program history.

PENN STATE VS. VIRGINIA

The Nittany Lions (13-7, 3-3 Big Ten) will make their 24th tournament appearance when they play UVA (11-9, 1-4) in a first-round matchup Saturday. The Nittany Lions defeated the Cavaliers, 3-1, Aug. 26 in Charlottesville.

Virginia is making its 17th tournament appearance and its second consecutive appearance after advancing to the quarterfinals in 2006. PSU has a 3-11 record against the Cavaliers. In the 1997 NCAA quarterfinals, UVA defeated Penn State, 4-2, advancing to the semifinals.

OLD DOMINION VS. MARYLAND

Maryland (17-2, 4-1 ACC) faces Old Dominion in the first round Saturday. It is the third meeting of the year between the two teams, a series in which the Lady Terps took two games from the Lady Monarchs, both by a score of 4-1. ODU leads the all-time series, 22-19-1, with Maryland winning the last five meetings and nine of the past 11. Old Dominion is back for its 27th appearance after winning the CAA regular-season title.

Billikens roll in A-10

Patterson leading the way as Saint Louis pounds opponents

By Sam Ehrlich
Collegian Staff

As the Atlantic 10 Tournament approaches, No. 12 Saint Louis made a strong case this weekend for the conference's top spot.

The Billikens had their way with their opponents, demolishing Saint Joseph's, 8-0, Friday and blowing away Temple, 5-1, Sunday.

Junior Kyle Patterson was the star for SLU for the weekend, scoring four goals in the two games and earning the A-10 Player of the Week award. The honor was Patterson's third this season.

Three of Patterson's goals came as a natural hat trick toward the end of the first half against the Hawks. The scores were all tallied within 2 minutes, 31 seconds for the second-fastest scoring progression in NCAA history.

Patterson was also named to the teams of the week for Soccer America, CollegeSoccerNews.com and TopDrawerSoccer.com.

Freshman Beau Belkamy also added two goals and an assist on the weekend, garnering A-10 Rookie of the Week honors.

In particular the 5-1 victory Sunday came at the expense of a tired and hurting Temple team.

The Owls, now 0-6-1, were without their top scorer, junior sweeper and former A-10 Player of the Week Mackenson Alfidor, and senior goaltender Tony Pratico. Both received red cards in Temple's loss Friday at Charlotte, forcing them to miss their next game.

Saint Joseph's was riding a 4-1 conference record that had vaulted them to second place in the A-10. However, the 8-0 loss, combined with a 3-1 loss Sunday at Charlotte, dropped them to a tie for fifth coming into the final weekend.

Saint Louis will finish the regular season this weekend hosting Charlotte Saturday. The Billikens' 7-1 conference record will probably place them as the top seed for the A-10 championship next week at Dayton.

Dukes stop five game skid

A five-game losing streak likely cost Duquesne its shot at an Atlantic 10 Tournament appearance, but the Dukes won back some pride with victories Saturday and Monday against George Washington and Richmond.

Senior Pat Flinn led the way for the Dukes in Saturday's 3-1 win, as he set up junior Drew Jeffery and senior Travis MacKenzie for goals past GW keeper Greg Yahr.

MacKenzie's second goal of the weekend then proved to be the game-winner Monday, as the Dukes shut out the Spiders, 2-0.

Goalkeeper Chris Torres had a good weekend for DU, as he stopped 6-of-7 shots, giving him and his team a 5-9-3 overall record (3-4 conference). Monday's shutout was the second on the season for the freshman.

Entering the final weekend, Duquesne tied for ninth place with nine points, just one shy of the 10 points for eighth-place Dayton and Saint Bonaventure.

The Dukes will get their best chance to secure their sixth consecutive A-10 championship appearance Friday as they face the Flyers in Dayton.

Howarth lifts Rams

Freshman Adam Howarth's first collegiate goal was a big one, as the score was enough for sophomore goalkeeper Chris Pennock to lead Rhode Island past La Salle into second place.

The goal, scored with only a minute remaining, gave the Rams a 1-0 victory and gave Pennock his second straight shutout.

However, Pennock hardly had to do it alone, as his defense restricted the La Salle offense to just one shot on goal.

Senior Lukasz Tumicz nearly gave the Rams an early lead in the 19th minute, but his shot went off the crossbar. Fellow URI senior Steve Mellen then shot the rebound, but La Salle goalkeeper Andrew Bernhard dived to stop the shot and preserve the scoreless tie.

Bernhard made a valiant effort for the Explorers, saving 6-of-7 shots on goal.

Despite the loss, La Salle freshman Ryan Richter was named to the Philadelphia Soccer Seven Honor Roll for the second time this season, after scoring the Explorer's lone goal in a 2-1 loss at Massachusetts.

Richmond senior goalkeeper Eric Sciocchetti's fourth save of the day Friday at Saint Bonaventure gave him 383 in his collegiate career – one past Roland Braklis for the Richmond record. However, it was the two saves that Sciocchetti didn't make that proved to be the difference in the 2-0 loss.

Junior Kyle Patterson led Saint Louis to a pair of victories over A-10 rivals Saint Joseph's, 8-0, and Temple, 5-1. Patterson's four goals in the two games earned him his third Player of the Week honor.

49ers claim 2nd straight league crown

Charlotte knocks off SLU to clinch regular season title

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

Charlotte clinched its second consecutive Atlantic 10 Championship with its 1-0 win over Saint Louis Saturday.

Freshman Sam Huecker scored the only goal after gathering a loose ball inside the box and sending it to the back of the net in the 16th minute.

The 49ers (14-4-1, 9-1-1 A-10) won eight of their last nine matches while outscoring opponents 17-4. Offensively, Huecker and freshman Whitney Weinraub lead the team in goals with six each.

The offensive firepower has faded lately. During the first half of the A-10 schedule, the 49ers scored 14 goals but slowed down in the second half with eight. Even with a slowed offense, Charlotte still finds ways to win games.

Sophomore goalkeeper Lauren Brown played a large role as she led the A-10 with nine shutouts and never allowed opponents to score more than one goal in any game.

Charlotte plays the winner of the game between third-seeded Duquesne and sixth-seeded Richmond set for Friday.

No luck for Billikens

Saint Louis faces the worst playoff scenario after dropping the final match to Charlotte.

Not only did the Billikens (7-2-2, 10-5-2 A-10) lose their bye, they also have to play Dayton which tied them, 1-1, Oct.19 in the first round Thursday.

SLU's loss pair with wins from Fordham and Duquesne dropped the Billikens two spots in the A-10 standings.

It is the first time in two years that SLU did not earn a bye in the A-10 Tournament during the regular season.

Since the George Washington match Oct. 14, they have a .500 record and have given up as many goals as they've scored.

SLU has two losses in the last two weeks, which is the first time it had more than one loss in four weeks since September when it lost to Nebraska, Pennsylvania and Ohio State.

Richmond clinches berth

Rhode Island lost the last game of the regular season to Richmond, 1-0, putting both teams in a tiebreaker for the right to play Duquesne Thursday. The loss to the Spiders broke the tie for the sixth seed.

Richmond's Carrie Holland scored the game's only goal in the eighth minute.

The Spiders (7-11-2, 6-4-1) won four of their last five games against the A-10. However, they have the weakest record against playoff teams at 0-3-1, and they never played Dayton.

In fact, Richmond has scored just two goals against the four teams they faced in the playoffs.

Its lack of scoring against playoff teams is a concern for the team, considering two of the six wins had a margin of victory greater than one goal.

The Spiders will have a lot riding on goalkeeper Kate Hudson, who is sixth in the league in shutouts (four) and goals-against average (1.14).

Richmond looks to get revenge on Duquesne after it lost a 2-1 decision Oct. 7. A win would set up a No. 1 versus No. 6 match against Charlotte, which edged Richmond, 2-1, in overtime.

What a turnaround

One year after sub-.500 season, Sowry leads Minutewomen back to NCAA Tournament

By Justin McGrail
Collegian Staff

For the first time in six years, the Massachusetts field hockey team earned the right to play in the NCAA Tournament. The team had a play-in game against Princeton, defeating the Tigers, 2-1.

UMass coach Justine Sowry said after the game that she was ecstatic and proud of her team.

"The team worked so hard in the game and it proves that with hard work, absorbing pressure, and taking care of the opportunities that anything is possible," Sowry said.

The Minutewomen's last appearance in the NCAA tournament was in 2001. They faced Old Dominion in the first round and were knocked out with a 6-1 loss.

The game looked to be a defensive struggle heading into halftime before UMass was awarded a penalty corner with one second left. Erin Parker started the play, sending the ball to the stopper, who set the play up for Jamie Bourazeris.

Bourazerris rifled a shot at the net but it was blocked. The ball rattled around in front of the cage before Katelyn Orlando got control of it and passed it over to Kara Murphy, who beat the goalkeeper to give UMass a 1-0 lead heading into halftime. There was actually some miscommunication on the field, and the wrong play was called, yet the Minutewomen found a way to capitalize.

Sowry mentioned that the team had a hard time converting opportunities in the first half. She said the team played like it was expecting more opportunities than it received.

Princeton wasted little time to score the equalizer. The Tigers won a penalty corner at the beginning of the second half and capitalized on the opportunity. Christina Bortz inserted the ball to Candice Amer who set it up for the Paige Schmidt. Schmidt got a shot off and beat UMass goalkeeper Becky Letourneau to even the game at one apiece.

UMass scored the final goal late in the second half. Bourazeris took a free hit for the Minutewomen that found its way to an open Lauren Gillespie, who tipped the ball past Princeton goalkeeper Cynthia

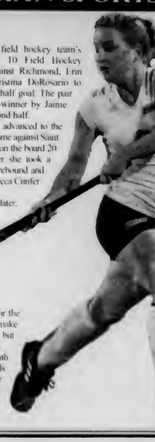
Letourneau dominant with 12 saves in win over Princeton

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

If two minutes of the 2007 season could define the Massachusetts field hockey's season to this point, it would be the final two minutes of yesterday's victory over Princeton.

When Lauren Gillespie put the Minutewomen ahead with under nine minutes left, the Tigers called a timeout and brought an offensive onslaught until the final whistle blew. The Minutewomen, as they have done throughout the year, played lockdown defense and prevented the Ivy League champions from scoring the equalizer and advancing.

After the timeout, Princeton earned four penalty corners and took five shots on net. The strongest Tiger pressure came in the final two minutes. UMass goalkeeper Becky Letourneau made three saves in a span of one minute, four seconds, including two off of penalty corners. On Princeton's third penalty corner in the final two minutes, Candice Amer's shot was blocked and the Minutewomen left Princeton with a spot in the NCAA Division I Field Hockey Tournament.



"We've done it repeatedly this year where we've let teams come at us in the last two minutes of the game," said UMass coach Justine Sowry. "I was just smiling on the sidelines because the position that we're in – the semorita, the composure, the calmness of our defense. Just to stay intense and clinical with our defending but also absorbing that much pressure, it's truly incredible. I knew they had it under control."

In her first year as UMass coach, Sowry has immediately transformed the Minutewomen into one of the country's defensive powerhouses. The team has surrendered 21 goals in 22 games, whereas last year they allowed 56 goals in 20 games – a difference of nearly two goals per game.

One thing Sowry has been pleased with all year is the Minutewomen's ability to stop the other team's top offensive threat. When the Minutewomen defeated West Chester, 4-0, Oct. 5, they held Sara Conrad to zero shots. Conrad scored nine goals this season and

ERIN PARKER, MIDFIELD FIELD HOCKEY

In the Massachusetts field hockey team's 2-1 first round Atlantic 10 Field Hockey Championship victory against Richmond, Erin Parker combined with Krisanna DeRosario to assist on Cher Kang's first-half goal. The pair also assisted on the game-winner by Jaime Bourazeris early in the second half.

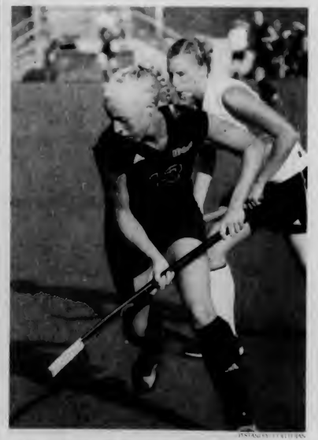
The Minutewomen then advanced to the Atlantic 10 championship game against Saint Joseph's. Parker got UMass on the board 20 minutes into the game after she took a Katelyn Orlando pass off a rebound and beat Hawks goalkeeper Rebecca Cunfer to give her team a 1-0 lead.

Less than seven minutes later, Parker struck again – this time she took a Nicole Phelan cross in the circle and beat Cunfer for the second time. St. Joe's would make it close in the second half, but UMass held on for a 2-1 win.

The junior from South Deerfield, Mass., has four goals on the season and eleven for her career. She has started every game this season and is second on the team with 13 points.

In her freshman year, she was named to the A-10 All-Rookie Team, was Rookie of the Week for Oct. 17 and led the Minutewomen with 14 points in 2005.

Earlier this week, Parker was named to the A-10 Field Hockey Academic All-Conference Team.



Parker has earned strong grades since arriving in Amherst her freshman year. She was selected to the A-10 Commissioner's Honor Roll for the fall and spring semesters, and was also named to the NFHCA Division I Academic Squad team. Parker is enrolled in the Commonwealth Honors College and is studying psychology.

RUNNER-UP:
BRITT CANFIELD, FORWARD
WOMEN'S SOCCER

Senior forward Britt Canfield scored two goals and notched one assist as the Massachusetts women's soccer team beat Richmond 2-1 Monday and tied George Washington 2-2 Sunday in its last two games on the 2007 season. Both of her goals came against Richmond.

In the 66th minute of Friday's game, the Granville, Mass., native accepted a pass from freshman Kelsey Anderson on the right side and laced a shot into the left side of the net.

Canfield would add the game-winning tally with less than four minutes left in the second overtime of a 1-1 game. In the 107th minute, she received a pass from sophomore Jacquelyn Desjardins, turned and fired a rocket toward the goal. Advising Hudsen could not stop it and the Minutewomen clinched the eliminated victory.

Lauren Gillespie scored the game-winner against Princeton yesterday, launching UMass to the NCAA Tournament, the team's first in seven years.

Chemist discovers microbe

By Ben Williams
Collegian Staff

Microbiology professor Susan Leschine is using the smallest living organisms to create a potentially monumental change.

Leschine discovered the "Q microbe" a tiny organism that eats plant material and produces ethanol. She is now working to make her discovery a part of the growing effort to reduce dependence on oil.

She was recently invited to testify before the Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming, which is a U.S. House of Representatives panel that makes decisions on legislation related to energy policy.

"Our goal is to establish the scientific and technological basis to enable the U.S. to meet the Department of Energy's '30-30' goal – 30 percent gasoline reduction by 2030," said Leschine.

She also said cost-effective ethanol production is achievable in the short term, but added that it will be a "monumental task."

She noted investments in biofuel research will have enormous positive impacts on the environment and the economy and will especially benefit rural economies. Renewable and sustainable bio-fuel production must form

SGA pushes undergrad strike

By Derrick Perkins

Senators passed a resolution calling for the immediate withdrawal of unwarranted police presence in dormitories and the creation of an oversight system for campus police activities last night.

According to Senator Mathew Morrin, one of four sponsors of last night's motion, the senate needed to establish a policy that prevented future police patrols in residence halls. Morrin called the existing patrols a "complete abuse of police power."

The resolution, which accused Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano of being behind the increase in routine patrols of plain clothes police officers, laid the foundation for the eventual creation of a committee overseeing police action on campus, according to Morrin.

"There are a lot of policies that are restricting the cops that aren't being followed. They're breaking their own laws," he said, speaking before the senate. "We need a committee to ensure that the cops follow their own laws."

Morrin said he saw the oversight committee as including both administrators and students, but with a majority student presence.

"The real issue here is that Mike Gargano and Police Chief O'Connor denied the presence of police in the dorms," Morrin said.

Keeping unwarranted police officers out of the residence halls on campus is one of several issues behind next week's planned student strike. The campus-wide strike, supported by the Graduate Student Senate and planned for Nov. 15 and 16, calls for a rollback of student fees, accountability and funding for diversity and student control over student space in addition to keeping an unwarranted police presence out of the dormitories.

Student Government Association (SGA) President Aaron Buford encouraged senators to participate and support the strike.

"These issues are very real," Buford said. "We want to show that our voice is being heard."

Governor Deval Patrick's allocation of $1 billion towards the capitol campaign of the University of Massachusetts system allowed for the rollback of student fees, Buford said, as students had paid for many of the expenses in the past.

Buford also called the presence of police in the residence halls an ongoing issue and pertinent one in campus life.

"[The establishment of an oversight committee] really relies on the student strike because Gargano is not going to listen to anything in this motion," Morrin said. "We're going to press for this demand in the student strike, and

Moving mountains... of trash

The Office of Waste Management handles 3,500 tons of trash each day. Helping out can be easy as removing plastic bags from bottle receptacles.

Students urged to be aware of their waste

By Ben Williams
Collegian Staff

Nearly everything thrown out can be recycled, and at the University of Massachusetts almost half of it is. But it could be doing better, a lot better.

According to John Pepi, General Manager of the Waste Management facilities at the University, every so often the Office of Waste Management (OWM) takes a ton of trash from a dumpster and analyzes its contents. They've consistently found that about 25 percent of it is recyclables that have been tossed in the trash. With about 3,500 tons of trash a year going through the OWM, about 900 tons could be recycled instead of wasted.

Pepi said the University does well on the things that trade people such as janitors and construction workers control, but what really needs work are things that students control. Materials like paper, plastic and glass.

The office's Web site states, "The OWM follows the Integrated Solid Waste Management approach, which holds that 'garbage' is not a homogenous mass to be burned or buried and then forgotten. Instead, 'garbage' consists of a ... spectrum of discarded materials and products each with specific characteristics and properties, which make them more or less suitable for reuse, recycling, composting or disposal."

Pepi thinks one of the roots of this recycling drought is "the all-too-common belief that what we do as individuals does not matter,

Site posts questions

Candidates answer students

Caitlin Quinn

Many American college students take advantage of the Internet by posting videos of their intoxicated dancing or singing cartoon animals. However, a new use for this technology may become more popular as the next presidential election draws closer.

At American University, 16 freshmen have created a grassroots Website called Straight2TheCandidates.com that collects questions in the form of video or e-mail messages for specific presidential candidates. The questions that were deemed top priority by users were submitted on Nov. 4.

The main page of the site features buttons with a candidate's head on each. The button's size varies depending on the number of questions posted for the respective candidate. Barack Obama has the largest button. His box that pops up when the mouse is held over the button declares that 34 messages for him have been posted. Hillary Clinton follows with 27 messages while Joe Biden and Mike Huckabee follow them with 21 each.

University of Massachusetts junior Justin Tsoi feels the site is a good idea, but added she is not politically active enough to use it for the time being.

"It depends on how proactive students are. From what I've seen it's hard to get younger people to turn out to vote, so it might be difficult to get them interested in

Amherst appoints new library trustee

By Jennifer Bergen
Collegian Staff

After former Library Trustee Sonny Burack resigned last month, the Amherst Town Select Board elected Louis S. Greenbaum as the town's new Interim Trustee of Jones Library until the town election in April.

"The Library Trustees are the governing body for the Amherst Town Libraries and the Jones Library, Incorporated," said Library Director Bonnie Isman.

All candidates were asked questions from 10 board members after submitting statements on why they were seeking the job. The interviews included further elaboration before the boards.

After consideration of four other candidates seeking the position, the board came to a mutual agreement that Greenbaum was the most qualified. One candidate, part-time library employee Alexandra D. Leras, was deemed unqualified due to her employment.

According to Isman, "The remaining five Library Trustees met with the five members of the Amherst Select Board on Monday night, Oct. 29 to talk with the candidates and to vote on the position. Retired Professor Louis Greenbaum was selected by a majority vote (six) and Chris Hoffman got four votes."

Greenbaum, who was previously a history teacher at the University of Massachusetts, stood out in particular because of his experience in town meetings and various com-

UMass 'Powershifters' in gear

25 join ranks in Washington

By Lucas Correia
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students representing MASSPIRG attended Power Shift 2007, a national rally in Washington D.C. this past weekend for a new bill that should help reduce the effects of global warming.

UMass students numbered 25 out of the roughly 6,000 students who took part in the event, representing more than 500 colleges and 300 congressional districts.

The rally, also the first national youth conference for global warming awareness, marked the largest global warming conference in the history of the United States. Organizers hoped the rally would focus the attention of Congress and current U.S. presidential candidates on the issue of global warming.

"It is widely accepted that the next U.S. president must make global warming a priority for us to solve the crisis before we reach a point of no return," read the organization's Web site. "With youth voting rates on the rise, we have the opportunity to drastically affect the 2008 Presidential Election and ensure our next president puts us on a path to stopping climate change."

UMass junior Corey Hodges described the event as "in [Congress's] face," delivering the simple message: "this is what we want, this is what we need."

Hodges thought Power Shift will have an enormous impact on Congress' decision on the bill.

The trip to Washington was funded by MASSPIRG, the UMass Department of Natural Resources and the UMass Alumni Association.

Among Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi, Massachusetts Congressman Ed Markey and human rights activist Van Jones were among those who came out to speak during the event.

The proposed bill supported by Power Shift has been estimated to cut the amount of U.S. produced emissions by 80 percent by the year 2050.

The first goal of this bill is to create five million "green jobs" by the year 2020. The bill would cut subsidies from oil and coal companies, allow the workers to move to jobs working with renewable resources such as solar and wind power and aims to eliminate coal completely as a power source.

The next component of the bill would increase fuel efficiency. The average fuel efficiency rate is currently 27 miles per gallon (mpg) for cars, and 21 mpg for trucks. The bill aims to set a standard minimum of 35 mpg for all vehicles.

The bill would also require a new renewable electricity standard. At least 15 percent of the resources used by all power companies must be renewable resources by the year 2020. This excludes nuclear waste, municipal solid waste or other non-organic wastes. Additionally, subsidies would be cut for liquid coal and nuclear energy.

and that somebody else must or will solve our problems."

He urges students to remember "an age that will be both defined and plagued by fossil fuel shortages, tossing out a six-pack of cans means pouring five ounces of crude oil down the drain, according to the Aluminum Association."

Another major battle in the fight against waste is one of information. Pepi said the OWM had been spending $10,000 to $20,000 a year on advertising to students in various forms but did not see a lot of difference.

"We still have to figure out what moves students," Pepi said.

He shoulders some of the blame himself, noting the "less than perfect advertising and information flow to students about both the whys and the hows of recycling." He hopes, among other things, that in the future environmental awareness can be integrated into the job descriptions of resident assistants.

He said he's being hindered by lack of funding, not just in the money he can't spend getting information out to students, but on the time he has to spend finding ways to cut corners trying to save money instead of finding ways to help students recycle.

Pepi says that while the students don't necessarily have recycling on the mind, neither did the builders of some recent buildings on campus. He cited the North apartments, where students have to take their trash and recyclables to a central trash room.

In an effort to increase recycling awareness UMass has been involved in a competition called RecycleMania for the past few years. It started off in 2001 as a competition between Ohio and Miami Universities and in 2007 included over 200 schools. In this competition schools record recycling over a 10-week period and compete in different categories.

Ohio and Miami started the program because they "decided that something had to be done to increase recycling in the residence and dining halls on their campuses," where it's estimated that 30 to 70 percent of campus trash comes from. UMass consistently ranks in the top 20 in pounds recycled per student, as well as in the top five-10 in food waste collected, which Pepi notes is not always good. Because it means to recycle more food waste, the University creates more food waste to begin with.

Pepi hopes this year the Universities can move up in the intercollegiate competition results and will use the competition as an opportunity to advertise as strongly a possible for recycling.

He thinks the competition, "[has] potential for raising student awareness and cooperation through an emphasis on school pride and home state pride." Pepi adds that he'd like to see RecycleMania have leagues and divisions like college sports. I think The Big I act of recycling."

Pepi said, "At the same time, the bottom line is not about competing for the sake of competition or proving anything to anyone else but about doing the right and responsible thing. About injecting more hope into our collective future."

SGA pushes for strike

that's our strategy right now."

Morrin said he hoped that by passing a resolution demanding the rescinding of police patrols in residence halls, he could elicit a response from Vice Chancellor Gargano defending the actions of University police officers.

"We want Gargano to take a firm stance on rejecting this resolution," he said. "So then we could publicize that."

Vice Chancellor Gargano could not be reached for comment before press time.

According to Senator Alex Peterkin, the creation of an oversight committee would be in the works over the next week. Removing an unwarranted police presence from the dormitories remained the immediate issue, he said.

"The important thing is that right now police officers are in the dorms that are people's living areas where they're conducting unwarranted searches of rooms," Peterkin said. "They're violating the fourth amendment and that's wrong and the SGA wants to change that."

Peterkin said the language in the resolution had been specifically directed against Vice Chancellor Gargano and not aimed at UMPD Chief Barbara O'Connor.

"Chief O'Connor is just an employee of Gargano's," Peterkin said. "Gargano is making the decisions that involve this [issue]."

Chief O'Connor could not be reached for comment by press time.

Morrin agreed with Peterkin's assessment.

"A lot of police are opposed to these policies," he said.

the site," said Tsoi. "But this site has a better possibility of reaching them because kids spend so much time in front of the computer."

Matt Stewart, also a UMass junior, said he would use the site if it proves to be success in getting responses from the candidates.

"If it did work it would be a good idea, but practically speaking, it probably won't because candidates like to dodge questions," he said.

Users of the site can click on a button and choose to either "Speak Out" by submitting a letter, video or image or "Listen In" by viewing and voting for or against previously submitted messages. Users can also leave comments in response to one another's messages, although this has been a less popular option with only one comment left on a message so far. At the bottom of each message, a colored bar shows how many votes of importance the message has gotten.

The message that received the most votes by a lead of about 200 addressed Obama and asked his opinion on the topic of the decriminalization of medical marijuana. Other messages with high votes feature questions about stem cell research, Iraq and healthcare.

The editors of the site moderate the posted messages, reserving the right to remove advertisements, illegal content and any content deemed "unacceptable," as detailed on the terms of use page.

Jones library welcomes newly-appointed interim trustee mittees, as well as passion for seeing the library remain strong and grow," said Kathleen Wang, president and fund raising representative to the personnel board.

It was essential to fill the vacancy that previous trustee Nonny Burack had left in her absence so that the library had a full staff to handle the issues which need to be dealt with. The most critical issue in which the library board has to contend with is the budget. The Town Libraries' overall annual budget is $2.1 million dollars. That annual budget includes the English as a Second Language Center, main and branch libraries, Special Collections and Local History Archives.

"Due to less funding from the town, the library has had to raise more money from private donors through fundraising all of which is done by volunteers because we can't afford a paid fundraiser," said Wang.

The Jones Library is beginning its Annual Fund Drive with a new goal of raising $55,000 to buy both materials and books. Employees are looking for any donations to make their target goal this year.

a key component of our energy future, she added.

Her research on the microbe started when she discovered it near the Quabbin reservoir, and it continued at a company called SunEthanol that she started to develop technology to supplement research on the microbe.

She said there are still some important hurdles to clear because "plants are tough." She added that molecules exist in biomass that even the Q-microbe cannot break down, something SunEthanol is working on.

Leschine notes that while the current methods of ethanol production rely mostly on corn, which only yields a "marginally" usable energy return. According to Leschine, production using bacteria such as the Q-microbe use "biomass such as wood chips, switch grass, corn stover or other agricultural waste [to] make gas for the whole plant."

Leschine looks at the big picture when she talks about developing and economical processes to make ethanol using the Q-microbe.

"This is important because using fuel made from biomass would decrease our dependence on imported oil, improve our energy security, lower the U.S. trade deficit, and very importantly, reduce greenhouse gas emissions," she said.

and Mathematics (STEM) Education Institute at UMass Amherst, expressed the importance of the education of polar climates for students and teachers.

"Most of the world lives far from ice and melting glaciers," said Nettheim. "This project will help educators understand how changes in the Polar Regions impact all of us."

The grant money awarded to UMass includes a three-region plan, which intends to be incorporated with the projects of International Polar Year 2007-08 into the middle and high school curriculum.

IPY is a coordinated research effort for scientists to study the Polar Regions and their connections with the rest of the world. IPY 2007-2008 will involve over 200 projects with thousands of scientists from over 60 nations. The project will cover two full annual cycles from March 2007 until March 2009 while observing various physical, biological and social research topics.

The funding supports summer workshops along with training during the academic year by UMass's STEM Education Institute and the department of geosciences Climate Research Center.

The summer workshops introduce teachers to STEM, Polar Connections Modules that will stress the process of scientific inquiry and techniques for effective teaching, which include inquiry-based teaching, collaborative learning and assessment of student learning.

"This is a wonderful synergy between our STEM efforts, polar researchers on our campus," said Nettheim.

Julie Brigham-Grette and Raymond Bradley from the department of geosciences and Paul Siqueira from the electrical and computer engineering department are leading researchers who are involved in the program.

Zombie mania

UMass students have laid witness to a growing population of zombies on campus since Halloween. Participants have grown wary of bandana-clad undergrads wielding NERF guns, afraid to leave their dorm rooms without a pocketful of marshmallows or rolled-up socks.

And people are taking notice.

Organizers of the registered student organization Capture the Flag recently organized a campus-wide game of Humans vs. Zombies. The game, which began on Oct. 31 and is still in its final throws, has nearly 1,200 registered players across campus.

Created in 2005 by two students at Goucher College in Baltimore, Zombies vs. Humans has become a phenomenon at colleges across the country.

Although some have found the game disruptive – as students with bandanas tied around their arms flee through the Campus Center and around academic buildings from hoards of "zombies" with bandanas on their heads – few will dispute the fact that it has brought large numbers of students together.

It is difficult – nearly impossible – to grab the attention of large numbers of college students for extended periods of time. Protest rallies for the war in Iraq or the crisis in Darfur draw modest crowds. The recent speech by controversial conservative author Phyllis Schlafly drew an impressive audience, but that number pales in comparison to Zombies vs. Humans' participants.

To those who look down their noses to the NERF gun-wielding humans defending themselves from the walking dead: What are you doing with your time that's so much more important?

Of course, there are more constructive things the 1,200 students participating could be doing with their time. But that could be said of those of us who aren't participating as well; at least the zombies are getting a good cardiovascular workout as they ignore their studies in search of new victims. Just because the event is a bizarre form of recreation doesn't mean it's any less legitimate than the activities of the Outing Club or any of the various intramural sports teams.

Likewise, the only real harm caused by Zombies vs. Humans is sporadic innocent bystanders taking a stray NERF dart in the shuffle. Non-participants should also be advised to think twice about sporting a bandana as a fashion accessory, as they've taken on a whole new level of significance.

Halloween may be behind us, and the population of "humans" left on campus might be alarming. But there are very few things – save for a Red Sox series sweep – that have brought more students on campus together than the massive game of Humans vs. Zombies.

Bruce Campbell beware.

Immigration issues abroad

Sada Farah

There's no doubt that immigration has been getting national media coverage in the United States for at least the past few years. The central issue is what to do to prevent Mexican immigrants from illegally entering the United States across the southern border.

And, more importantly, what do we do with all of the undocumented immigrants already in the country? A variety of possibilities have been proposed, including building a "great wall" between Mexico and the United States to keep people from getting into the country, as well as mass deportation as a solution for the immigrants already here, which would actually be a logistical nightmare.

However, those that believe that Mexican immigrants are unfairly being targeted argue that this country and its wealth was built on first the backs of slaves, and then various immigrant laborers brought here to do the dirty work – building railroads, etc. They do not see why this one group of immigrants is being targeted when they do jobs that most traditional Americans simply would not do – especially not for the wages that they are given.

You should consider whether or not this is indeed just a global trend in countries where mass immigration is a concern.

Whatever your personal opinions may be on this issue, it's sure to be kept in the spotlight at least until the next presidential election, with many people believing that the presidential candidates responses to illegal immigration is going to be a deciding factor in the hearts of American citizens. But before you go criticizing the government for blowing this out of proportion – and consider this to be a unique "American" domestic issue – you should consider whether or not this is indeed just a global trend in countries where mass immigration is a concern.

According to the Pew Global Attitudes Project survey, immigration concerns were widespread (throughout 46 countries), with large majorities in nearly every country favoring tougher restrictions. According to the New York Times, in Italy, a steady flow of illegal immigrants – many arriving by sea from Africa – has been a persistent issue.

The number of people backing tighter immigration laws rose to 87 percent, from 80 percent in 2002. But the question is how do these attitudes translate into policy? What we've been seeing increasingly over the past year in Europe is an inflammatory situation that parallels events in the U.S., including a concentrated effort on tracking illegal immigrants, and deporting them or sending them to detention centers with horrible conditions, followed by large protests. It seems that the Europeans haven't found a decent solution to their illegal immigrant concerns either, or immigration in general.

Last month, the spotlight was put on Switzerland when electoral posters were taped on the walls at a political rally with three white sheep standing on the Swiss flag as one of them kicks a single black sheep away. Underneath the image, a slogan read, "To Create Stability." They were put up by the most powerful party in Switzerland's federal Parliament and a member of the coalition government, an extreme right-wing party called the Swiss People's Party, or SVP.

This image has been distributed in a mass mailing to Swiss households, reproduced in newspapers and magazines and hung as huge billboards across the country. As Swiss voters prepare to go to the polls in a general election on Oct. 21, suddenly the campaign has turned into a nationwide debate over the place of immigrants in one of the world's oldest democracies, and over what it means to be Swiss. The subliminal message here is that the invasion of foreigners has in some way contaminated Swiss society, abused the social welfare system and threatened the very identity of the country. Interior Minister Pascal Couchepin, of the Liberal Democratic Party, has even suggested that the SVP's worship of Christoph Blocher, the billionaire who is the party's driving force and the current justice minister, is reminiscent of that of Italian fascists for Mussolini.

As shocking as these types of ethnocentric and racist developments might sound, all is not completely lost in Europe yet. And this point is no better illustrated then by Spain who has attempted to curb illegal migration through a legal reform.

Many African immigrants brave the Atlantic every year in hopes of going to Spain, working and making better lives for themselves and their families; however, many die on the way. This Spanish labor plan offers legal passage and a one-year work permit to some with the idea that by raising the possibility of reaching Spain legally, young Africans will be dissuaded from throwing themselves on the mercy of the Atlantic.

The work permits may be renewed, and if the persons remain in good legal standing, may eventually be integrated into the society and given full legal rights. The number of immigrants depends on simply demand of the country for its various sectors. This plan has been commended by many, and while there will always be illegal immigrants trying to get into the country– because after all, you can't let in everybody into a country – it is a great beginning that offers a legal route of entering a country.

It seems that no one country has an answer to the influx of illegal immigrants; however, a compromise must be formed by governments because illegal immigration is not going to end regardless of whatever policies or walls are put in place. Therefore there needs to be more open-mindedness to the idea of legal routes for immigrants to not only enter a country, but also be eventually assimilated into the society fully and given proper rights as well as responsibilities.

PAUL'S THE ONLY REAL REPUBLICAN

Dear Editor:

Re: "Ron Paul's no 'real' Republican" Ben Duffy, Ed/Op, Nov 7, 2007

Ben Duffy claims that Ron Paul supporters (who have managed to break the fundraising record for Republicans with over $4 million in one day) are like a cult. It's difficult to understand, though, how Paul's supporters resemble a cult any more than Clinton supporters, or Romney supporters, or even Huckabee supporters. Duffy goes on to complain that there are genuine supporters of Ron Paul, and "one's who don't know a thing about him."

Again, I must ask: how is this different from any other candidate's supporters? I can't count how many Clinton supporters I know that are oblivious to the fact that she voted for the Patriot Act and for its reauthorization, coupled with the onslaught of Guiliani supporters who are ignorant of his true stance on abortion. Most eligible voters in this country know very little of the candidates they've chosen to endorse. Painting vigorous Ron Paul supporters into an insulting box just because you disagree with them is not how to win the debate.

Duffy argues, in opposition to most Paul fans, that "[t]he invasion [of Iraq] was justified, the fight to secure Iraq is winnable, and the consequences of leaving the job unfinished are dire." Sure, if by "justified" you mean that Congress never declared war and that our reasons for going in have been conclusively falsified. Naturally I agree, if by "winnable" you mean hopeless. No contest, as long as by "dire consequences" you're referring to the more than 800 American soldiers that die there every year while we stubbornly persist in a lost war.

Duffy goes on to applaud Tucker Carlson's supposed assessment of the genuine dissent of most Americans regarding a Ron Paul vision of America. Of course, he managed to leave out the fact that Tucker has admitted to voting for Paul in 1988 when he ran for president as a libertarian and is a self-professed fan of him, giving him plenty of airtime on his MSNBC show "Tucker."

While I agree with Duffy that a Reagan-Paul comparison is ludicrous, given that their actual views on the role of government (particularly on foreign policy) differ significantly, I think it is important to point out that Reagan was famous for his libertarian rhetoric. It is precisely that limited government language that struck a cord with Americans all over, suggesting that the bulk of Paul supporters, regardless of what Duffy claims, are not ignorant to the actual, applied implications of what has been called the "Ron Paul Revolution," but rather they are informed intellectuals who see our modern government for all its flaws and recognize that liberty has become a muffled priority within the two major parties.

Duffy's warning in his conclusion that another lecture by a Ron Paul supporter and he's "going to vomit." Well I'm warning him to get out his Tums.

ZOMBIES LACK GUSTO

Dear Editor:

I was walking home from the library yesterday, when I came across a group of zombies (students wearing red bandanas). They were standing around being depressed that their game was suspended because of a rumor the police wanted to close it down.

A rumor! I know you guys are nerds, but you don't have to be such complete wimps. The real "zombies" of the Caribbean slave revolts were never so sheep-like. If there is an actual officer in front of you with a bullhorn ordering you to disperse, I can see taking it under advisement. But even there, a cop isn't Darth Vader.

Realistically, what can he do if you ignore him? How many police can they turn out on a Sunday afternoon? Imagine them trying to convince the State Police they need backup for their crisis:

"Well, they are sober, and they're not actually doing anything. But we need to suppress them. It's an activity not sanctioned by their kindergarten teachers."

Yeah, I know these are the same guys who shut down the entire campus over an empty box. But I really don't think the Administration wants to make UMass a laughing stock on all the late night comedy shows around the world.

And if they do go that route – what great advertising for the future. This year, the average student probably said, "That's a geek thing, I'm not interested." However, if it's something Gargano is against, next year you could draw 10,000 zombies to the festivities.

NO IF'S AND'S OR BUTTS

Dear Editor:

Some of your readers may have noticed the campus was just a little cleaner Sunday evening. That's because dozens of students participated in No Butts About It Day on Nov. 4, an event with the purpose of raising awareness about the environmental impact of cigarette and tobacco consumption. As the co-chairs of the Student Health Advisory Board, we would like to thank those who participated in this effort, as well as the many students who offered words of support throughout the day.

No Butts About It is a simple concept. Volunteers don protective gloves and pick up cigarette butts. We do this to highlight that tobacco is not just a world wide health issue – it is an environmental issue as well. Consider just a few facts:

- The tobacco industry burns as much as one acre of forest for every acre of tobacco cured, using 12 percent of all the timber felled in the world.
- On average, a tree is cut down for every 300 cigarettes (about a two-week supply for a pack-a-day smoker).
- Tobacco cultivation involves a great deal of pesticides, which must be used in the early stages of tobacco growth. Fertilizers, herbicides and pesticides poison farm workers, seep into the soil and pollute waterways and ecological systems, and poison livestock and food crops.
- Cigarette butts are washed into rivers, lakes and the ocean from city streets, through storm drains. Seabirds, animals and fish eat them by mistake. Their bodies have no way to digest the filters and they can die.
- Cigarette butts take an average of 25 years to decompose.

In addition, cigarette butts strewn around our campus are a disgusting eyesore. In just two hours participants in No Butts About It collected 11.5 pounds of cigarette butts. If you want to see what 11.5 pounds of cigarette butts looks like, keep an eye out for our display at the Great American Smokeout on Nov. 15.

POWER AND CLASS GIVES THANKS

Dear Editor

I would like to thank Brian Wood for taking his time to attend our 2007 MultiHands Concert and writing such a thoughtful and thorough review of this performance. Our students work extra-ordinarily hard to produce this extravagant production, and we are very proud of what they accomplish. We very much appreciate The Collegian for noticing this hard work, and giving our students some excellent, well deserved recognition. Thank you for your support.

Re: "A message that should have been heard: Parisa Saving, Ed/Op Oct. 31, 2007"

I too agree that there was a lack of attendance at the Dalit Jamal talk. As a member of production for UVC-TV19, once the video footage has been edited, it will be aired. Dates and times will later be specified.

This is an important event that everyone should see and hear for themselves.

Deval Patrick's promises are big, but delivery is small

Nick Milano

Even in an astoundingly Democratic state with a resounding majority in the state legislature, Patrick has done much too little.

At this time last year, I wrote a column predicting that Governor Deval Patrick's success would be based on how well he managed the budget. As a Democrat with ambitious plans for the state, it was expected that he would increase spending drastically. For this reason, I feared that the implementation of his policies would cause the state to give up on fiscal responsibility as it has a tendency to do. But in a strange turn of events, the governor has not had to worry about the budget. He has not only failed to pass his biggest proposals, but they have yet to be considered in the legislature. As the first legislative session under Patrick comes to a close, Patrick has been a huge letdown.

Of his ideas, one is actually designed to combat the problem I foresaw as posing the greatest threat to Patrick's ambitions. The construction of three casinos in the state is supported by a majority of the people, but the proposal has faced some serious criticisms in its first few weeks of legislative debate. Speaker of the House Salvatore DiMasi, undoubtedly the most powerful man in Massachusetts politics, has historically opposed gambling and it appears that the governor's plan has not changed his mind. In an interview with the Boston Globe's Adrian Walker, DiMasi criticized Patrick's overly optimistic projections of jobs created, average wages paid, overall benefits and how much it will affect the wildly successful state lottery.

I have written before that I oppose Massachusetts' expansion into the casino industry and fear its impact on the state's economy, social life and mental health of its citizens. DiMasi is also reluctant to risk its social ills and the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation agrees with him that Patrick's projections are wrong. Opposition is mounting. In the end, the ball will be in DiMasi's court. If he wants the bill to pass, it will do so with flying colors. If he wants the bill stalled, shelved or killed, you better believe that's what will happen.

Another of Patrick's major proposals was introduced with much fanfare at the international biotechnology conference this past May in Boston. Politicians and industry members alike stood hand-in-hand in celebration of the plan to dole out research grants, award tax credits, construct the world's largest stem cell bank and develop a new genetic research center.

Half a year later, no forward progress has been made. Even with the support of the Senate President and DiMasi, Patrick failed to capitalize on the political momentum. He did not file the bill until more than two months passed. Then six weeks worth of debates were held to decide how the bill should progress through the legislature. Needless to say, Patrick's bid to ensure Massachusetts' position at the top of the biotechnology universe has been dealt a serious blow.

What's remarkable about all this is that the biotech plan is generally considered a good idea. There has been widespread support for its passage and implementation. Where Patrick went wrong with this idea as well as his other initiatives, namely education reform and casinos, was that he made grand public announcements without first building his political support. As unfortunate as it may be, backroom politics still rule the day. What critics call Patrick's legislative attention deficit disorder (his tendency to jump from proposal to proposal without giving each its due time and effort) has caused an entire legislative year to go by without any great breakthroughs.

Even still, Patrick has shown some limited ability. By working closely with Senate President Theresa Murray and DiMasi, he helped to kill a constitutional ban on same-sex marriage. Also, with the exception of his casino proposal, Patrick's legislative suggestions have been received very warmly. But the legislature took its sweet time and he could do nothing about it. Deval Patrick stormed into the State House with massive public support and political good will, only to squander it all.

Patrick's story was heartening to voters as it brought a new-found optimism to Massachusetts. He was a poor urban kid who picked himself up and became wildly successful. He is the state's first black governor. He is the first Democratic governor since Mike Dukakis. But even in an astoundingly Democratic state with a resounding majority in the state legislature, Patrick has done much too little.

Though his ideas like making the state's community college's free for all who want an education, ensuring that Massachusetts remains the international center for biotechnology and increasing revenue through casinos are popular, he has accomplished less than his predecessor Mitt Romney who had just about any piece of budget-related legislation shot down. Patrick has wasted his political capital with foolish, rookie mistakes such as extravagant inauguration parties and the use of state resources to buy a Cadillac for his official vehicle. While not very serious charges, these stupid errors cost him his single most important tool: the ability to effectively persuade the public.

The governor has so far failed to meet expectations. Luckily for him, he still has three years left in office. As he said so many times himself, we should never give up on hope. Who knows. Maybe together we really can.

Faux-civilians teach troops

A futile attempt

Parisa Saranj

Understanding the behaviors of natives in an occupied nation can be a very effective move toward the process of peace-making – as well as the eventual prospect of peacekeeping.

With such mentality stands the fictional Iraqi village of Wadi al-Sahara near Joshua Tree National Park in southern California. One of the most extensive simulated-training exercises of the U.S. military, Operation Mojave Viper trains every Marine going to Iraq on how to deal with Iraqi civilians on a daily basis.

"The training is less about combat and more about how to avoid it," claimed the program leaders to National Public Radio. The training also includes real Iraqis. Nearly 500 Iraqi role players gather in the town to simulate everything from ordinary pedestrians in the streets to suicide bombers.

In addition there are certain individuals with real-life experience in the troubled region, such as Ahmed el Adeb, who is a political refugee from Baghdad. He teaches everything from language to cultural susceptibility. He offers soldiers simple tips like not using the F-word too much, particularly when women are around. He says that most Iraqis know what it means.

It is an interesting strategy to encourage soldiers to politely break into houses at night or in the middle of the day, point a gun at men, women and children, and disturb their peace. He also suggests that soldiers look sheikhs or tribal leaders in the eye when meeting them. I wonder if the program suggests that soldiers look each other in the eye when one is dying from the excruciating pain of a quiver that could've been avoided by simply not being there – in Iraq, in the town or in combat.

In Iraq, bullets don't ask the Iraqis and American soldiers for permission to hurt, to bleed or to kill.

Does the training teach that soldiers look in the eyes of a mother who has lost two children, bombed when they were playing in the street? According to the Weekend Edition Report on NPR, the Marines live on forward operating bases just outside the village of Wadi al-Sahara which is almost identical to the place they will call home for eight months in Anbar province. "Identical" is a debatable word. Thank God that the bullets, bombs, shotguns and tanks in California are fake.

Also, the women wail and mourn for the riotous sounds of shootings and the death of a young man in the middle of the street are role players. Lastly, the fear inside the soldiers' hearts that soon a car might be blown up near them is just an inventive feeling taught in the class. However, in the real towns like Wadi al-Sahara in the real Iraq, blood is real red. Bullets really split through the skull and stop the breathing. Women truly cry out for the loss of their love ones. In the real combat, the fear is existent for the soldiers who are in the middle of a chaos without being able to see all directions at the same time or understand the language.

So, I read that the Wadi al-Sahara in California is "just a jumble of plywood shipping crates and sheds," according to NPR. But, the place that some human beings have been living for generations is not a jumble of plywood. A place called home is where Iraqis have become fond of its air, soil and people. The real towns in Iraq don't have houses made of shipping crates and sheds. The houses in Iraq are made of actual concrete and bricks.

When these houses are destroyed, it takes real time, materials and effort to build them up again. And more importantly, the people who live in these houses have valid human emotions, not role plays. In Iraq, bullets don't ask the Iraqis and American soldiers for permission to hurt, to bleed or to kill. Lt. Col. Andrew Kennedy is the counterinsurgency expert at the Marine Corps base in the Operation Mojave Viper.

He told NPR, "It's always better to capture than to kill and it's always better to turn than to capture. If you capture a man, you might learn something. But if you win him over, turn him, get him to help you, you get a valuable spy." In addition, according to the NPR report, top Marine strategists now believe that being polite must be considered a force-protection priority. "The fewer enemies you make, the fewer Marines get killed," they say.

All these claims and statements worry me. They feel like no one is considering leaving. All these programs, teachings, and spy-making make me believe that there is going to be a long lived occupation in the region. How about we change the strategists quote to, "The less you stay, the fewer get killed?" My sympathy is for both the Iraqi nation and American soldiers. I have nothing against the Marines or those who participate in the program. Training to learn about culture or how to react in chaos is good, but it's the basis that needs to be corrected. Until there are foreigners in full body armors and gun shots in hands, there is going to be fear, disorder, killing and combat.

When an inch is worth a mile

James Mathews

Sick of Humans v. Zombies? There's a better game in town. For the low, low price of your life as you know it, you could become a U.S. Marine. After a short period of basic training, and an all-expenses-paid flight aboard a luxurious transport jet, you could be living out your wildest Operation: Iraqi Freedom fantasies in a fully simulated Iraqi village environment. Your safety is 100 percent guaranteed.

Such are the thoughts that danced through my head after reading up on "Operation Mojave Viper," the U.S military's premier simulated-combat exercise. To make a terrible story short, "Mojave" is a series of patrol drills conducted in a mock-up Iraqi township smack in the middle of the California desert. The drills cover all the basics. They've got real soldiers toting real guns. They've got real Iraqis speaking real Arabic. They've got real everything you need, from combat boots to air support, except, of course, for a few key items: blood, fear, shock, death and war, to name a few.

If "Operation Mojave Viper" can prevent even one sorry episode, then it's worth 10 times its cost.

In a USA Today article from last year, the following statement was attributed to Gunnery Sgt. Kelly Crawford: "This [Mojave Viper] is as real as you can get."

As unenlightened and badly worded as such a sentiment may be, the man, we must admit, has a point. When it comes to fighting hopeless wars in strange and foreign lands, bad training is better than no training at all.

Ever since its early days in the spring of 2003, the war in Iraq has been a hotbed for appalling tales of cultural interaction. From Abu Ghraib to Blackwater, we've had no shortage of proof that when the legions and the locals are separated by race and language, everything goes to hell. Teenage Marines in full-out camouflage point loaded guns at panicking shopkeepers. Frightened women stand by in horror. Everyone screams at the top of their lungs, and no one understands a word. All too often, shots are fired. When the smoke clears, it's safe to say that we with the guns are the "bad guys."

So the United States has blood on its hands, and a month-long crash-course in the California desert is, all we can do to stop it. If "Operation Mojave Viper" can prevent even one sorry episode, then it's worth 10 times its cost. However, you won't find me asking an Iraqi to agree.

It's a tall order for a coddled, middle-class college student, but it's worth a try: put yourself in the shoes of an Iraqi. What are you to do? You have a history that goes back thousands of years, yet you live in a country whose arbitrary borders have been drawn and redrawn for ages. You've lived under the rule of an egotistical despot for your entire adult life, and you've just been rudely awakened from that nightmare by yet another imperial force. Truth be told, they may be a democracy. Half of their population may disagree with the invasion, but could that really matter?

And what if they asked you to help them out, to act like yourself in some makeshift military fantasy so that maybe the bloodshed would lessen a little?

If you said no, I'd be the last to stop you.

I'd be the last to stop you because here in the United States, it's easy to equivocate.

"Sure," we could say to ourselves, "it's good that the Iraqis are helping us to understand them. It's a shame that it's such a mess over there, but it's out of their hands either way."

Such is the stuff of politics. In an occupied country, things are a little different. In the Middle East, there is no middle ground.

"You're either with us or you're with the terrorists." So the saying goes. Although that lovely bit of Texan rhetoric might not ring true for you or I, it holds on the ground in Iraq. A modification might be in order; you're either with the project of global democracy, or you're with the project of rebellion.

Not all wars are the same. On a Christmas day during World War I, British and German troops declared an ad-hoc truce, left their trenches, and met in no-mans-land to drink together, to revel. Not in a million years would this happen in Iraq. In a war of occupation, there is no man's land. There is no common tongue. The Middle East is the center of the world, and there is no easy way out.

Such are the lessons that can't be taught in a make-believe drill in California. Nothing can prepare a young man's mind for the strange nature of war, or for the gravity of the situation in Iraq. A simulated war is no more than a role-playing game. But unlike the "zombies," Iraq is a very real place.

It's a Nerfing shame

Brad Leibowitz

To all the women out there, I am sorry, honestly, sincerely and truly sorry for the actions of some of my fellow males. I say this in reference to the seemingly never-ending new application of immaturity taken on by a decent portion of male society. More specifically, I say this in reference to the new life role-playing game taking place on the UMass campus.

I'm sure you've seen it by now. All along campus, there are kids, mostly men – change that, boys – walking around sporting bandanas and carrying NERF dart guns (or some form of a soft projectile). If you have been wondering what the hell is going on, a camp us-wide game titled "Humans vs. Zombies" (H v. Z) began on Halloween. The game, which as of Nov. 5 has 1,144 registered players, was designed by two students at Goucher College in the fall of 2005 with the express written purpose of devolving the male species.

Essentially, it is a large game of campus wide tag. The goals of the game are as follows: Zombies want to turn all humans into zombies, and humans simply want to survive. There are a whole bunch of rules, yet to be honest I didn't care enough about them to recite them here for you. I do however care about what this game is saying about our collective male culture.

As college goes, every social event – including class – is one large mixer. Every school event, house or frat party is in essence designed to give men and women a better chance to meet and develop a friendly or romantic relationship. From the most intelligent students sitting in the library to the most cinematically inclined sitting at the movies, every public utility has the underlying design and purpose of people meeting other people.

It is in this spirit that "H v. Z" was created. However, whereas other social utilities, gatherings and games are comprised of men and women, college men – of more appropriately boys claiming to be members of the living dead – dominate "H v. Z." Now, it's not that I have a problem with zombies, they seemed to dance pretty well with Michael Jackson in the 1980's, yet I do have a major grievance with college aged males running around shooting NERF darts playing a large game of tag.

Aside from the fact that society sends us to college to grow up, as it pertains to the dating scene, "H v. Z" is another immature digression in the lives of men. Whereas video games have men everywhere sitting in basements mesmerized by an eternally glowing screen, "H v. Z" although a real-world game, is just as bad for the simple reason of its player constituency.

Like video games, "H v. Z" is a male dominated game. It is one which has enrolled a decent segment of the male UMass populace into a game which has its players purchasing NERF guns and other soft projectiles in mass quantities. For this, to all women out there, I am sorry.

In my four years of college, of all the things which I have learned about the opposite sex, the one fact which remains true is that women, all women, are looking for a mature male to have a lasting relationship with.

Women are looking for the supposed product of college: a mature, intelligent, generous, good-looking man. They are not looking for boys touting soft projectile guns or boys staggering around campus in a permanent Halloween costume claiming they like to eat brains.

This being the case, if a good amount of college boys are either playing Playstation 3 or running around shooting Nerf darts at one another, where does this leave college-aged women? Either it leaves them high and dry without a good man by their sides, or as I have seen, it leaves them to partake in the immature games like "H v. Z."

You might call me odd, but women playing "H v. Z" scares me more then men playing it. This is because it is a signal to men that their actions of obsessively playing video games or a living dead version of tag, is an acceptable social mating behavior I am here to say, it isn't and it never should be.

So this is my plea to women and men. Women please stop overlooking the male immaturity pandemic. Instead of playing along or simply looking away, put your foot down and stand your ground. Demand of your male counterparts what I do: maturity. By doing this, it might take boys away from NERF dart guns and Playstation 3 and turn them into what you want from them: men.

Brad Leibowitz is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at bleibowi@student.umass.edu.

Now, it's not that I have a problem with zombies … I do have a major grievance with college aged males running around shooting Nerf darts playing a large game of tag.

Zombie hunters help hungry

The participants of the hugely popular Humans vs Zombies game completed one of their various missions yesterday as they raise over 800 pounds of canned goods which will be donated to the Food Bank of western Massachusetts. Even with the mission, Alex Jackson and Dante Cilibert (right) had to fend off a hungry, zombified Brendan Conway while manning the collection station.

Boston based Jewish comedy team performs along with UMass student improv group

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Correspondent

On Tuesday night the Earthfoods cafe in the Student Union played host to a very funny group of young Hebrews called the Late Night Players. The Players are a traveling sketch-comedy troupe with sharp wit and a flair for the ridiculous.

Based in Boston, they travel the country, touring mostly college campuses and similar arenas.

"We like an intimate venue," said Aaron Kagan, one of the group's members. "This kind of crowd is cool."

The atmosphere certainly was an interesting one. Healthy snack foods covered the tables that were set up dinner-theater style and upbeat hip-hop played at every spare moment.

The evening was kicked off by Mission IMPROVable, the University of Massachusetts student improvisational comedy group. Their act consisted of five members who relied heavily on audience participation and suggestions for their zany, on-the-spot skits.

Mission IMPROVable puts on a free performance in Herter hall every Saturday night at 8 p.m. After 30 minutes of games such as "multitask" and "story, story, die!" MI bowed out to make way for the main act.

The Late Night Players were energetic and enthusiastic, and although only three of the four players were present, they never missed a beat. Right off the bat they announced their intentions to perform sketches, music and Jewish jokes, as well as make fun of UMass.

The University was the main target of their humor, and they ripped into the school with fervor. They wrote a new school fight song, made fun of building names (why is it called "the cage" anyway?), and acted out anagrams of the school's name. Other sketches spoofed cell phone companies, "the worm" and the Chinese zodiac.

The event was organized by the Jewish Student Union and UMass Hillel, and it showed. The skits took on a decidedly Hebrew edge, something they do usually only when it's Hillel-sponsored, said Kagan. "[Our act] is mostly secular, but Judaism and comedy are inseparable."

Comedian Pinette set to bring stand-up act to Calvin Theater

By Ryan McAskill
Collegian Staff

Few people have a resume like John Pinette. He has appeared on television, in movies and was a leading lady in a hit Broadway production of Hairspray. Aside from that, he is one of the top stand-up comedians touring the country today. On Saturday, Nov. 10, Pinette is bringing his act to the Calvin Theater in Northampton at 8 p.m.

With a unique mix of rage, quirkiness, story-telling and fat jokes, Pinette shines on stage as a big, lovable ewok. While a majority of his material is based on personal life experiences, it tells it in a way that allows the whole audience to relate.

In a phone interview on Wednesday Pinette talked about his Boston comedy start, UMass ties, diverse career and the dangers of tequila.

Ryan McAskill: Now you're a local guy?

John Pinette: I'm from Malden, just outside of Boston.

RM: And you're a product of the UMass system?

JP: Yes, I Mass-Lowell. The UMass system is great. I was fortunate to go there and made a lot of great friends that I still have today.

RM: You graduated with a degree in accounting. Now accounting seems to be on the opposite side of the career scale from stand-up and acting, how did you get from one to the other?

JP: My time in accounting was about six months and three months of that was being bored and writing material. I knew right away that I had made a mistake. I gave my two-weeks notice, grabbed my coat and left.

RM: Is stand-up comedy something you always wanted to do?

JP: Yes. Boston was one of the hottest comedy scenes around in the '80s when I started and I was lucky to be in coming up during it.

RM: Who were your favorite comedians and performers?

JP: I liked a lot of the local Boston guys, Steve Sweeny and Don Gavin. As for national guys I liked all of the big names, [Bill] Cosby, [Richard] Pryor, [George] Carlin, [Buddy] Hackett. I looked up to Hackett and Cosby a lot because of their story-telling style, which is what my act is like.

RM: How do you describe your act?

JP: I basically talk about my

Honey not so sweet for new 'Bee Movie'

By Frank Gobinho
Collegian Correspondent

Jerry Seinfeld finally plays a character other than himself in DreamWorks' animated film, "Bee Movie." The PG-rated toon is silly but simple and can't compare to other animated films, like "Ratatouille." The story isn't very original either and seems as if it's been done time and time again, but the movie's "Seinfeld-like" humor and comedy routine save the film from being completely forgettable.

Seinfeld provides the voice of Barry B. Benson, a recent graduate and curious bee who is trying to understand his place in the world. Unlike other bees, Barry can't decide what it is that he wants to do even though the only option for him is honey production and delays choosing his life's work by setting off on a journey outside the beehive.

During his travels, Barry suddenly becomes intertwined into the lives of humans and even befriends a New York City florist Vanessa Bloome (voiced by Renee Zellweger), after she saves his life. Realizing he's been given a second chance, Barry thanks Vanessa and a relationship begins to blossom.

Although it's against bee-law to speak to humans, Barry finds out that they're not all that bad. But one thing doesn't sit well with him: very well, and that is the discovery of humans stealing bees' honey. After encountering a bee farm, he witnesses the human exploitation of all bees' hard work. In an effort to gain justice for bees Barry decides to sue the human race.

In the end, the message of the movie is somewhat unclear, and it seems as though the story is confusedly trying to say that collectively, millions of bees around the globe exist to do their part in helping to make our planet function. Without bees, there would be no pollination – thus meaning that plants couldn't survive on their own and ultimately causing an imbalance of the entire ecosystem.

Like other feature films, there are several plot holes that Barry

Spill Canvas fails to impress with new disc

By Skye McIntyre
Collegian Staff

If an album title's purpose is to give the listener a better idea for the general feel of the disc, The Spill Canvas accomplished its goal. The band's latest release, "No Really, I'm Fine," speaks volumes about the lyricism of the 12-track CD off Sire Records.

One would hope that with three albums already under their belt, the South Dakota based quartet could produce a disc that breaks free of the monotony of most so-called "emo" and alternative-rock music.

Unfortunately, this is not the case. The angsty CD feels commonplace at best, and exceedingly contrived at worst, failing to give fans and those unfamiliar with the music of The Spill Canvas something fresh or exciting in any interpretation of the words.

Guitarists and vocalists Nick Thomas and Dan Tudeman, bassist Landon Heil, and drummer Joe Beck, falter in their combined effort to write and record songs that convince the listener to push past the drudgery of the CD's first track, "Reckless Abandonment," a song whose bridge includes the lyrics "We are earthquakes. We are tidal waves. We're destruction at its finest. We are lava in the Lawes."

The second song is hardly less excruciating in parts as the line "Why can't you just love me back" is crooned over and over again in a pathetic and begging manner. However, it is the most infectious and radio-friendly as showcased by its catchy chorus – perhaps the reason the track called "All Over You" was recently released as the first single. "All Over You" is also currently a featured music video on Myspace.com.

It would have been helpful for the band to spend their time and money on collaborating with artists Andrew McMahon of Jack's Mannequin and Anthony Green of Circa Survive, or a writer specializing in song titles instead. After all, "Bleed, Everyone's Doing It" leaves little desire to listen to the song, and it is another track not recommended.

McMahon and Green's contribution to the disc is unfortunately likely to go unnoticed since their piano, organ and keyboard work is overridden by Heil and Beck's quick riffs and incessant beats.

One of very few bright spots on the album is the track "Saved," a song originally written for the Superman Returns soundtrack. With the exception of the album's closing track "Lullaby," "Saved" is slow

With their latest album "No Really, I'm Fine," emo, alternative-rock group The Spill Canvas fails to break free from the monotony of the genre and instead delivers the fans a disc that seems commonplace.

Seinfeld doesn't fly

Even with a voice cast that includes Jerry Seinfeld, Renee Zellweger, Chris Rock and Ray Liotta, "Bee Movie" fails to live up to past DreamWorks titles including "Shrek" and "Madagascar."

aren't enough to effect or distract most moviegoers. For example, the bees, mosquitoes and cows can talk, but bears can't. These simple inaccuracies aren't enough to upset the storyline in any way, but they do show how the film is quite sloppy in some parts.

The animation is good, but not great. It is leagues behind the masterful animation team at Pixar. As for a DreamWorks production, "Shrek's" animation is smoother but "Bee Movie" does fare better than other films like the messy and choppy animation in "Madagascar."

The main problem with this film is its unoriginal storyline. How many more bug-talking animated movies can they make? Both "A Bug's Life" and "Antz" came up with the idea almost ten years ago. Now, the concept only seems recycled and ordinary rather than fresh and exciting.

With a market currently flooded with R-rated films "Bee Movie" stands as good choice that is kid-friendly and fun if you're in the mood for something not so serious. It's somewhat entertaining and funny, but mostly it's underwhelming considering Seinfeld's involvement.

The crowd was very responsive, chanting along with Zach Sherwin's Wu-tang Clan tribute rap and cheering enthusiastically. Audience participation rounded out the experience, as they asked those assembled for suggestions in the style of former television show "Whose Line is it Anyway?"

All kidding aside, UMass Amherst holds a special place in the hearts of the Late Night Players. "We've been coming here a long time," said Kagan. "It figured earlier in our work."

While still performing as a student group at Brandeis University, the Players would often come to Amherst to take part in Improv Jams put on by Mission: IMPROVable. They fondly recall performing at the Monkey Bar, honing their skills in the comic arts.

The event, keeping with the Late Night Players ridiculous style, ended with a flashy dance-off complete with Disco ball and lighting.

Altogether it was a grand affair on a small scale. The Players filled out their act with religious humor, social commentary, and just a splash of fake blood. The Hillel, as well as most of the small audience, considered the event a success and plan on having the group perform here again in the future

Different generations of Student Valley Productions have been performing improv comedy at UMass since the early 1990s.

"The Late Night Players" comedy style is similar to the television show "Whose Line Is It Anyway?," but with more political references and specialized jokes for the current venue.

life and hope the audience can relate. The biggest compliment a comedian can get is that they are funny. The second biggest is that they could relate to what I was talking about.

RM: Now you did two years on Broadway in Hairspray.

JP: Yes, and I finally have eyebrows again.

RM: What was that experience like?

JP: The national tour was hell. We would move every two weeks, eight shows a week. The musical theater life is a great way to live though. Being on stage, making a mistake and working through it is exciting. I treat everything I've done in my career as a miracle.

RM: As for your acting career, you were in one of my favorite movies, playing Bumpo in "The Punisher."

JP: I was lucky to get that role. They were having a hard time casting it and were at the point where they were going to change the character and I walked in and the director said, "You're humpo." It's the only time I was hired on the spot. I think I was just so close to the graphic novel version of the character.

RM: My favorite scene in "Punisher" is you and Ben Foster dancing around lip-synching opera with a massive action scene going on around you.

JP: I was just glad to have worked with Ben and to see how his career has gone. No one deserves it more. He is incredibly talented and going to be one of best character actors of our time. We got along really well and also with Rebecca [Romijn] who is a great lady.

RM: Another of your famous roles is the carjack victim in the final episode of "Seinfeld."

JP: I saw that episode on a re-run on Monday night actually. They were looking for a big guy and I got a call. My career is very scattered. I'm like the Forrest Gump of entertainment.

RM: Speaking of your career, is there any one part of it, like stand-up comedy, acting, theater, that you love more then the others?

JP: Stand-up comedy is unlike anything else. I'm very fortunate to be able to do so many things. My dream though is to be in Riverdance and be I tall of the Dance.

RM: Do you have any advice for aspiring students?

JP: Do your it, work hard, enjoy the parties and remember that after the fifth shot of tequila really is optional.

RM: Any upcoming projects?

JP: My last special aired in January and I have been touring and promoting it since then. I have a couple more dated through Christmas and the New Year when I will be at the Comedy Connection in Boston. After that I'm taking time off to write some and get ready to do my new special which is called "Still Hungry." Surprisingly it's not about food but about life on the road and still being hungry as a performer after 20 years.

er-paced and certainly more melodic than any of the other 11 songs.

If released to mainstream radio, it is a fair assumption that "Saved" would do well on the charts as it's likely to appeal to the latest generation of top-40 listeners. The lyrics are simple, yet the song's message conveys hope in the face of adversity, without doing so in a preachy or whiney way. It only the majority of the other songs could do the same.

Thomas and Tedeman's vocals are admirable, and the instrumentation is nothing to be scoffed at. While the CD may serve as OK background music, a closer listen leaves one feeling like a group of resentful, angry-at-the-world teenagers got together and decided to turn their adolescent frustrations into a 43-minute rant.

The depressing "Battles" talks of the push-and-pull one has with themselves between feelings of happiness and sadness. Thomas sings: "It's like 1,000 paper cuts soaked in vinegar. Like the battles with yourself that leave you feeling insecure. It's all just a numbing charade until the day you finally wake up and you're not afraid." The following track, "The Truth" espouses on the same subject, hopelessly professing that "There is a part in every day when I lie to myself and say that it's okay."

"No Really, I'm Fine" is a disappointing release from a band that spent the better part of the past summer alongside big names including Yellowcard, Sum41 and New Found Glory on the 2007 Vans Warped Tour, attempting to create hype for the CD's release. There is little off the album that escapes the expected and leaves the listener wanting more. Some fans claim The Spill Canvas "sold-out" with their latest release, yet that argument is highly debatable, seeing as how "No Really, I'm Fine" sounds as if it could have been the work of almost any other band in their genre.

The UMass defense line will need to pressure UNH quarterback Ricky Santos out of the pocket to limit his chances in the air.

Santos' dual threat a factor

and converted 3-of-4 on fourth down.

UMass was surprised as well Saturday, losing to the Rams in a windy, rain-soaked affair in Kingston, R.I. The offense struggled in the elements, picking up seven first downs and converting on just 2-of-16 third downs.

But both teams have moved on from their respective setbacks, and look forward to this weekend's game.

"We're coming off a loss and we have to find a way to win a football game on the road against a very good football team," McDonnell said. "All those challenges are on our hands and we're going to find out a lot about our football team."

"The reality is it's a 12-6 loss and we still have everything in front of us," UMass coach Don Brown said during the teleconference, referencing Saturday's loss to URI. "We've got a very, very good UNH football team coming into McGuirk on Saturday."

Santos leads the Wildcat offense, picking up where he left off in 2006 – a season that culminated in the Walter Payton Award, which is given to the top player in the Football Championship Subdivision. The 6-foot-2 quarterback from Bellingham has accounted for 27 touchdowns this season (18 passing, 9 rushing), and has only been intercepted four times. He's also completed a career-high 73.3 percent of his passes.

Santos is listed as probable for Saturday's contest with an injured shoulder, but is expected to play. The injury kept him out of the Oct. 13 matchup with Iona, but he's started all three games since then.

Brown and the defense know it will be a tough challenge to contain Santos, but it had success in both meetings last season – and they think that they can duplicate that success.

"He can kill you if you let him run around," Brown said. "We really have to do a good job chasing him around and keeping him in the pocket. We think we have the athletes to do that."

Santos finished last year with 384 rushing yards and was second in the conference with 12 rushing touchdowns. But in two meetings against the Minutemen in 2006, he carried the ball 33 times (for 84 yards) without reaching the end zone.

This season Santos leads the second-best scoring offense in the CAA, averaging 38.7 points per game – despite the loss of playmaker David Ball at wideout. Keith LeVan has assumed that role for Santos, leading the conference in touchdown receptions with 10.

UNH uses a variety of running backs on offense, with Robert Simpson (272) and Chad Kackert (222) leading the way. Santos ranks second on the team with 234 rushing yards.

The Wildcats have struggled on the defensive end, allowing 30.3 points per game – the exact total the Minutemen have averaged on offense this season. UMass leads the CAA in scoring defense, allowing 18.7 points per game.

"It's a typical UMass team; they're a dominating team on defense," McDonnell said. "UMass is a very, very good football team. When they're firing on all cylinders and they're ready to go, this is the best team we play. Period."

If the Wildcats can't figure out the Minutemen, it will be one of the last game's they play this season.

Blitz essential for defensive plan team that can do so many different things is reacting to what you see. In the case of Santos, the challenge is getting upfield with a strong pass rush without allowing him to break contain and leave the pocket, where he can be just as dangerous with his legs as he is with his right arm.

With talented defensive ends like Michael Hanson and David Burris serving as book-end pass rushers, it's hard to imagine forcing those players to worry more about keeping Santos contained than attacking him straight-ahead.

"We're not going to hold back on the pass rush, that's for sure," UMass defensive coordinator Keith Dudzinski said. "The one thing we've got to try to do is be multiple in our looks and give him pressure from different directions because the one thing he's special at is getting away from people and making throws down the field.

"There's so many times that you think you got him sacked and then he gets out of it and looks upfield, and he throws a big one over the top."

Instead of trying to keep Santos in the pocket and challenge him to beat UMass's secondary, Dudzinski said the defense will simply use varying blitz packages to keep Santos off-balance with constant pressure.

At the end of both games last year, pressure was the deciding factor, as a heavy rush caused Santos to force a bad throw, so it's hard to argue with success like that. UMass coach Don Brown echoed his defensive coordinator, saying pressure is the key, and if Santos breaks out of the pocket, the coaches trust their playmakers to keep pace with the UNH signal-caller in open field.

"He can kill you if you let him move around," Brown said, "so you really need to do a good job of keeping him in the pocket and chasing him with athletes. We think we've got four athletes on our defensive line, but in our style [of defense], we're going to chase him around with linebackers and secondary guys too. My philosophy is to chase athletes with athletes."

One of those athletes is Burris, the CAA's leader in sacks (nine) and tackles for a loss (11). As one of the players that will reach the backfield first, Burris knows against a quarterback like Santos, you can't just worry about beating the left tackle, once you're in the backfield, you've got to find the guy with the ball – and hold on to him.

"We've just got to be relentless," Burris said. "We've got to keep a cage on him because he escapes pass rushes really well. If we wrap him up and keep a good cage on him then we'll do well."

Santos makes a living making defensive lineman look foolish by turning a potential sack and a substantial loss into a first down or more. Burris said the main approach to know when to react and when to just attack the quarterback.

"First, we want to make sure that what we're doing is in the scheme of things," Burris said. "Then after that, we basically realize we've got to kind of slow down because we don't want to get juked out or let him slip out of our grasp.

"So sometimes we need to understand how to play in the system, and other times we need to understand that we're allowed to do a certain thing in a certain situation and how a blitz pertains to a certain play."

The last two matchups didn't quite become the Liam Coen vs. Ricky Santos shootout fans may have hoped for, but Burris and Co. vs. Santos should still be exciting to watch.

Three-game set for UMass

either Dante Milligan or Luke Bonner.

"I've coached up-tempo pressing teams before, and I think we're trying to take this to an extreme right now, which we need to do" he added. "Because we're not a physical basketball team, we have to spread the court and make it fast. Make it an up-and-down game rather than a half-court, aggressive physical power game, because that's not who we are."

The new offense set in place will create a number of open looks from 3-point range, particularly for Harris and freshman Max Groebe. The duo combined to hit 16-of-29 3-pointers in the two exhibition games – a 103-66 win over American International on Nov. 1 and a 107-80 victory over Concordia two nights later.

The Minutemen shot well in both games, connecting on 14 three-pointers on 35 attempts against AIC and on 33 attempts against Concordia.

Friday's regular season opener against Cal Poly will likely be the toughest test this weekend for UMass. The Mustangs finished last season at 19-11 and the coaches in the Big West picked them to finish second in the conference.

"From everything we've heard, they're being promoted as one of the best teams they've had in school history," Ford said about coach Kevin Bromley's Mustangs. "They have three guards who are as good as any three guards we have in our league, as far as a committee is concerned. They are senior-laden, everything you could want as a coach. We got our hands full, that's for sure."

Cal Poly has three starters returning this season, including guards Trae Clark (9.1 points per game, 3.7 assists) and preseason all-conference selection Dawin Whiten (11.6 ppg).

The Minutemen take on Northern Illinois Saturday, a team that went 7-23 overall and 4-12 in the Mid-American Conference last season. The Huskies have been picked to finish fifth in the West Division and ninth overall in the MAC out of 12 teams. New coach Ricardo Patton led his team to a 1-1 record in the preseason, a 77-63 win over Augustana and an 87-70 loss to Aurora.

UMass will end the tournament Sunday against Northern Iowa. The Panthers ended 2006 with an 18-13 record under new coach Ben Jacobson and have been tabbed as the seventh-best team in the Missouri Valley Conference in the preseason poll. They beat both Wayne State and Bemidji State in their exhibition games.

Ford views this weekend as important to evaluate the team's fitness level and feel of the offense, but realizes that it's only three games.

"We have to understand that this is a process, and we just want to try to get better for each game," he said. "My coaches have had to remind me more than once this week to not base everything on this weekend, because it's probably not the best scenario to play three games in a row."

Game notes

Current UMass Athletic Director John McCutcheon served in the same capacity for Cal Poly from 1992-2004, moving the Mustangs up a level from Division II ... UMass is 65-33 in season openers and has won 12 of its last 14 ... The Minutemen have never played a game in Iowa.

Eli Rosenwalke can be reached at erosenw@student.umass.edu.

Junior point guard Chris Lowe will fill the important role of directing his teammates on the floor in the Minutemen's new up-tempo style.

Injury-ravaged season for UM

Minutewomen survive 2007 campaign with winning record

Another season of Massachusetts women's soccer is in the books.

With a 2-2 double-overtime tie against George Washington on Sunday, UMass coach Jim Rudy and his Minutewomen finished the 2007 season at a disappointing 9-6-2, with an Atlantic 10 record of 4-6-1.

Early signs of a very promising year quickly eroded as one by one members of the Maroon and White started dropping like flies. Injury forced 10 — yes, 10 — Minutewomen to miss action at one point or another during the season. The injury bug latched onto the team like a tick and did not let go.

Next year the team will have to rely on the talent of this year's underclassmen, as it will lose five key players — goalkeeper Kristin Walker, midfielder Jenny Roehrig, forward Britt Canfield, defender Christina Nunes and midfielder/defender Kaelyn Caldwell — all of whom graduate in May.

However, with the hardships the other players endured for over two months, they recently had a graduation of their own sort.

So here they are: the Minutewomen's grades for a whole semester spent in the School of Hard Knocks.

COACHING: A

It goes against my philosophy to give an A- because, unless you're Miami Dolphins coach Don Shula at the end of the 1972 season (or perhaps Bill Belichick later this season), there are always things you could have done better.

Rudy is one of the finest women's soccer coaches the A-10 has ever seen. With a 2-1 win over Iona Sept. 7, he became just the ninth women's soccer coach in conference history to reach the 300-win plateau. He finished the season with 307.

I can't think of anyone else who could have pioneered a team so riddled with injuries to a respectable record. As the season progressed one could see the frustration and strain on his face as he watched player after player go down for the count. Not a lot of chiefs would have kept composure with such a dark cloud of misfortune hovering over his team all season. But Rudy did.

Domenic Poli

When Nunes, a defender, went down with an MCL injury against Duquesne Sept. 30, Rudy threw in Meghan Gould to take over. Sophomore defender Melissa Toulouse also came out of that game (concussion) and had to miss the next matchup against Dayton. Rudy made an adjustment to his starting lineup and changed from a four-four-two formation to a three-four-three.

When sophomore juggernaut Sydney Stoll went flying over the sprawled-out URI goalkeeper, breaking her collarbone, Rudy pulled Cristina Adams off the bench. Adding to the pattern, Gould suffered a concussion later in the same game and had to be subbed out.

What about the quagmires in net? Redshirt senior goalkeeper Kristin Walker collided with an opposing player in 1-0 win over Fordham Oct. 19 and was helped off the field, forcing sophomore Lauren Luckey to take the reins. Though Walker did not require surgery or damage the ACL she tore in 2005 — both which were initial concerns — she missed the next five games until Rudy started her in the last game of her career against George Washington Sunday.

But still, the injuries did not stop there. Sophomore Cristina Adams battled leg problems and then suffered a high ankle sprain toward the end. She missed six games throughout the season. Though she didn't miss any action, Canfield was also nursing a sore ankle toward the end of the season. Then freshman Alyssa Visconti suffered a pulled upper groin muscle the next week. She managed to tough out the game against Richmond, but went down writhing in pain in the season finale versus GW. It was the same matchup from which Katie Ruggles had to be removed after badly hurting her knee (perhaps a ligament).

Perhaps an omen of how things would go occurred in a game against La Salle in 2006; in the 29th minute, then-junior Tina Rodriguez tore her ACL and was out for the season. She missed all of her season, but is trying to get the year redshirted.

Throughout the 2007 season, Rudy took whatever the soccer gods kicked his way. It takes a coach with the stuff to overcome such adversity and alter the game plan accordingly, but he pulled it off ... and with a smile, too.

Offense: B

The Minutewomen pocketed 28 goals during the season, the sixth most in the A-10. After Stoll — who had six goals — got hurt, the Maroon and White lost one of its premier scorers. The sophomore still finished second on the team's scoring list.

Despite the tender ankle, Canfield tallied a team-high eight goals, despite experiencing a scoring drought in the middle of the season. She was also first on the squad in assists and points, with 10 and 26, respectively.

One of the most impressive features of the UMass team was its ability to share the wealth. No one person was the constant heroine for the Minutewomen. If a certain player didn't step-up, she had plenty of teammates that would help pick up the slack. Ten players scored at least one goal, 12 registered at least one assist and nine had at least one of each. That's just plain teamwork right there.

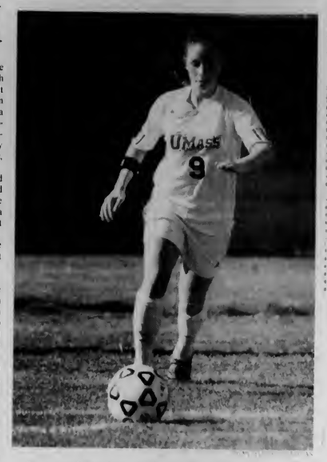
In fact, four players — freshmen Kelsey Anderson (two) and Therese Smith (one), sophomore Katie Ruggles (one) and senior Kaelyn Caldwell (one) recorded their first collegiate goals during the season.

Defense: B-

A team can score goals until it turns blue, but if there is no defense ratcheting it up to keep the buzzards at bay, not many games will be filed under the win column. UMass allowed an impressive 20 goals, fifth best in the conference. That number is especially minute when compared to Saint Joseph's 55 or Xavier's 51. So why then did the Minutewomen not receive a higher grade?

Well, as good as the 'D' was, it seemed that Walker and Luckey spent a lot of time diving all over the place. You see, opposing teams are going to get hard shots off, that's obvious, but it has to be exceptionally hard to get enough reach to get by these goalies. It didn't matter if a player fired from close range or if the shot was a long lunge away — if it was savable, the UMass net-minders (especially Walker) would get it. Many of the goals given up, however, seemed out of reach.

After every match Rudy would talk about how his team fared and about the goals allowed. And he often said the tallies given up in a particular game were not the fault of Walker.

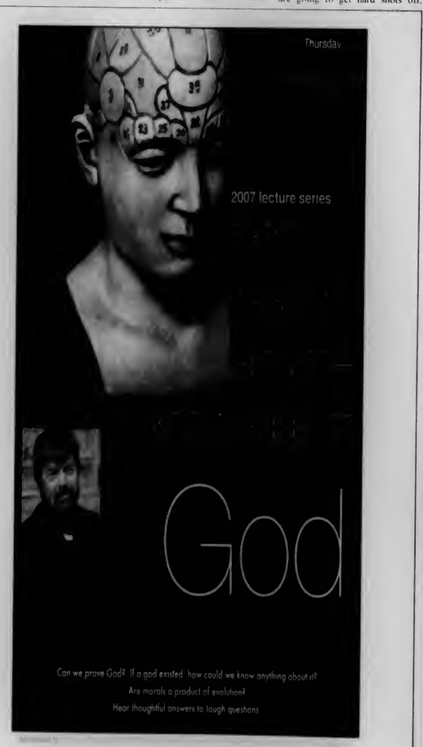


Don't get me wrong. The defense was excellent. It just could've been better.

Goalkeeping: B+

Like I just said, many of the goals allowed cannot be pinned on UMass's goalies. Walker played in 13 games, going 7-3-2. She let up 13 goals, for a 1.04 goals-against average. She added a .856 save percentage, with 77 stops.

Luckey, who did superbly in substituting for an injured Walker, saw action in eight games and started four. She went 2-3. Next year's probable starter finished with a 1.36 GAA and blocked 51 shots for a save percentage of .879.



Domenic Poli is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

Senior midfielder Jenny Roehrig played her final game at Rudd Field last weekend, a 2-2 tie against George Washington.

In a season with injuries to many of its best players, senior forward Britt Canfield and the Minutewomen played thier way to a 9-6-2 overall record with a limited roster of players at times.

New season, old foe

UMass and UNH renew gridiron rivalry

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

This year's matchup between New Hampshire and the Massachusetts football team has its typical storylines: Liam Coen versus Ricky Santos, a historic rivalry with intriguing recent history and playoff implications for both teams.

But Saturday's meeting at McGuirk Stadium has an added bonus. Both teams enter the game frustrated and angry, and each will look to take that frustration out on each other after losing to winless teams in the conference last weekend.

The Minutemen (7-2, 5-1 Colonial Athletic Association) fell in overtime, 12-6, to conference foe Rhode Island, while the Wildcats (6-3, 3-3 CAA) were dominated by Northeastern, 31-13, in Durham, N.H.

With just one conference loss and seven wins, UMass appears to be in good position for a playoff spot. The No. 14 Wildcats have struggled in conference play and a victory over the No. 8 Minutemen would be critical to the playoff hopes for coach Sean McDonnell and his team.

"It's a game that's marked on our schedule every year to play," McDonnell said during this week's CAA teleconference. "When you get to this time of the year and you're playing them at their place, these rivalry games are just great games to be playing.

"But they're very difficult and we have a major, major challenge to try to get by them this week."

UMass and UNH met in the playoffs last year during the NCAA quarterfinals, the second of two meetings between the teams in 2006. The Minutemen won both of those meetings, a 24-17 victory in the playoffs in Amherst and a 28-20 win in Durham towards the end of the regular season.

The Minutemen first played the Wildcats in 1897 and the rivals have met every year since 1952. UMass has won four of the last five meetings, including the last two.

Santos and UNH were stunned last Saturday by the Huskies. Northeastern running back Maurice Morris had 55 carries for 206 yards, as the Huskies had control of the football for over 48 minutes – keeping Santos and the offense off the field. NU picked up 13-of-20 third downs

This year's UMass–UNH game will have significant season implications for both teams. The Minutemen look to ride the running prowess of redshirt senior tailback Matt Lawrence to victory Saturday at McGuirk Stadium.

Contain Ricky Santos.

It sure seems like a simple strategy, but as the Massachusetts football team is well aware, it's simply not that easy to defend against New Hampshire's best offensive weapon.

"He's a great player," linebacker Jason Hatchell said of Santos. "That's why he won the Walter Payton Award. He can throw, he can run. He's an even better passer than he is a runner, and that just shows what kind of skill he has."

The Minutemen are no strangers to Santos' style of play. Last season UMass defeated the Wildcats twice, once in Durham, N.H., and once at home in McGuirk Stadium en route to the NCAA National Championship game.

In the regular season meeting at UNH, Santos lit up the UMass defense, throwing for 383 yards on 35-for-55 passing with two touchdowns and no interceptions, adding 55 yards on the ground. UMass won the game with a goal-line stand on fourth down with time expiring.

The rematch in the playoffs may have ended almost the exact same way – another goal-line stand – but it played out much differently.

Santos was held to just 129 yards through the air, completing 16-of-26 passes with one score and a pick and ran for just 29 yards. The play that made that game as close as Round 1 was an 87-yard touchdown run in the first quarter by Chad Kackert.

UMass had a much easier time containing, controlling and confounding Santos at home, where Saturday's game will take place. The Minutemen's goal this weekend will be to keep UNH out of the end zone as well this time around – as they did in the playoffs last season, and that begins in the Wildcat backfield, where the CAA's leading passer resides.

"I don't think anyone in the conference can compare to the accuracy he has," Hatchell said. "He's made some great throws across the body that were right on the money, so he's definitely a great passer."

Changes abounding

Minutemen to debut new style and '07-08 season at tourney

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

UMass basketball coach Travis Ford doesn't know what to expect this weekend from his team, other than the fact that the Minutemen will open up their 2007-08 season in Cedar Falls, Iowa, in the BTI Tip-off Tournament.

The Maroon and White will play three games on consecutive days at the McLeod Center against three teams it has never played, with Cal Poly on Friday and Northern Illinois and Northern Iowa the following two nights.

"I don't know what to expect, I really don't," Ford said. "I'm anxious to see who we are and what we're doing. I have a feeling on how we're going to play, is that going to equate to being good enough to beat other teams, that's what I want to see."

The Minutemen enter this season as the 2006 Atlantic 10 Co-Regular Season Champions, but come into this season as very different team. The loss of inside presences Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman forced Ford to alter the offense to a more up-tempo style that is more reliant on the 3-point shot. And it's a change that he's wanted to make since he arrived in Amherst.

"It's comfortable coaching Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme, it makes my job easy," Ford said. "But I have never played as slow as we played the last two years, it was just different. It wasn't something that I was used to doing, but the way we're playing now is probably faster than I've ever played."

That quick pace is set by point guard Chris Lowe, who Ford describes as the fastest guard from one end of the court to the other in the country. The biggest beneficiaries of his penetration will be likely starters Gary Forbes, Ricky Harris, Etienne Brower and

Looking to avoid Terrier bite

Mass Attack faces BU, Lowell in pair of weekend road games

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

At first glance, the Massachusetts and Boston University hockey teams may not look like they have a lot in common, but if there is one link between the two Hockey East rivals (other than UMass coach Don Cahoon's connections to his alma mater), it's that these are two teams in transition in 2007.

The Minutemen and Terriers entered the year sans their team-MVP goaltenders, Jon Quick and John Curry, and a beefed-up offensive end, as both teams were aggressive in recruiting forwards in the offseason.

After a season-long battle with BU (24-4-1, 2-1-0 HEA) in 2006-07 which the Terriers eventually won winning the final game of the season series after tying the first two, the Minutemen (3-2-2, 1-1-2 HEA) head to Agganis Arena Friday night to renew their cross-state rivalry.

UMass, ranked No. 20 in this week's USCHO.com/CSTV poll, then heads to Lowell Saturday night for the second of three matchups this season with its sister school, UMass Lowell.

"[BU] is a real hard team to play against," Cahoon said. "Physically they may be as strong a team as we play all year."

Last season UMass battled BU to a 2-2 tie in Boston on Nov. 28. The teams did not meet again until this past winter, when they tied again, 3-3, inside the Mullins Center on Jan. 27, a game the Minutemen had in their hands until a late fluke goal bounced past then-starting goaltender Quick.

The rubber match went to the Terriers, 3-2, in another close game. Of the four other Hockey East squads to make the NCAA tournament last spring, BU was the only one UMass did not have a winning regular season record against.

"We played them really well [last year] at the BU rink, and that's a tough place to play," Cahoon said. "We're going to have play really well to get something back from them."

This year, both teams are playing the goalie-by-committee with Dan Meyers and Paul Dainton in Amherst, and Brett Bennett and Karson Gillespie sharing time in net for BU.

For UMass, Dainton has gotten the majority of the playing time, going

Despite lack of size, skaters use skill to excel with fluid offense

By Jon Meloni
Collegian Staff

Five of the Massachusetts hockey team's forwards stand 5-foot-10 or shorter. Most Hockey East teams have smaller forwards, but typically those lesser in size work alongside some larger players and bring speed to the line.

The Minutemen (3-2-2, 1-1-2 Hockey East) have a pair of larger front-line players in junior Alex Berry and junior Jordan Virtue, but for the most part, UMass players aren't power forwards. UMass coach Don Cahoon understands the strengths of the team and long accepted their identity as a shifty team reliant on quick passes and constant motion.

"We're a small team, so we just have to make sure that we keep moving our feet and keep the puck moving," junior center Cory Quirk said. "We just do what we do no matter what the [opposition] is doing."

To best exploit the strengths and offset the weaknesses of his team, Cahoon developed an offensive style centered on skating. Doing this allowed players like junior Cory Quirk and the departed Chris Capraro to become highly productive scorers. The Minutemen began to employ this strategy consistently last season and rode it – and goaltender Jon Quick – to national relevance.

In 2005-06, the Minutemen relied heavily on the trap and strong defensive play to beat teams. Without much of a consistent scoring threat, the Minutemen struggled to a 13-21-2 record and scored 2.1 goals per game in Hockey East play. A UMass forward or two would patrol the neutral zone and wait for a pass up-ice from an opponent. If he had the angle, the player would try to jump the pass waiting to force a breakaway or an odd-man rush.

Talented teams, like Boston University – one of the Minutemen's opponents this weekend – can eventually create scoring chances by finding seams in the formation. And UMass's opponents did, the Minutemen finished that season minus-124 as a team.

Cahoon, ideally, didn't want to play this way; he merely knew it was the best way for his team to compete.

Last season changed things a little bit.

The Minutemen increased their scoring output by nearly a goal per game. Quirk benefitted from the strategic change, raising his point total to 31 – 13 goals and 18 assists

Weighty welcome

The Amherst History Museum now has 4,000-pound granite signs that welcome visitors.

After having three signs stolen in just four years, the Amherst History Museum has come up with a weighty solution to turn their continued frustration into a lasting peace.

While it's unclear if the thieves have been the same in all three cases, the idea is no matter how good they are, they won't be able to walk away with two 4,000-plus pound granite stones.

A year ago after the theft, Deenie Masters, a board member at the museum, suggested the stones, according to the Hampshire Gazette.

She thought that in addition to being safe from vandals, "It's an appropriate marker for a historic building. It goes well with the stone walkway. It fits in."

Arthur Kinney, board president agree

"The stones provide a sense of antiquity like the house itself. In early colonial days, stones were often used as markers so its fitting for the Strong House," he said.

According to neighbor Sterling Bush, the signs had been disappearing at an alarming rate.

"I saw it go up on Thursday, it was there Saturday, and I reported it missing on Sunday. I can't believe they stole the sign again."

The last sign cost $800 for it's four days of use.

The museum plans to landscape the area surrounding the stones to create a more park like setting, according to director Patricia Lutz.

Todd Langer, University of Massachusetts alum of the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences and founder and CEO of Functional Innovations, LLC has developed the Posture, Agility, Strength and Total body integration Core Training System (P.A.S.T.) to help those with chronic back and other physical pains.

The device is designed to change your workout from a horizontal one to a vertical one and restore balance and posture to the body.

Langer developed the product keeping the body's organization of gravity in mind, while also thinking about how people can incorporate this product into a functional workout.

The idea for the device came about because of physical pains in Langer's own life that were affecting his daily activities. As a baby he had a botched umbilical hernia operation which led to one of his legs being shorter than the other by a half inch as he grew older.

"My body was set up for muscle imbalances, and over time this led to SI joint dysfunction, four bulging discs in my lower back by age 25, bilateral hip dysplasia, rotator cuff tears and more," Langer said.

The actual idea for P.A.S.T. did not unfold until Langer's physical pains started to really affect his life. He and his wife decided to move from Brookline, Mass. to Colorado where he attended the Rolf Institute to study a more in-depth form of manual movement therapy.

There, he started looking into balancing boards and some of the theories surrounding them.

"I discovered that a movement-based product doesn't allow full expression of the neuromuscular system and doesn't necessarily improve standing posture – in other words, the hunchback of Notre Dame could stay on a board without ever falling off," he said.

His training system includes two balance boards that use "proprietary technology to improve your standing posture, so your core muscles are naturally engaged during each and every exercise. The system also includes attachable exercise cords and ergonomically designed push-up handles that reduce the strain on the wrists," according to Langer.

The whole system weighs a little over five pounds and it is portable for those that travel.

It allows for a wide range of exercises that work on each user's posture, coordination, and balance. Langer suggests trying to use the system during yoga or pilates workouts because the rotating boards use more of the body's muscles during these types of exercises.

"To be clear, there is no simple solution or quick fix, but this easy-to-use product makes training for functional fitness more accessible to the average person," said Langer. "It's great for busy people seeking an efficient workout. Essentially, it trains functional balance, posture, and core strength from the ankles all the way up."

Langer has found success in his

UMass dining halls become eco-conscious

Going Green

Buying local focus of DCs

By Frank Vitale
Collegian Staff

Serving thousands of hungry students is no easy task, and doing it as efficiently and as environmentally friendly as possible takes a lot of effort. But thanks to a variety of programs put together by Ken Toong, head of Dining Services at the University of Massachusetts, the DCs have made big strides in the last few years.

One program Toong is most proud of is the great effort made by the University to serve local produce.

Dining services now purchases more than 20 percent of it's produce from nearby growers, such as Joe Czajkowski's farm, which is two miles from campus.

By buying from local growers, UMass provides a much-appreciated boost to the local farming industry.

Transportation from local farms costs less and leaves less of an impact on the environment. The farms in the area also tend to use fewer pesticides and other toxins than some of the larger farms out west, which affects the health of both the environment and the consumer, not to mention the taste.

DC patrons may have also noticed signs for the Seafood Watch program, which is run by Monterey Bay Aquarium out in California.

Oceans across the world are experiencing food shortages as a result of over-fishing and climate change, and UMass has joined up with Seafood Watch to help educate students about the need to support ocean-friendly seafood.

Toong pointed out as an example that Dining Services refrains from serving Atlantic Cod, which appears on the Seafood Watch's "Avoid" list. Instead it served the Atlantic Cod's Pacific counterpart, which appears on the "Best Choices" list. Wild Alaskan salmon, renowned for its superior flavor and freshness while simultaneously being an environmentally responsible choice, is also served at the DCs.

Dining Services also serves Fair Trade coffee and purchases its brown eggs locally.

The DCs have taken a few steps other than choosing the right food to lighten their impact on the environment.

They've recently switched to biodegradable disposable plates and cups, an advance that could only be made in the last few years due to advances in technology that reduced prices.

The "Green Cleaning" program replaced the chemicals used in the day-to-day washing of dishes and cleaning of the facilities with environmentally friendly alternatives.

Just like the New Dirt buildings have been designed to be greener, the DCs have taken steps to be greener buildings, especially Berkshire.

Upon the remodeling of the building, several measures were taken to make it a more eco-conscious facility. Porcelain

Yale prof. lectures on God

By S.P. Sullivan
Collegian Staff

You can't prove the existence of God, but according to Gregory E. Ganssle, Ph.D., you don't have to.

The Yale lecturer and author on the philosophy of religion spoke to a packed house in room 101 of the Campus Center last night.

Sponsored by Campus Crusade for Christ, Chi Alpha Christian Fellowship, Intravarsity Christian Fellowship and the Navigators, the speech addressed the question of God's existence at the most philosophical levels.

"The phrase, 'you cannot prove the existence of God' has been elevated to unquestionable dogma," said Ganssle.

Ganssle finds that the existence of God cannot be proven in an absolute sense, like matters of logic and mathematics, because of limits on human understanding outside the sphere of the "natural world."

Proof of God, according to Ganssle, has to be evidentiary because it is a philosophical question, not a mathematical one.

"Proof has to do with math and logic," he said. "Philosophy is evidential."

Ganssle, who received his Ph.D. in philosophy of religion from Syracuse University in 1995, has written a number of articles on the relationship between God and time and the existence of evil.

He is currently working on a philosophical critique of the works of Richard Dawkins, a prominent member of a school of thought known as the New Atheists.

Ganssle disagrees with the New Atheists on the grounds that they attempt to "drive a strong wedge between faith and reason," concepts that he believes can coexist, and are in fact codependent.

Ganssle found that since support for and against the existence of God is strictly evidentiary, the question should not be whether or not God exists, but what each individual finds to be the most compelling argument.

"The issue is not 'should I believe in God or not' – that's not the question. The question is 'is the philosophy of God better or worse than what I believe?'"

Ganssle found the universal human capacity for morality to be one of the most compelling evidentiary arguments for the existence of a higher being with "moral preferences."

"Every human culture has a very deep sense that there are moral obligations," he said.

When asked by an audience member during the question and answer session that followed the lecture to address the "problem of evil," an argument used to debunk the existence of a god, Ganssle said that the existence of things beyond human understanding only reinforce the evidence for God's existence.

"Is it reasonable for me to think that if God had a reason for evil that I would know what it is?" he responded.

His lecture, "Faith, reason and the knowledge of God," was part of an ongoing series of lectures known as the Veritas Forum.

The Veritas Forum includes events at universities across the country which seek to "engage students and faculty in discussions about life's hardest questions and the relevance of Jesus Christ to all of life," according to its website.

"We wanted to show the philosophical perspectives of why God exists," said Andy O'Donnell, a UMass student and member of Navigators, who introduced Ganssle's lecture.

AAUP conferences discuss tenure issues

By Lisa DiBenedetto and Sibu Thomas
Collegian Staff

The American Association of University Professors (AAUP) held Campus Equity Week Oct. 29 through Nov. 4 to increase awareness for part-time and full-time professors who are not tenured or on track for tenure.

Throughout Campus Equity Week, faculty across the country met in local-ized groups to discuss and protect the lack of tenured professors in universities across the United States.

Meeting officials hosted social events, hearings, discussions, and surveys to gather information about working conditions, payment opportunities and general statistics. They also organized petitions and letter-writing campaigns to help promote national awareness and potential benefits for underprivileged professors.

There are part-time, non-tenured professors and full-time, non-tenured professors, said the AAUP's director of communications Gwendolyn Bradley. "Both have no academic freedom protection, for instance they cannot freely talk about the Bible without risking their jobs. Part-time, non-tenured professors make up about half of the faculty, and are additionally often paid less do not get benefits and lack the academic support to stay current in their field."

The position of tenure awards professors with a permanent job for an indefinable amount of time and can only be removed under circumstances such as voluntary leave, retirement, and justifiable termination.

Almost half of the professors in the U.S. work in part-time positions with lower wages, less benefits, and only partial job security. As of 2007, only 32 percent of university faculty members are tenured or on the tenure-track as compared to the 57 percent forty years ago.

"I think that the decrease in tenure positions is due to the increasing concern of academic liability," said University of Massachusetts student Amy Nash. "It is also due to the decrease in the university funds available. At the same time, many professors are more and more qualified, which increases competition."

As of fall 2006, "16 out of the 1,169 faculty members at UMass hold tenure positions."

Associate and full professors at UMass hold tenure the individual is hired as an assistant professor, said Donna Marino, Director of Academic Personnel at the UMass Provost's Office. "Non-tenured professors teach lectures, [some part-time] professors [teach all their lectures here, and we also have part-time lecturers."

Some students at UMass are pleased by the higher proportion of tenured professors on their campus.

Tenure allows for greater academic freedom and flexibility," said Nash. "It also allows professors to provide the university with original ideas, because they are pursuing subjects they are passionate about."

However, other students have a different opinion.

"I am conflicted," said UMass student Shailes Dikin. "On the one hand, I do believe that tenure gives job security, given that teaching positions are under-respected and difficult to retain,

Food waste still a problem for DCs

tile floors and walls, made from natural materials, were installed, as well as new insulating glass, which reduces the amount of energy spent on heating the building. Eco-friendly paints and plastics were also used.

Another interesting feature at Berkshire is the implementation of a light-harvesting system, which automatically dims the lights inside the DC to a level that complements the amount of natural light.

So far in the 2007 fiscal year, all the DC's on campus have used around $820,000 worth of electricity. Toong intends to go as far as possible with these advances, adding that an eventual goal is to make Worcester a green building within the next few years.

While Dining Services has taken many steps towards being as green as it can be, student food waste is still a significant problem.

With the average amount of food waste per meal currently at .48 lbs (wet) and the amount of meals served so far in 2007 at over 2.5 million, the amount of food waste so far stands around 630 tons. While most of this food waste (around 60 percent) is diverted (recycled or composted), there is very significant room for improvement.

While most food waste is diverted, and either used as compost or recycled in some other manner, the remnants end up being mixed with the wastewater, causing damage to the environment and costing the University money to treat it. In fact, the updating of Berkshire, which brought about many advances in Dining Services quest go green, has also caused a problem in this area.

The Berkshire facility serves a much larger number of meals than it has in recent years, thanks to the remodeling.

However, it sends to Waste Services far fewer totes. In fall of 2006, Berkshire served 533,390 meals and sent 584 totes of food waste to be composted or recycled. In comparison to fall of 2005, before the remodeling, when Berkshire served only 339,951 meals, but sent 738 totes to be recycled.

With the average amount of waste per meal having gone up in recent years, the main issue lies in the design of Berkshire.

Upon the redesigning of the building, it was found that the dish room was much smaller than necessary. With hardly enough room for workers, the cramped room has no space for the giant totes that Waste Services uses to collect food waste.

None of this would be a problem if the students produced less waste, and Toong has implemented several policies designed to address this.

"We encourage the student to eat with their eyes," he said. "At the end of the day, everyone's paying for the waste."

Toong and Jane Williams, dining services purchasing manager, outlined the steps they've taken to decrease student food waste.

"We focus on smaller portions, but better quality," said Toong.

By using fresh produce and high-quality meat, chicken and fish, the DC's aim to satisfy a student's appetite without using too much food. The chicken served is high-end Tyson boneless pieces, allowing for better portion control by both the student and the cook.

Meat carvers are instructed to serve 3-4 oz portions, allowing students to fill their needs in a more flexible manner.

"Just-in-time cooking" is another policy implemented by Toong, and focuses on preparing the food right before consumption, improving the freshness and flavor of the food. Toong emphasized, though, that this all hinges on the efforts of the student to watch their portions, and points out that it affects everyone here at UMass.

"At the end of the day, everyone's paying for the waste," he said.

New invention helps back pain

Todd Langer, a graduate of UMass, stands with his new workout invention, designed to restore posture and balance.

product, having it being endorsed by the American Academy Musculoskeletal Medicine, as well as getting great reviews from users nationally. The product has appeared in many health and exercise magazines such as "American Fitness" and "SHAPE" and has been featured on CBS, NBC, CW2 and Forbes.com.

Langer graduated from UMass in 1995 with a degree in communications.

"It was a great learning experience and helped me realize that interpersonal communication and relationships matter," he said. "The UMass Amherst environment really fostered a feeling of openness that made it a great place for me to learn about myself without peer pressure."

Langer is happy with the success that the training system brought to his company as well as the progress his company is making toward helping people live better overall lives.

The whole purpose of the product is to provide true health and functional fitness to all that strive for it.

"Simply put, the P.A.S.T. Core Training System is the fastest way to achieve pain-free posture," said Langer. "It works with the body's wisdom and realigns your posture in gravity. In fact, sometime around the New Year we'll be uploading a 10-step workout that's been clinically proven to get incredible results."

Tenure discussed by professors

this aspect is very important. On the other hand, tenure may also disadvantage younger teachers who may have more engaging and progressive methods of teaching."

Still others felt that good professors should be rewarded for their work.

"My college writing professor is not tenured, and he is very passionate about his work," said student Alex Lombardi. "It is unfortunate that he does not receive benefits for his hard work."

Bradley continued saying that in order to benefit the institution and professors, universities should make more of an effort to hire full time professors and give more professors tenure.

"We understand that many universities have financial problems," said Bradley. "But we argue that the point of the institution is teaching, and prioritizing the instructional budget. Instead of spending money on new gyms, spend it on the professors."

Many students share the view that professors should have more equalized opportunities.

"Non-tenured professors must always be very careful of the decisions they make and students actions they support for risk of losing their jobs" said Litkin. "The fact that they cannot always write letters of recommendation means that they cannot take an invested interest in the pursuits of their students. Tenure also creates hierarchy amongst professors, which is counterproductive to a student's environment."

Several others believe students should have a say in which professors receive tenure positions.

"I think that in order to officially receive a tenure position, a professor needs be reviewed by both the faculty and the students," added Lombardi. "These reports will indicate that the teaching methods are both reliable and effective. After all, a professor should receive awards based on merit, and not his or her age or experience."

Redirecting student enthusiasm

Bruce Lerner

After the Red Sox won the World Series last week, people showed great enthusiasm for their favorite sports team. When the Patriots win something, the same thing occurs. Talk of these seemingly earth shattering events grace the lips of what appears to be most people.

One cannot deride people's excitement over their beloved sports teams, yet one would hope for the same energy in regards to some things that actually affect the material conditions of their lives, i.e., the dreaded politics.

For instance, why don't people gather in the streets in support of the Graduate Employee Organization's fight for a fair contract, a win that, if achieved, would pave the way for all students to get rid of their onerous fees?

Numerous other examples come to mind, things such as the never-ending quagmire in Iraq, the Apartheid situation in Israel/Palestine, the military coup in Haiti, lack of free healthcare, corporate control of most resources, and the list goes on and on.

These are symptoms of the fundamental problem in this country known as the lack of democracy.

This malady affects every person in the country, and even those abroad, as the policies of the United States are so wide reaching. For this reason, some people in other countries have voiced support for their right to vote in the U.S. The imperialistic nature of this country affects the whole world.

It is easy not to think about where bananas come from. They certainly don't grow in Massachusetts. Clothing and electronics are also largely produced by low-paid workers in third world countries or by marginalized people in industrialized nations.

American corporations and the government that supports them are in charge of the affairs of people both here and abroad. "In charge" means complete domination and marginalization of those who have different plans for their own lives.

The marginalized groups are large and include workers who want higher wages and benefits, people who do not like the idea of wage labor in general, anti-imperialists, anti-war activists and victims of racism, xenophobia, and sexism.

The stated goals of the government and the corporations are to gain profit at the expense of anything else. The first casualty is democracy. How can we have a democracy when, first of all, nobody knows anything about anything?

This is not an accident. It is the product of long term media campaigns that push nonsense over substance and consumerism and imperialism over equality and democracy.

Remarkably, people in other countries have much livelier democracies than people here do. The citizens of Bolivia, for instance, most likely love football (soccer), but they like having water more.

Thus, they were able to win the battle against the privatization of one of their basic resources by an American corporation.

Remarkably, people in other countries have much livelier democracies than people here do.

If only people in the U.S. took things so seriously. Everything is privatized here – healthcare, education, energy. Is this really a way to live life, having to pay for your existence day by day with no guarantee of success?

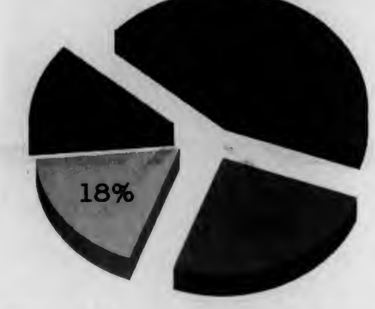
Why don't college students act now? Historically, students have been very politically active, especially in the United States. In 1968, students at Columbia University occupied buildings in response to the U.S. aggression in Vietnam. We need to bring this type of enthusiasm back to our collective consciousness.

Politics should not be seen as a taboo thing but as something enjoyable and more importantly, necessary. For instance, those who want to use their YCMP swipes at People's Market can do something about it. It is not set in stone that people need to take orders their whole lives, not from bosses, not from teachers, not from the government and especially not from the corporations that run this school.

If we do not build a democracy in this country, starting with the privileged people who have access to knowledge, i.e., college students, everybody in the world is in great trouble.

The people with power have never hesitated to use force to achieve their goals and to destroy natural resources while they are at it. Not only our survival, but the quality of our lives, which is quite high in the United States, is at stake.

One thing people can do is to start questioning the mundane details of their lives such as their education or their job. Then they can realize that they enjoy great freedom in this country to act on their suspicions that something is not right.



Let us also realize that baseball, no matter how important or entertaining, will not save the world, but politically active college students can.

Forgotten refugees

Matt Hoffman

Flyers have been popping up around campus lately informing the University community about Middle Eastern refugees. These posters and the events they advertise deal with the Arab refugees of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The plight of these refugees is terrible and they deserve better. They should be living in nice homes and feasting like kings and queens.

However, to solely blame this problem on Israel – as the organizers of the latest round of campus events seem to do – is unhelpful in solving the problem. In addition, leaving out Israel's refugee issue is unfair. I mean, who even knows about the 900,000 Jews kicked out of Arab countries from 1940 to 1960?

For most people, thoughts of Jewish refugees lead to images of European Jews in tattered clothes. However, Jews are a Middle Eastern, not a European people. The Jewish people's national identity, language, and customs derive from the land of Judah.

This land is now called the West Bank. Ironically, here is where the Palestinian Authority reigns. Under their control, incitement to murder Jews – in 2007 – is disgustingly pervasive. Do the organizers of the latest campus propaganda tell you these facts?

Before the Romans forced Jews out of their homeland, Jews were a natural component of the Middle Eastern landscape. Middle Eastern Jewish communities precede the advent of Islam. No Arab, unlike today, would be foolish enough to deny a Jew's place in the region.

While many Arabs can today be found in the Levant (what is today Israel, Lebanon, Syria and Jordan), this wide dispersion of Muslims and Arabs is due to the bloody Islamic/Arabic conquest of the Middle East. Dozens of indigenous cultures were squelched. 'Convert to Islam, or die' was the name of the game.

There was one exception; because Christians and Jews believed in the Bible, they were given the status of dhimmitude. A dhimmi is a "subjugated" person. Dhimmis are protected from forced conversion to Islam.

Yet, they must obey a number of rules. Jews in Muslim countries could not build new synagogues or refurbish their old ones. Jews could not even ride a donkey; for fear that the head of a Jew might be higher than that of a Muslim's.

At times, Jews were forced to wear special symbols on their clothes. While the Nazis replicated this idea, the "marking" of Jews was originally an Islamist plan. The history of discrimination against Jews and Christians in the Muslim Middle East culminated in the years 1940 to 1960.

In the 1950s, Iraq's finance minister was Jewish and his family was part of a prosperous Jewish community. By the 1960s, Iraqi leaders were hanging Jews in public squares. Arab masses called to itbach al-yahud – "Kill the Jew."

The leader of the Arab community in Palestine, Hajj Amin al-Husseini, met with Adolf Hitler to plan the extermination of the Jews of the Middle East.

The anti-Christian fervor that swept these Muslim countries led to a dwindling Christian population of the region. The anti-Jewish fervor forced Jews to flee to Israel. Yet, the Islamist conquest to rid the Middle East of any non-Muslim presence continued.

The Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri Said announced, "We will smash [Israel] with our guns and obliterate every place the Jews seek shelter in."

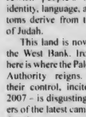
One day after the world's only Jewish homeland declared independence, five Arab armies launched war against Israel.

Said's commands continued. He tells Arabs to clear out of the country so that no Arab blood would be shed as Arab armies attempt to massacre the Jews. One Arab refugee explains, "The Arab government told us: Get out so that we can get in."

A culture of Jews helping Jewish refugees led many impoverished families to be successful.

This Arab tactic continues today. During the 2006 Hezbollah offensive against Israel, Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah told Al-Manar television: "I have a special message to the Arabs of [Israeli] Haifa...I call you to leave this city... Please leave so we don't shed your blood, which is our blood."

Why don't you hear about the Jewish refugees? Instead of complaining, Jews carry on with their lives in dignity. Israel treats Jewish refugees far differently from the way Arab countries treat their brethren. A culture of Jews helping Jewish refugees led many impoverished families to be successful. For example, Jerry Seinfeld's mother is a Jew from Syria.



Yet, Arabs continue to languish in refugee camps. Why? As Ralph Galloway, a United Nations relief worker stated, "The Arab states do not want to solve the refugee problem. They want to keep it as an open sore ...as a weapon against Israel. Arab leaders don't give a damn whether the refugees live or die."

For the sake of the Arabs, the campus community should demand that those responsible for the Arab refugees – namely, the Arab countries and the Palestinian Authority – allow their refugees to live good lives. Isn't it an outrage that Arab leaders treat their refugees so poorly to make political gain out of their situation?

For the sake of the Jews, any resolution dealing with Arab-Israeli relations must include compensation for the 900,000 Jews forced out of Arab countries. For the sake of peace in the Middle East, do not leave out one side's refugee population.

Something to gamble on

Leigh Greaney

I remember being six years old and playing kick-the-can outside with my friends. Every once in a while, some overconfident neighbor of mine would make crazy claims about how much better they were and how they were destined to win. Of course, in a sea of first graders, that notion usually doesn't go over so well.

Then they say it. "I bet you five bucks that I win." It's classic, the whole "put your money where your mouth is" tactic is as old as money itself. Then of course, the game is played out and you either don't eat lunch that day or you become five dollars richer.

Now it's a different story. There is still the same overconfident person who believes they know the destiny of the game at hand. There is still some wager put down on the game's outcome.

However, now there are bookies, overseas accounts, and the game is played by other people.

Addiction or hobby, whichever it may be, professional sports gambling has become a way of life for many college students. Maybe it makes the game more interesting to watch. Maybe it's a great way to make money by doing something you love. Maybe the ones gambling can't seem to keep from participating. Either way, students are gaining and losing money by the hundreds and sometimes thousands over a game.

It comes in all different shapes and sizes. You could bet on a Patriots game with a friend, watch it together, and gladly take their money if you come out correct. You could bet between a group of friends and pool the earnings to the winning side. Even athletes themselves are able to bet on games they themselves participate in.

But, the more popular and more accessible method has been online betting. So popular, in fact, an estimated $3 billion will be lost by Americans nationwide just this year. Congress isn't exactly thrilled with this boom. They're mostly worried that players will curb the industry by betting on their own games. But, the real question is why does this epidemic exists?

It's because it has become so easy and so out of America's control to bet. As illegal as the practice is, it has become almost impossible for the government to squelch. There has been such a rapid increase of gamblers that Congress would be much cleverer to regulate and tax the business in the way that England, New Zealand and Australia have.

Is it better to be a 19-year-old college student with a bookie?

It baked why we don't follow suite with other gambling savvy countries, the U.S. would reply that they are trying to save the integrity of sports and that it isn't not about the money. Or is it because they've simply given up? The U.S. has banned credit card companies from processing gambling transactions, yet gambling still exists.

It exists because it can. Just like alcohol consumption still occurred during the Prohibition, just like people smoke marijuana even though it's illegal, people will still gamble online no matter what. It's a matter of accessibility. The government only has so much control.

How accessible is it? It's as easy as going to one website. A popular site, Bodog.com, is a one-stop place to set up an account and place bets. It's located on the Caribbean island of Antigua and is federally licensed in the United Kingdom, Antigua and Kahnawake. This first trademarked gaming board in the U.S. prides itself on being "sports betting you can take to the bank."

It's a business. Bodog.com has had 10 years of experience. There are customer service representatives on standby 24-7. They have e-mail, they have phone numbers and they have an infinity. It seems pretty reasonable and professional for something banned. It's just another way of moving money between people. What makes it so bad?

It doesn't seem to add up to me. Poker is legal in the U.S. as soon as you hit the golden age of 21. You can also scratch your money away with lottery tickets or even try your hand in a casino.

However, you're not allowed to bet on sports games no matter what age you are. What is the big difference? Is it better to be a 19-year-old college student with a bookie?

There is the whole argument of betting on sports being "addictive" and drug-like. But how is the addictive nature of gambling on sports different than any other form of gambling.

Everyone has there addictions whether it be caffeine, nicotine, gambling or even Grey's Anatomy. In the big picture, a wager on a sports game seems to be the lesser of the evils when it comes to addiction.

Maybe if the government was able to pull itself out of the idea of controlling personal choices, they might be able to see that they are missing out on a big piece of the Internet gambling pie. The business of sports gambling is bringing money to these foreign countries as bookies. Why not make everyone's lives easier and let people chose what they do with their money. They're going to anyway.

Cans, cures – Zombie invasion continues

TAN KISSEL MEDIA CORP.

Humans prepare for Zombie attack at the Campus Center. The players of the game participated in a mission for a "cure" and a successful canned food drive earlier this week.

HvZ reaches halfway point

BY STEPHANIE MCPHERSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Halloween night, the undead invaded the University of Massachusetts, thanks to the campus-wide phenomenon of Humans vs. Zombies, the game hosted by the Capture the Flag Registered Student Organization. With 1,150 people playing, this game is pretty hard to overlook.

Even if you haven't seen the humans huddled together, nervously looking over their shoulders to spot an incoming zombie attack, you have probably heard questions and speculations about the game. People everywhere, game-players and by-standers alike, have been talking about HvZ.

Humans vs. Zombies, created at Goucher College in 2005, is a game that pits two factions of players against each other. One group represents the humans, and they wear a bandana around their arm. The zombies sport their banadanas on their heads. Once a zombie "bites," or tags, a human player, that player must then join their fellow zombies in the hunt for humans.

A human can ward off a zombie by shooting it with a Nerf gun, or throwing balled up socks or marshmallows at it. This renders the zombie's "biting" abilities useless for 15 minutes, giving the human prey a chance to escape.

"It truly has been building the community a lot…it's been a really fantastic experience, and I've seen a lot of friendships form," said Dante Ciliberti, one of the organizers for the UMass branch of the game. "And it's not just players either, actually, non-players have come up to me asking 'so are you a human or a zombie?' or just shouted 'YEAH HUMAN!'"

Throughout Humans vs. Zombies, there are grand scale missions to keep the game from getting stagnant. Last weekend saw the first of these for the HvZ crew during which five lucky players were awarded a free pass for life.

The initial mission came in two parts. First the humans were charged with the task of safely moving a "scientist" who had come up with a "cure" for the zombie epidemic.

Starting in the Lederle Graduate Research (LGRC) building, a team of humans determined the safest route to the Campus Center. Due to a flaw in the plan the zombie horde was alerted to the specifics of the great escape and a large group of people were holed up in the LGRC for longer than anticipated.

"It was kind of loud," said Ciliberti, who ended up losing his human life during the mission. "Somebody working in an office upstairs got upset with us so we cleared out of there pretty soon (the Scientist had already gotten away through a back exit with a squad of 10 or so humans). At this point there was a rumor being spread that the police had been called and I got dozens of phone calls from people participating in the mission regarding this."

The situation was soon deemed safe, and phase two of the mission could commence. The humans had to find 10 note cards hidden around campus with the "cure" on them. Once they found the cards, they had to return to the scientist. With the "cure" card the human possessing it becomes safe from their next bite or can use this vaccine to save an already infected zombie.

The community spirit could be seen during this game when a group of humans decided to self-lessly save their leader, Ciliberti.

"Yeah, we saved him this weekend with the 'cure,'" said Alex Silber, who recently became a zombie while picking up a delivery pizza.

There will be more opportunities to win immunity, but, at the midpoint of the game on Nov. 7, with about 580 humans and 570 zombies, it was time for the enemies to unite for a day free of mutation and tension. The players held a food drive, with all proceeds going to the Food Bank of Western Mass.

Silber said, before the drive, "Well we're going to be collecting food (canned or freeze-dried brains preferable) from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., and everyone is welcome to donate."

During that time, no human could be zombiefied. The factions bound together for the common good.

Nellie Condee, a freshly bit zombie, was looking forward to the food drive. "I've got some prepared meal-things in my room, and I might go out and pick up a couple of cans and such as well," she said. "I mean, it's a good cause, all wrapped up in the game, so it's cool."

Of course, it's still a competition, so donations were left in one of two piles – one for the humans and one for the zombies. The final total count of donations was 999 pounds of food – 490 for the zombies and 509 for the humans. The human who raked in the most canned food was Jesse Punch, and the winning zombie was Doug Ramsdell.

Even with Thursday's pause in game play, the massive amount of players and increasing number of mutations from humans into zombies could have been an organizational obstacle too difficult to overcome. Thanks to Jake Boxer, that's not a problem. The computer science major has written and is perfecting a program that takes care of the registration, the living or dead status of each player, and administration details.

This program has been a huge help when it comes to logging in who bit whom, according to Ciliberti. To avoid a flood of emails, Boxer devised a way to have the zombies upload information from the ID card of their human victim.

There was no standing on the shoulders of giants for Boxer. The computer program was an original. "I created it all myself. There is a different system that exists, but there are a couple [technical] reasons we didn't use it. My system does use previously written stuff for certain components [for sending out emails and database interaction], but the rest is original."

Humans vs. Zombies has brought together an entire campus. A winning team for HvZ Nov. 2007 is far from being determined, but already there is talk of playing again next semester. Whatever happens, don't forget to keep an eye out for those staggering undead when walking about the campus. And support your fellow humans – you never know when there won't be any left.

A real-life American gangster

Newest Jay-Z album inspired by bio-pic proves rapper's talent

BY KENJI SUMMERS-LEWIS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

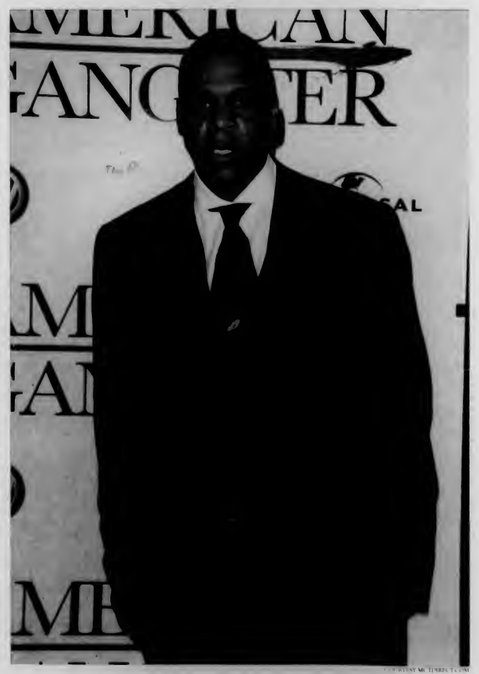
There is no doubt that America has a thing for the gangster lifestyle. 50 Cent said it best on his track "Hustler's Ambition," "America got a thing for this gangster sh*t." Since the days of John Dillinger, Al Capone and Vito Genovese, Americans have been infatuated with the fast and often dangerous lifestyle of gangsters.

Jay-Z, born Shawn Carter, is no exception and with his upcoming album, "American Gangster," he seeks to conjure up the memories of his past life and release his first concept album. Inspired by the upcoming film of the same name starring Denzel Washington, Jay-Z writes from the perspective of an American mobster that lives by the rules of money, power and respect.

On the intro track to "American Gangster," a female voice says, "Gangster mentality: an American way created by the white, mastered by the black and absorbed by the fiend." When you examine Shawn Carter's rise to power you must take into account his origins.

"American Gangster" the album is Jay-Z's way to alleviate the stagnation that had formed around his career since becoming a Forbes Top 10 celebrity and international icon. Sometimes all it takes is a picture to conjure up memories of what life used to be like, and "American Gangster" was the motion picture that helped inspire Shawn Carter's latest album endeavor.

Jay-Z recently told the New York Times that it's like he "was watching the film and putting it on pause and giving a back story to the story. Watching that film, it brought back all these memories. It took me back to those emotions." Fans and critics of Jay-Z were surprised in 2006 when he stepped out of retirement to release "Kingdom Come." A year previous, he had proclaimed that the "Black Album" would be his final studio album.



The criticism of "Kingdom Come" was not for poor lyrics or production, but a noticeable feeling of uninspired and bland subject matter. Gone were the vivid tales of street life and in return came braggadocios' verses about Jay-Z's decadent lifestyle. The streets wanted Jay-Z to stay true to his roots, and leave it to him to understand the concept of supply and demand and give the people what they wanted.

The hype surrounding "American Gangster" has been mutually beneficial to both Jay-Z and director Ridley Scott. The film opened at no. 1 during the Nov. 2nd weekend grossing $46.3 million.

Jay-Z will accomplish his objective with this release. Whether that is album sales or fan appreciation, he will come out on top like he usually does. "American Gangster" (the CD) was released on Nov. 6th and will undoubtedly benefit from Denzel Washington's excellent performance in the Frank Lucas biopic.

Jay-Z, similar to Washington, is the top dog in his industry and it shows on "American Gangster." The great ones are those that find ways to remain relevant over time, and Jay-Z is still leading the way and setting trends for the competitors to follow. Long live the American gangster.

What to do to survive T.V. writers strike

Reality TV, DVD's and other choices

BY ELLEN GRAY
PHILADELPHIA DAILY NEWS

The Writers Guild of America strike started Monday, and unless you really do get all your news from Jon Stewart – whose "Daily Show" on Comedy Central was among the first to take a hit – it's too soon to panic.

But not too soon for viewers to make plans for weathering what could be a long strike, as writers and studio chiefs wrangle over issues that include who does (and doesn't) get paid when NBC's "The Office" shows up on your computer instead of your TV.

In 1988, when the writers last went out, the biggest winner of the 22-week strike was the cable industry, the biggest loser broadcast television, since it's estimated that 10 percent of the network viewers lost during that strike were lost forever.

Nearly two decades later, we still have cable – plus many more options, including the online viewing that, ironically, is likely to only increase as both sides argue about it.

Look, I'm not going to tell you to read a book instead. You should be reading already, even great TV being no excuse for not nourishing parts of your brain that electronic media can't.

And sure, we could all be better informed, even if that means recording an early-evening newscast for playback in prime time.

But if the thought of not getting a fresh fix every week of ABC's "Grey's Anatomy" or Fox's "House" has you looking ahead to the new year with horror, here's what you can do now:

Face "reality."

Though networks don't like to elaborate on their strike plans, it's believed that the pipeline's clogged with shows that don't employ union writers (though some, like the CW's "America's Next Top Model," do have employees whose work, the WGA argues, essentially involves writing scripts). And if you haven't watched Fox's "American Idol" before, this might be the season to give it a look.

Pros: Not all "reality" programming is bad, just as not everything scripted is good. When CBS replaced "Viva Laughlin" with "The Amazing Race," it could be argued that the fall season improved dramatically.

Cons: Few shows are "Idol" or "Race," and in the past, when networks have loaded up on unscripted shows, the overall quality's been dismal. (Remember Lorenzo Lamas and his infernal laser pointer in ABC's "Are You Hot?") Plus, if viewers embrace "reality" in the short term, they can expect to see far more of it in the long term – and probably a longer strike, too.

Order tickets to Aaron Sorkin's "The Farnsworth Invention," which opens on Broadway Nov. 14.

Pros: Fans of "The West Wing" who've been missing Sorkin's distinctive voice since the cancellation of NBC's "Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip" might gain some perspective on the long history of television through his new play, which reportedly looks at the fight between inventor Philo Farnsworth (Jimmi Simpson) and RCA's David Sarnoff (Hank Azaria) over the patent for the TV set.

(Farnsworth, by the way, lived and worked here in the early 1930s, first demonstrating the televising of five images to the public at the Franklin Institute in 1934.)

Cons: Success on Broadway, where Sorkin's career was launched with "A Few Good Men," might delay his return to television. Plus, with orchestra seats going for $100 or more, your cable bill might start looking almost reasonable.

Keep as much on your DVR as it can hold.

This might normally be the point in the season when you're deciding to let go of certain shows you've recorded but haven't watched, but think before you hit that "erase" button: Might a new-to-you episode of Fox's "K-Ville" or CBS' "Cane" look better in January or February, when the pickings could be slimmer?

Pros: There are few things in television as wasteful as the fall season launches, when dozens of new shows are forced to compete for the attention of viewers who already have plenty to watch. Couldn't hurt to give some series a second chance.

Cons: Or could it? Shows that weren't doing well before the strike started are less likely than most to survive a long one, so you risk getting hooked on a series that may never be heard from again.

Put yourself on a low-soap diet.

After insomniacs, next to feel the pain will be soap opera fans, whose daytime faves will reportedly start running out of scripts in a few weeks (and, yes, despite what the haters may say, those daytime dramas are written). So if you're already recording your soaps for later playback, you could try cutting down your viewing by a few episodes a week to stockpile for the future.

But if you end up going cold turkey, consider tuning in to ABC's "The View" instead. Though not as much of a soap opera as it was when Rosie O'Donnell was there, the ingredients for the occasional train wreck haven't disappeared altogether. And though the New York Times reports that "The View" employs union writers, ABC says that " The View' will continue without interruption."

You might also take heart from reports that MSNBC is talking with the apparently unsinkable O'Donnell about a prime-time show.

Pros: Not even a strike can drive away evil twins, amnesia victims and much-married schemers forever – you just need a way to maintain till it's over.

Cons: When it comes to daytime, soaps are just a gateway drug. If you find yourself drifting over to see what Jerry Springer's up to, put down the remote and call a friend. Keep talking till the urge passes.

Open (or upgrade) a Netflix account.

Not only is there an impressive amount of good TV available on DVD these days, but you no longer have to wait for the mail to come to take advantage of, say, the first season of NBC's "Friday Night Lights" or the first two seasons of "The Office," both of which are available through Netflix for instant viewing on your computer, the number of hours each month varying according to your subscription.

Though the instant-viewing menu's heavy on current NBC series – you might want to check out iTunes for other networks' shows – there are also an impressive number of past favorites, cult and otherwise, from "Dead Like Me" and "American Gothic: The Complete Series" to "Quantum Leap" and "Sliders."

Pros: Watch what you want, when you want.

Cons: Your computer might not be where you want to watch. Plus, much of Netflix's TV library, which includes the first six seasons of Fox's "24" and the first season of "Jericho," is still only available by mail.

Hit rewind.

I don't care how much of a couch potato you are – there has to have been some important series, sometime, that passed you by.

For me, it was "Twin Peaks," which I abandoned after an episode or two when it premiered in 1990, leaving me without some key pop-culture reference points. With the first two seasons now out in what they're calling "The Definitive Gold Box Edition" and a winter full of returns looming, my interest is, well, piqued.

There are nearly as many choices as there are viewers, but let me put in yet another plug for the best show on television, HBO's "The Wire," whose first three seasons are already available (the fourth is due next month), and which, having already finished filming on its final season, is expected to return Jan. 6, strike or no strike.

Pros: You're reminded why writing matters.

Cons: Thanks to a deal struck before anyone realized just how big the home-video market would turn out to be, the writers behind the DVDs you choose will probably realize only a tiny slice of the profits.

The recent writer's strike will force many popular scripted shows to air reruns, causing viewers to turn elsewhere for television entertainment. One option is reality TV, like "Survivor: China" (above).

Junior midfielder Erin Parker scored both goals in the 2–1 victory over Saint Joseph's on Nov. 3, giving the Minutewomen their first Atlantic 10 Tournament title since 2001. UMass also defeated Princeton, 2–1, en route to the NCAA Tournament for a meeting with UConn.

Gillespie shines in new role for UM

the team in game-winning goals with four.

Sowry mentioned that the Minutewomen were trying everything to break the tie. There were a lot of reasons that Sowry turned to Gillespie. The first was that the coaching staff tried every other possibility and nothing had worked. The second was her style of play.

"She has this uncanny knack of getting a stick on the ball in the circle and finding the back of the net," Sowry said.

UMass forwards were having a hard time working the ball offensively and getting scoring chances, and Princeton's defense was playing tough on the UMass offense.

That was the only playing time that Gillespie got against the Tigers. She was put into the game at the 57th minute. She scored four minutes later at the 61st and then left the game in the 65th. Sowry mentioned that Gillespie has been more of a role player this season.

This is a change for Gillespie because Sowry noted that her style of play and conditioning is better suited for playing short periods of time rather than long ones.

"She's a role player and in terms of her conditioning, she can't hang for long periods of time, but she did her job when she was in there," Sowry said.

The Minutewomen are set to take on Connecticut in the first round of the NCAA Tournament and Sowry is unsure as to whether Gillespie will see time. The biggest factor is the way UConn plays. Sowry noted that the Huskies outlet the ball really well and can run up and down the field which is something that Gillespie struggles with.

Although Sowry is unsure whether she will use Gillespie or not, the junior forward has seen game time against the Huskies. The two teams met during the regular season, with UConn edging UMass, 3-2, on a late goal by Lauren Aird. Gillespie played early in the game and got her first goal of the year. Junior Mary Shea brought the ball up the field and found an open Gillespie who brought it into the circle and shot it left of UConn keeper Andrea Maimero.

Before sitting out five games due to illness, Gillespie had been heating up. She scored in back-to-back games at UConn and at home against Brown. She added a goal in a blowout victory against West Chester and scored the game-winner against Saint Louis before going on the injured list.

Despite limited playing time and sitting out a handful of games, Gillespie has still contributed significantly to the team. She has done everything the coaching staff has asked of her and Sowry said that she could not be any happier with the results.

Justin McGrail can be reached at jvmcgrail@student.umass.edu.

UConn awaits in first round

since the season began. Early in the year the team showed a lot of talent, but was plagued by consistency issues and scoring droughts that led to a 7-7 record on Oct. 12 after a loss to Temple. Since then the team has caught fire, winning six of their last seven games and winning every elimination game they've played so far.

"I think our team has such a positive outlook now," O'Brien said. "I think that everyone truly believes we can go really far and I think our confidence has carried over."

The dream season would come to an end if UMass falls to the Huskies tommorow. The Minutewomen face an extremely challenging opponent in top-seeded UConn (20-2), which is a nationally-ranked team with home-field advantage this weekend. The Huskies score an average of 3.90 goals per game while allowing only 1.34 goals against. In order to advance to the second round, the Maroon and White will have to be flawless.

One subtle edge UMass will have is familiarity. It has already played UConn earlier this year and played them tough, losing 3-2 with the Huskies' winning goal coming with just 1:17 to play. The Minutewomen have confidence that they can use their experience to pull off an upset.

"We've improved so much since then and everything we have fixed since then will play a big factor in the game," Jamie Bourazeris said, referring to the last game against UConn.

"We are a better team since we've played them, but with that being said, they are also a better team," Sowry said. "We'll probably press a little harder against them, we're looking for a nice clean game, we will remain solid at the back, and put pressure on their goal."

All season long, the Minutewomen have depended on their outstanding defense to win games. Led by O'Brien, Bourazeris, Nicole Phelan and the A-10 Tournament's most outstanding player Kristina DoRosario, UMass has been a nightmare for opposing scorers, holding opponents to less than one goal per game.

That unit will have to be strong for UMass to have a chance to knock off the Huskies. UConn has three players who have scored at least 10 goals, including Lizzy Peijs who has scored 15 goals along with 10 assists.

"They have to play well for us to be successful, there's no doubt about it," Sowry said.

The defense will be key, but just as important will be the performance of the starting goaltender. As usual coach Sowry refuses to say whether sophomore Sarah Williams or senior Becky Letourneau will get the start. It seems highly likely that Sowry will go with experience and start Letourneau.

In the Minutewomen's NCAA tournament play-in game against No. 18 Princeton, Letourneau played her best game of the entire season, stopping 12-of-13 shots on goal, including two penalty corners with less than a minute left in the game to secure the 2-1 victory.

As the season has progressed the most noticeable improvement has come from the team's offense. In the first half of the year, UMass was shutout three times in its first seven games, but has scored at least two goals in each of its last four games. Cher King is the team's leader on offense with eight goals and five assists; no other player has more than five goals, although 10 different players have scored a goal for UMass.

The Minutewomen are sizable underdogs to UConn, but if they can keep the game close, anything can happen especially when a team has momentum and faith in itself.

Scott Feldman can be reached at sfeldman@student.umass.edu.

Junior Prince Oboh has started six games for the Minutemen this season, registering four points on a goal and two assists. UMass can secure a conference tournament berth with a victory over Saint Joseph's Friday.

UMass fighting for seeding

A pair of sophomores has led UMass's offensive revival with some help from a couple talented freshman playmakers in the middle. Bryan Hogan, Mark DeSantis and Stuart Amick are the top three goal scorers. Hogan leads UMass with five goals with DeSantis and Amick tied for second with three.

Hogan led UMass last season, but struggled late in the year. The addition of Amick and freshman Ben Arikian, along with DeSantis' emergence alongside him have allowed Hogan more space to work with.

He excels best when midfielders and defenders play the ball over the top to him, allowing him to strike in the air. DeSantis complements him perfectly with excellent ball skills and a feisty demeanor that welcomes contact from the physical center back around the A-10. With three of SJU's four defenders standing over 6-foot tall, the Minutemen are in for another physical A-10 game.

Against opponents like URI, UMass entered into overly physical scrums for balls in the penalty area and struggled with the strength of the Rams. The Hawks are certainly on par with the Rams in size, but the skill of URI's backfield is far superior to that of the Hawks.

The trip to Pennsylvania is a homecoming of sorts for the six UMass players who call the state home; three of them – Hogan, Daniel Lepone and freshman Matt Hess – figure to see some time.

Hogan and three players on the Temple roster attended the same high school, which provides the only genuine storyline for this game. The Owls are winless in the A-10 this season.

Like the Hawks, Saint Louis handed Temple a thumping last week; defeating the Owls 5-1. Also like their cross-town rival, the Owls have scored 14 goals this season, but have allowed nearly half as many as St. Joe's. The Owls have simply suffered a series of bad beats throughout the season. Five Temple losses were by a 1-0 score.

Temple has not won a game since Oct. 6 when it defeated La Salle. Since then, the Owls are 0-6-1.

Early meet next for UMass

Swimmers travel to N.Y., to see familiar faces at event

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts swimming and diving teams are set to take on Binghamton Sunday in Vestal, N.Y.

The coaches of both teams are well acquainted with their counterparts. Binghamton men's coach Sean Clark is a UMass alumnus and a former athlete of UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth. Binghamton assistant coach Aimee Bourassa graduated from UMass in 2000, after completing a four-year career swimming for current women's coach Bob Newcomb.

Bourassa brings credible experience to the Bearcats, ranking in the top 10 all-time for UMass in multiple events.

However this is by no means an established rivalry. UMass has only faced the Bearcats on one other occasion.

The meet will start at 11 a.m. in order to get the swimmers ready to perform early in the morning at their very best. They will need to get acclimated to morning meets because that is the time that preliminary races for the Atlantic 10 Conference Championships begin.

While not experiencing any competitive swimming in the past two weeks, both teams had very good workouts in that time period.

In Newcomb's mind, no specific group of swimmers in particular need any more work than another. He believes that they need to progress as a team.

"Every group needs work," said Newcomb. "Every group has really performed [in training] and we've done a lot of work these last couple of weeks. So I'm excited to see them swim again."

Last year in the tri-meet at Colgate, both UMass teams swept the Bearcats in both swimming and diving. The women's team dominated Binghamton, 235-66.

Last year as a junior, captain Samantha Demty paced the Minutewomen with a first-place finish in the 200-yard butterfly event.

Junior Karen Upperco currently leads the conference in both the one-meter dive (239.69) and the three-meter dive (262.80). Upperco swept both events last year at the tri-meet as well.

Senior co-captain Colleen McCann does not discount the skill of the Binghamton team, but knows that the team is more focused on its second chance against Boston University next weekend at the Terrier Invitational in Boston. The Terriers spoiled the Maroon and White's first home meet this season, sweeping both the men's and women's teams.

"Going into this weekend, we're more prepared for Boston University," McCann said. "We're just trying to get through this week and race hard against Binghamton and then get to BU."

Yarworth knows the strengths of the Minutemen and he also knows that his team has worked hard to get ready for the Bearcats and shake off the loss against Army in its last meet.

"We went into a two-week hard-training cycle and we're still in that," Yarworth said. "The kids have really risen to the challenge and I think we're ready to rip it up a little bit."

In last year's tri-meet against Colgate and Binghamton, the Maroon and White beat the Bearcats, 186-114.

The freestyle events will be crucial for a victory for the Minutemen. Sophomore Juan Moliere is undefeated in the 50-yard and 100-yard freestyle events this season and his 50-yard freestyle time (21.19) leads the A-10 Conference. Moliere won the 50-yard freestyle against the Bearcats last year. Senior captain R.J. Rappe was also a key contributor in last year's meet against Binghamton. The Minnesota native swept both the one and three-meter dives. Rappe leads the conference in the three-meter dive this season (306.97).

Senior co-captain A.J. Vozella believes that the meet will have an added flare, given that it is a student meets teacher scenario in terms of the coaches.

"It's going to be competitive," said Vozella. "I'm sure they're going to come into the meet ready to really swim fast."

coach during each offseason, Dacko concentrated on all areas of the game and tried to think of what could be done to improve them.

As far as offense goes, she said the key is getting down to the basics.

"[We need to] execute – just make extra passes and execute and take advantage of who has the hot hand," she said. "We're pretty much an inside-outside team. I think that just making the extra passes, utilizing the clock a little more would be beneficial to us."

Mills was the leading scorer last season, racking up 482 points. The now-departed Tamara Tatham was the runner-up with 383, while third-place Rosanio accumulated 323.

She said her team has made a concerted effort to use the ball more wisely and to take better shots. It is a better shooting team than in the '06-'07 season, she added.

On defense, Dacko said there is work to be done. She said their defense is behind their offense this year.

The step backward is due, in part, to the loss of last year's lone senior Tamara Tatham. The older sister of senior Alisha Tatham, Tamara led the team in rebounds (with 269) and was the best all-around defensive player.

Tamara now plays for the Catz, a professional team in Lappeenranta, Finland.

Mills is also a solid defender, blocking 64 shots last year. The next highest number was seven, shared by Tamara and then-junior Whitney McDonald. Rosanio is the also strong defensively. She plays with grit and intensity and spends much of her time on the ground diving after loose balls. She finished last season with 34 steals (third highest) and four shots blocked.

"I hope we have a great year," Dacko said. "I'm hoping that we come out ready to play every game, play hard. If we're going to go down, we're going to go down in a war."

Dacko added four freshmen and a sophomore to help combat the tough schedule.

The freshmen are Valerie Avebe, from Dovala, Cameroon, Stephanie Lawrence from Rignaud, Quebec, Cerle Mosgrove (Needham, Mass.) and Teya Wright (Paterson, N.J.)

The sophomore is Jene'e Jemison, a transfer from Wabash Valley College, a junior college in Illinois. She was ranked as one of the top 25 junior college players by All Star Girls Report.

"[They add] a lot. They're tall and long and quick," Mills said. "They compete hard in the practice games and we definitely have to play a lot harder against [the all-male practice squad]. I definitely see a lot of points that we can get out of them and a lot of defense too, just with their quickness, so it's going to be very helpful."

Dacko says she thinks the Minutewomen are a tougher and more prepared group mentally than last year and that it is all about taking it one game at a time.

She cited specifically UMass's meltdown in the A-10 Tournament on March 2. The team went into the tournament's first game and completely underestimated St. Bonaventure, losing 63-30. She said the players have learned from that experience and will be better prepared for each game this time around.

She added that last year's team was a first-half team. The Minutewomen seemed to break down around halftime and lose the drive and intensity that they needed to close out games.

Junior guard Sakera Young agreed.

"Our main goal is to finish games," she said. "I don't even know how many points we gave up from losing focus. The second half it's like we weren't even there playing."

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

Guard Kim Benton (left) and forward Kate Mills (right) will be two key players for Minutewomen coach Marnie Dacko this season. Mills led the team in scoring last season, while Benton led in 3-pointers.

Mills leads frontcourt

Forwards

Mills was the Minutewomen's leading scorer last season with 16.1 points per game. She also ranked second on the team in rebounds and was named to the A-10 All-Conference Third-Team.

"If she could shoot 30 times a game that's what I'd like her to do," Dacko said. "She gets more reluctant with that and likes to incorporate her teammates in the mix, but if we can get her as many open looks as we can we'll have a great season."

Defense is just as important as offense, and that is one area Mills looks to improve upon her senior season. She keeps remembering the final game of last season where the opposition was able to score on her.

Mills has also been working to increase her confidence by working on improving an inside-outside game. Her ability to get to the line is one of her strongest attributes – she visited the charity stripe 115 times and shot 81.9 percent, while no other returning player for UMass shot above 68 percent from the line.

Though Tamara Tatham is gone, her sister, Alisha Tatham, is returning to start for the Minutewomen. Tatham and Mills were the only players to start all 30 games last year, and both come into this season with improved games.

Tatham finished fourth on the team in points and rebounds last year, and she is the team's toughest worker, as well as being a defensive stopper.

Along with frontcourt partner Mills, Tatham has her sights set on qualifying for the NCAA Tournament.

Also vying for time in the frontcourt is freshman Teya Wright. Throughout her senior year at Paterson Eastside High School, Wright averaged 15 points and 20 rebounds per game.

"She's got a nose for the ball that I haven't seen in a long time," Dacko said.

Dacko compared her to one of her former players at Northwestern, Michele Savage. This is high praise considering Savage finished her career with the Wildcats amassing 1,688 points, 681 rebounds, and 200 steals, all while shooting .606 from the field.

Much praise is given to Wright, but Dacko also wants the first-year player to work on her conditioning. The future plan is to have Wright mature into a player that can fill the void of Tamara Tatham.

Two other freshmen who can contribute to the team are Stephanie Lawrence and Valerie Avebe.

Lawrence reminds Dacko of a combination of Rosanio and Mills, and she will be better at guarding forwards than guards, as she needs to improve her defensive footwork. Originally from Cameroon, Avebe is a good athlete who lacks experience and is learning along the way.

Centers

Senior Whitney McDonald will fill the final starting spot for the Minutewomen. McDonald saw modest playing time last season, and finished the campaign averaging 2.7 points and 1.5 rebounds.

Backup center Jene'e Jemison transferred from Division III Wabash Valley and still has three years of eligibility. She has a nice shooting touch but still needs some time to get healthy.

UM runners ready for NCAA qualifier

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts cross country teams will travel to Franklin Park in Boston Saturday to race in the NCAA Regional Qualifier hosted by Harvard University.

The top two teams for both men and women will move onto the NCAA Championships along with the top two individuals who aren't members of those teams.

The Minutemen head into this meet after a few strong weeks placed near the top in numerous races. The men hope to keep up the stamina and place well on Saturday.

Last year the men took 14th place.

"We want to significantly improve over our performance from last year," men's coach Keri O'Brien said. "We've set our goals pretty high, we'd like to finish in the top six."

According to O'Brien, the returning runners have matured and the freshmen have a lot of talent making the goal more easily attainable.

The toughest competition the Minutemen will face is from Iona and Providence, teams that were each in the NCAA tournament the last two years. Steep competition will also come from Syracuse, Cornell and Columbia. These five schools were ranked high in cross country polls, according to O'Brien.

"It will be a very tough battle for 6th place," O'Brien said.

It's also a battle that he's excited to see take place.

"I'm really excited about the growth the team has made," O'Brien said. "We've raced in 80-degree weather, the next week we ran in three inches of rain and a couple of inches of mud. We've grown in this fall season and learned to discard the distractions and look at the task at hand."

The Minutewomen will race against all of the Division I teams in New York and New England.

"The team is very excited about going," women's coach Julie Lal reniere said.

The women will run the 6,000 meters, which is 1,000 meters longer than what they usually run.

The Minutewomen look to senior Christina DeRosa to lead the team on Saturday. DeRosa is coming off a very impressive season. Two weeks ago she was named All-Conference and Most Outstanding Performer for finishing first in the Atlantic 10 Championships.

DeRosa is the only returning runner to this weekend's qualifying meet and last year she led the team to a 21st place finish, where she placed 46th individually.

"Christina DeRosa will continue to lead the program," Lal reniere said. "Sees York and New England is a hotbed for distance runners. It will give her a chance to race against the very best the region has to offer.

"Christina gets very excited about running against good competition," she added. "She's not afraid of it, she really enjoys being pushed. She's looking forward to having a great day on Saturday. The higher the caliber she's racing against will help her be a better competitor."

The Minutewomen are without two key runners Saturday, senior Amber Sayer and freshman Lauren Mocker – runners who usually finish in third and fourth place for the team, respectively.

"Without them [Sayer and Mocker] running it's really not going to be indicative of what we could have done [as a team]," Lal reniere said. "There is a lot of illness going around right now, we can't really predict how we'll finish this weekend."

The women have prepared for this meet for the past two weeks. They got a couple of days off after the A-10 Championships and then started practicing hard last week. This week they've been working on high quality and low volume practices to stay rested for Saturday.

Lal reniere doesn't expect the suspected cold weather on Saturday to affect the Minutewomen, because good competitors will compete well regardless of the weather conditions.

"I think the team is rested and ready to go," Lal reniere said.

Huskies provide big challenge for UMass in NCAA tourney

By Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

The roller coaster ride continues tomorrow for the Massachusetts field hockey team, as they travel to Storrs to take on No. 4 Connecticut in opening round play of the NCAA tournament.

It has certainly been a memorable season for the Minutewomen (17-8, 8-1 A-10), a team that has exceeded even the wildest expectations for this season. Coming off a 6-14 season, and undergoing a complete overhaul of the coaching staff, this was expected to be a rebuilding season for UMass.

At the beginning of the season the coaching staff admitted that their ideal goal for this year was to make the finals of the Atlantic 10 tournament.

Not only did the team make the finals, it won the A-10 Championship and went on to defeat Ivy League Champion Princeton to earn the right to play in the NCAA's. Everyone involved with the team is ecstatic about the results.

"The whole staff, the players, and everyone in the program are so excited," UMass coach Justine Sowry said. "We have nothing to lose and everything to gain at this point."

"It's just very exciting, even though we didn't get results, we have worked hard for four years, so to have finally reached our potential is very rewarding and very exciting," captain Erin O'Brien said.

The team has improved immensely

With a trip to the NCAA Tournament on the line, the Massachusetts field hockey team needed a spark to break the 1-1 tie with Princeton. UMass coach Justine Sowry turned to the bench and brought in last year's leading scorer, junior Lauren Gillespie, to get the go-ahead goal.

Though her time was short-lived, Gillespie did what was asked and scored the game-winner to put UMass into the tournament. Freshman Jamie Bourazeris was set up on the right side of the circle for a free hit. She crushed the ball into the circle and found Gillespie who tipped the ball over the keeper to give UMass the 2-1 lead.

The goal was Gillespie's fifth of the season, which ties her with Bourazeris for second on the team.

Gillespie missed the five previous games due to an illness and had a hard time readjusting in the practices leading up to the game. She now leads

Mills, Rosanio expected to lead Minutewomen in '07-08

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

It's time to get down to business for the Massachusetts women's basketball team as it plays the first of a 30-game schedule against Vermont today at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

The only game action the Minutewomen have seen so far was a Nov. 2 exhibition, which they lost 94-83 in overtime to Athletes in Action at the Curry Hicks Cage. Senior Kate Mills had 31 points, making 15-of-23 shots from the floor. She also registered nine rebounds. Senior Pam Rosanio added 17 points, and Alisha Tatham contributed another 12.

UMass can't wait to face the Catamounts, who are coming off a 61-52 exhibition game win against Bishop's University (Lennoxville, Quebec) Saturday.

"They want to push the ball down the floor," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "They're a transition team. They want to advance the ball to [sophomore guard] Courtnay Pilypaitis and get shots. They're mostly a perimeter team."

After tonight's game the Maroon and White face Boston College at home Nov. 14 and Northeastern away Nov. 17 within a span of eight days before they head into the rest of schedule. It is something Dacko has been preparing for all offseason.

The Minutewomen will take on their usual Atlantic 10 foes in addition to non-conference matchups with Villanova (Dec. 12) and Wagner (Dec. 15). Dacko said she expects the most intense competition down the line when her squad faces George Washington, Charlotte, Xavier and Temple — all schools with stellar women's basketball programs.

She stressed, however, that she is not worried about other teams. She is focusing on her players, fine-tuning them for competition. Like every

Four starters return for UM

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team enters the 2007-08 season having lost only one senior, however, she now plays professionally in Finland.

It will not be easy for the Minutewomen to replace Tamara Tatham in the frontcourt – she averaged a team-high nine rebounds and also contributed 12.8 points per game, which was good for second on the team last year.

"She's somebody who knew how to run the offense," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "She's somebody who was a catalyst on defense; when we had breakdowns she was always there. We're going to have to make up for her with a few people."

Despite the loss, Minutewomen basketball fans have nothing to frown about. The team returns four of five starters from last season, including preseason Atlantic 10 All-Conference Second-Team power forward Kate Mills, and they also have an athletic incoming freshman class who can shoot the ball.

GUARDS

Junior Sakera Young started 16 games at the point guard position last year, and is expected start this year when the season opens. Kim Benton, who started 14 games last season at the point, will begin coming off the bench. The particular matchups on defense will dictate which player will start, but both will see significant time.

Dacko has been pleased with the progess of both players in the offseason, citing that they attended point guard camp over the summer.

Benton has been working on her defense, and is a constant 3-point threat. She led UMass in 3-point attempts and makes last season, and her .350 field goal percentage from outside the arc was also tops on the team.

Young is a skilled dribbler whose knowledge of the game grew over the summer, and she now has a better understanding of how to play a controlled game.

"A year ago it was four against five because Sakera never would shoot the ball," Dacko said, "so she's really worked extremely hard on her perimeter game — her whole game is coming together."

Three-year starter Pam Rosanio will return to the Minutewomen at the guard position. She can also play forward, depending on what 10 players are on the floor. Rosanio was the Minutewomen's third-leading scorer last season at 11.1 points per game, and finished second on the team with 22 3-pointers.

"Pam's the first one down the floor, one of the hardest working players I have on the team," Dacko said. "[She] brings emotion to the team, [is] really competitive, [and] dives on every loose ball.

"She's somebody that fans will love watching play."

Backup guard Stephanie Gerardot saw an average of 15 minutes of game action last season and averaged 4.2 points. She can shoot and break zones, and has also improved on getting into the lane, getting to the free throw line and creating for her teammates.

New to the mix of guards is Cerie Mosgrove. The freshman is a skilled shooter who can knock down multiple outside shots on any given night, but Dacko looks for her to become more of a scorer with a mean streak.

Sophomore Diatiema Hill played in 27 games last year and contributed mainly off the bench, but is out with an ACL injury after having surgery in June.

See ROSTER on page 7

Sophomore Mark DeSantis and the Minutemen travel to Philadelphia this weekend for a pair of conference games to end the regular season. UMass will take on Saint Joseph's Friday and Temple Sunday.

Trying to solve the road woes

Weekend pair against Hawks, Owls to determine seeding

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

It's no surprise that the Massachusetts men's soccer team hates to travel. The Minutemen are 7-1 at Rudd Field and 4-5 on the road.

But the Minutemen (11-6, 5-2 Atlantic 10) must get past their distaste for road games as the final weekend of A-10 play takes them to Philadelphia for matchups with Saint Joseph's on Friday and Temple on Sunday.

UMass ranks fourth in the A-10 standings entering today's contest. A win over the Hawks clinches a spot in the A-10 Tournament, which begins Nov. 15 in Dayton, Ohio. Saint Joseph's enters the match having lost three of its last four games including an embarrassing 8-0 loss to Saint Louis on Nov. 2. The Hawks conclude their regular season action Sunday against Rhode Island.

If the Minutemen can take all four points away from this weekend, they should enter the tournament as the No. 3 seed with Rhode Island and SLU in front of them. Charlotte is currently in the third slot, but travel to St. Louis for a matchup with the Billikens on Saturday.

The fact that the Hawks are even in line to earn a place in the conference tournament is remarkable considering they've been outscored 44-14 by opponents in their 16 games. Aside from the loss to the Billikens, they've allowed at least four goals in five other games including a 6-0 loss to Furman to open the season.

SJU plays its home games on artificial turf, prompting UMass coach Sam Koch to dub the match a "game of ping-pong" when discussing the match earlier this week.

The surface increases the overall speed of the game and makes it difficult for players accustomed to natural grass to maintain possession of the ball and move it precisely.

UMass and SJU played to a scoreless tie in last season's game. At that time, however, the Minutemen struggled to consistently create anything resembling a scoring chance, let alone an actual goal.

UMass continues search

BY LEAH THORNTON
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts is in the process of conducting a national search to select a permanent chancellor.

On Aug. 15, 2007, the University announced the formation of a broadly-constituted search committee to be chaired by Student Trustee Jennifer Braceras, who described the committee's goal as "a commitment to finding a first-rate leader for a first-rate university" and its commitment to a "thorough and open-search process."

The search committee is holding a number of "outreach meetings," which provide University stakeholders with an opportunity to share their vision for future leadership and to discuss issues pertaining to the UMass. The meetings include sessions for students, faculty, staff, labor, administrators, alumni, business leaders and community representatives. By the end of the process, there will have been about 21 outreach meetings in total.

This year, the search will hold a meeting in Springfield as well. Robert Connolly, the spokesperson for the search process, said, "the University has been looking to give people from the city the chance to weigh in on the process."

UMass President Jack M. Wilson said the University is seeking a "strong, passionate leader who can articulate and follow through on a vision for UMass that enables the campus to carry out its special mission by continuing to develop excellence in its educational research and service endeavors."

Connolly added, "We recognize many people in Springfield are looking to get the chance to enhance their relationship with the University, and this is a very natural and appropriate time to get more involved."

Connolly explained that the governor has also been pretty clear about wanting more of a bond with the University.

"I can't speak for all of Springfield," Connolly said, "but if you take a look at the UMass system as a whole, the medical school, for instance, is pretty influential all across Western Massachusetts. So the question really isn't can UMass Amherst be more involved with Springfield, but rather, what can Springfield do more of? And what can the University do more of in terms of establishing a more direct and beneficial relationship with it?"

GSS claims BOT violated policies

Students will strike Thurs.

BY ANNA DOLIANITIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Members of the Graduate Student Senate [GSS] and Student Government Association [SGA] allege that the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees [BOT] violated its own policies in failing to consider GSS' nomination for the vacancy on the search committee for the Amherst campus' new chancellor.

"The issue is simply that graduate students have been refused representation on the search committee for the chancellor," said GSS president Jeff Napolitano, whose nomination of himself to the traditionally-reserved graduate student position on the search board was rejected.

The GSS nominated Napolitano to serve as the nomination for graduate representation on the search committee, but the BOT refused to consider the recommendation, according to Napolitano.

"President Wilson promised me and Ruth Thompson that the policy would be followed and that GSS was supposed to submit a recommendation for the search committee," said Napolitano. "I nominated myself, the SGA nominated Ruth. Ruth was accepted, and I was not."

Napolitano contacted President Wilson's office and was informed that the GSS recommendation was not considered because they only provided one name for the Trustees to consider, rather than several options. "Ruth was the only one nominated from the SGA," said Napolitano.

"The Board of Trustees have been violating their own rules, specifically the Wellman Document," said Napolitano.

The Wellman Document is a policy of the BOT which advocates shared governance on the campus and specifies that, "on the Amherst campus, the deliberative bodies are the Faculty Senate, the Student Government Association and the Graduate Student Senate," according to Board of Trustees "Shared Governance: Campus Decision Making in the 21st Century" summary of remarks presented in April 2006.

"The Wellman Document also provides that formal recommendations of campus governing bodies will become policy unless disapproved by the Chancellor, President or Board of Trustees within specified time periods," the summary also state.

"Our position is that the Graduate Student Center has the right to offer advice on this matter, but that ultimately, the Board of Trustees has the authority to compose the search committee in the manner that it deems appropriate," said President Wilson's spokesperson, Robert Connelly.

Connelly points to Section I(A) of the Wellman Document, which states, "The Board of Trustees has all authority, responsibility, rights, privileges, powers and duties of organization and government of the University of Massachusetts as provided in Chapter 75 of the General Laws of the Commonwealth."

Student Trustee Ruth Thompson, whose nomination to the search committee was accepted, addresses the BOT's action as disrespectful of the student body.

"It's messed up in the way that because they aren't following the Wellman Document,

Sophomore winger Will Ortiz and freshman defender Doug Kublin celebrate Ortiz' game-winning goal in the third period of UMass's 5-3 victory over Boston University on Friday. The Minutemen played to a 3-3 tie one night later against UMass Lowell.

BOSTON — Senior P.J. Fenton hasn't really found his scoring touch to this point in 2007-08. And despite the fact that his first goal of the season was an empty-netter, it didn't diminish a thing.

Fenton scored the fifth goal in the No. 14 Massachusetts hockey team's 5-3 win over Boston University on Friday. The tally sealed UMass's first win at BU since Jan. 7, 2006, and earned the Minutemen their second consecutive Hockey East win.

The Minutemen (4-2-3, 2-1-2 Hockey East) played their second of two weekend road games against UMass Lowell on Saturday. The teams played to their second tie of the season, this time, 3-3. Freshman forward James Marcou tied the game at 9:17 of the third period.

"To be a good team in this league, you need help from everyone, seniors on down. And right now, I think we're doing that," junior Cory Quirk said. "[The tie] obviously isn't the result that we want, but a point is a point."

Sophomore winger Will Ortiz scored the first goal of the game for the Minutemen, tying the game at 1-1. But his most important goal of the weekend came at 13:14 of the third period on Friday night.

With the score tied at 3-3, sophomore defenseman Justin Braun stood at the point just outside of the high slot. He paused and waited for a lane to clear as his teammates streaked through the zone, pulling defenders with them. He fired on net, but the puck hacked off Nick Bonino's skate to the right faceoff circle.

UM faculty make sport educator list

BY KATHERINE NEUBERT
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

It is no surprise that the University of Massachusetts should be delighted that four faculty members are on the list of the Top 100 Most Influential Sport Educators.

The four professors include the head of the Sport Management Program, Pat Griffin, emeritus professor Harold VanderZwaag, Sport Management professor Glenn Wong and lecturer Laurie Priest.

"I am pleased and honored to be selected as one of the "Top 100 Most Influential Sport Educators," said Wong. "It is a wonderful recognition from an organization, The Institute for International Sport, which is well respected. I appreciate the acknowledgement very much."

Executive director of the Institute for International Sport, Dan Doyle, had the institute get on board with the selection of two categories of distinguished sports educators, The 100 Most Influential Sports Educators in America, and The Fifteen Most Influential Sports Education "Teams" in America. This would become a three year project, potentially being administered for his forthcoming book, The Encyclopedia of Sport Parenting.

"I believe that sport is one of the most effective venues to teach successful life skills to young people," said Laurie Priest, adjunct lecturer in the Sport Management Program at UMass and current chair of Physical Education and athletics director at Mount Holyoke College. "I provide young athletes the opportunity to develop leadership skills in a setting that tests them in many ways that the classroom experience cannot."

For most of these professors, sports education has been their life's work – and a passion that helped and influenced many of their students.

"One of the most important things [Pat] did was to give me, at age 20, an approachable, strong, adult mentor to go to when I needed help," said Reeny Groden, class of '77, about her then swim coach, Pat Griffin.

Author H.G. "Buzz" Bissinger is scheduled to speak on campus this Wednesday on "The Art of Nonfiction Storytelling" as part of the Journalism Lecture series.

Bissinger to talk on campus

BY ADRIENNE BENN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Pulitzer Prize-winning author H.G. "Buzz" Bissinger will speak on The Art of Nonfiction Storytelling this Wednesday as part of the Journalism Program's Lecture Series on Broadcast and Media.

The lecture will be held in the Cape Cod Lounge at the Student Union from 7:30-10 p.m. with pizza and a pre-lecture book signing reception at 6:15 p.m.

Many know Bissinger for his accurate portrayal of Odessa, Texas in the book "Friday Night Lights." However, some know him as the Pulitzer Prize-winning reporter from Philadelphia.

"To students in the journalism department, Buzz is a rock star and role model," said journalism professor Madeleine Blais.

Bissinger has received the National Headliners Award, the Livingston Award and the American Bar Association Silver Gavel Award. He was honored with the Neiman fellowship at Harvard University.

After graduating from the University of Pennsylvania in 1976, Bissinger made a name for himself while working for The Philadelphia Inquirer. Along with Daniel Biddle and Fredric N. Tulsky, he received the 1987 Pulitzer Prize for Investigative Reporting for their stories on corruption in the Philadelphia court system. Their work launched a state and federal investigation on corruption.

To the residents of Odessa, Texas, he is the man who put the spotlight on their town. In 1988, he uprooted his family and moved to Texas to witness

Students weigh in on sexual abuse

Campus abuse rarely an issue

By Eden Unver and Cara Grannemann
Collegian Staff

Sexual abuse is a frequent topic of discussion, but when it happens in the classroom, voices are often silenced.

According to a Daily Collegian article, one in four women and one in seven men will be sexually assaulted in his or her lifetime. Most cases of sexual abuse are not reported, but in this past week alone, two highly publicized cases of school-related sexual abuse have been brought to the nation's attention.

According to a CNN.com article, at Oprah Winfrey's South African leadership academy, dorm matron Tiny Virginia Makopo was arrested on 13 counts of abusing and assaulting students at the school. The specific charges include assault, indecent assault and crimen injuria. South Africa defines indecent assault as touching private parts of a person without consent.

Also in the last week, sixth-grade math teacher Kelsey Peterson and her 13 year-old student, Fernando Rodriguez, fled to Mexico to continue their sexual relationship. Peterson is now being charged in Nebraska with kidnapping, felony child abuse and contribution to the delinquency of a minor. She is also facing federal charges of fleeing the state with Rodriguez.

Since many college students are of adult age, the concept of a consensual student-teacher relationship comes into play.

According to University of Massachusetts freshman Ines Mejia, "It's not professional; it would be kind of strange."

Freshman Tram Tran agreed, saying, "I wouldn't expect that in a college environment. It brings awkwardness to the classroom. I think it would make every student uncomfortable."

Though a college student-teacher relationship may be considered "consensual" by legal standards, the teacher or teacher's assistant may hold a power over the student in terms of grading.

"A T.A. could use his or her privilege to get what he or she wants in the relationship. It's just unfair," said Tran.

This may also affect the level of power between students in the class.

"It would be unfair to that person and the other students," said Mejia. "It might be an advantage or disadvantage, but it would be unfair."

Forum raises issues on Hispanic stereotypes

By Gisel Saillant
Collegian Staff

Last Wednesday night, the brothers of Phi Iota Alpha hosted "Night of Habichuela con dulce: Latinos today," in the Latin American Cultural Center.

"Habichuela con dulce," which is a Hispanic dessert that translates into sweet creamed beans, was served and well received by the attendants. This dessert didn't sugarcoat the issues and stereotypes that were discussed about Hispanics in the United States.

This open forum began as University of Massachusetts sophomore Hipolito Cruz gave statistics about the current situation of many Hispanics living in the U.S.

"Out of 44.3 million Hispanics in the United States today, only 12 percent have a bachelor's degree," Cruz said.

The attendees were asked to reflect on why the number of college degrees was so low among Hispanics. "I didn't know the statistics were so low; I want to go back to middle school and talk to kids," said freshman Rosalia Matos.

"A lot of gangs recruit in middle schools and are brainwashing the kids," said Thomas Ortiz, a senior.

"Parents are never there, working two jobs; that's why [children] turn to the streets," said Cruz.

Students also made connections with issues that were prominent in their community as well as with issues that affect Hispanics nationwide.

"51 percent of Hispanics will become pregnant by the time they are 19. How can we change this?" Cruz asked.

Everyone began to reflect on their community as they discussed the high pregnancy rates among Hispanics. "Little girls already want babies with their boyfriends," Ortiz said.

The notion that the U.S. government will be the teenager's "baby-daddy" was suggested by a student. Engaging with Hispanic youth and advocating higher education was a solution the forum agreed upon.

Although there can be many stereotypes geared towards Hispanics, the forum tried to shed light on the stereotypes Latin American countries have towards each other. The stereotype that Hispanics do not contribute to America's economy was shut down as "there is $222 billion in revenue generated by Hispanic-owned businesses in 2002, up 19 percent from 1997," Cruz said.

Stereotypes towards Hispanics included: "Every Spanish word ends in 'O,'"

Professor awarded Packard Fellowship

By Cara Hutchison
Collegian Correspondent

A University of Massachusetts biology professor, Magdalena Bezanilla, was awarded the Packard Fellowship Award for her research in alternative fuel options.

Bezanilla was chosen out of 100 applicants to receive $625,000 over a five-year span to continue her research in finding new ways to use plants to create energy. This marks the first win in over a decade for UMass.

The Packard Fellowship in Science and Engineering was established in 1988. It aims to fund promising and creative professors whose research anticipates profound impacts in the scientific community in the future.

According to Bezanilla, the world is running out of natural oil, therefore it is necessary to find a renewable source. Due to the abundance of hay and plants, discovering a way to create ethanol would be beneficial in the long run.

The Packard Fellowship Award is allowing Bezanilla to further her studies. By searching for plant genes that

Voter turnout slim for Noho

By Cara Hutchison
Collegian Correspondent

Voters participated in statewide, municipal elections that were held on Nov. 6, but not everyone came to the polls in Northampton.

The city's projected turnout was 35 percent, according to city clerk Wendy Mazza.

Four-term incumbent Mary Clare Higgins was victorious in earning her fifth term as mayor with 59 percent of the vote.

The two candidates Higgins beat were Democrat Roy C. Martin who earned three percent of the vote and Northampton's first write-in candidate Eugene A. Tacy with 32 percent of the vote.

A possible reasons for the low turnout could have had to do with the uncontested seats and the absence of a ballot question, according to Mazza.

"Historically there is not a big turn out for municipal elections unless there is a question pertaining to money such as a raise in taxes," Mazza said.

Many Northampton residents claimed they didn't vote due to being busy with work, not caring about the contestants' political agendas or not being registered to vote.

Ed Becdach, owner of Casa Del Sol in Northampton, said he didn't vote because he isn't registered.

"People are content with the present mayor and are expecting for her to win again," Becdach said. "The other contestants are not as qualified."

Mary Clare Higgins has been Northampton's mayor since 2000. Her goals for her next term include managing the budget, improving state aid for citizens, and continuing her efforts towards the redevelopment of Northampton's Cooley Dickenson hospital. She won without raising additional funds for her campaign.

Roy C. Martin has run unsuccessfully six times in the past. His main goal was to give voters a choice and aimed to create more affordable housing and expanding the city's landfill.

Write-in candidate Eugene A. Tacy raised the most money for his campaign. He said he wanted to make difference in Northampton with an agenda focusing on alternative energy and improvement in education.

GSS demands more student representation

what they're saying is that they don't respect us enough to respect the Wellman Document," she said.

Upon being told that his nomination was rejected as a result of the GSS' failure to submit multiple names, Napolitano offered to submit more names for consideration.

"I'd submit 10 names if they wanted," he said. Napolitano never received a response from President Wilson's office.

"One name, three names, 10 names ... ultimately, this is an advisory function, and the chairman of the Board and Board of Trustees have the authority to construct the committee," said Connelly.

The BOT selected doctoral student Edward Cutting to the Graduate position, eliciting dissent from both Napolitano and Thompson.

"The chair of the search committee, Jennifer Braceras told me that Chair [Stephen] Tocco had in mind another graduate student and seemed to have him in mind for a long time before that," said Napolitano.

"From what I understood from faculty, Tocco said that the search committee had already decided, and called it a moot point," said Napolitano.

Tocco, Chairman of the BOT, was asked through e-mail if there was a possibility that the GSS would be given another opportunity to submit several recommendations, but he did not respond by press time.

Thompson addressed the minimal student representation on the search committee. "Out of 20 plus people on their search committee, not only are there two students, but one student sitting on the committee wasn't even recommended by the GSS, who has elected officers," she said.

Thompson notes that in addition to the lack of a graduate student member on the search committee, there also isn't any representation from student activities. "That's the most important part, besides academics, but it all goes together. There is nobody from the Center for Student Development," she said.

Connelly maintains the BOT and administration's belief that it has compiled a committee that is "diverse and representative."

"While I understand there might be disappointments, I think it's wrong as characterizing this as having some violation of the rules and procedures," said Connelly.

"It's personal not in that they dislike me, but in that they know what my point of view is. My point of view is that the Board of Trustees has a lot of problems, that I have concrete ideas about who our next chancellor should be, and they know that I'm not simply going to go along with what they determine," said Napolitano. "They know I'm not going to be a passive, silent voice on the committee."

A legal assistant to the GSS has determined that the document is legally binding, stating that the BOT has to go through the GSS to obtain recommendations for the search committee position; however, the BOT does not have to accept the recommendation, according to Thompson. "What we're struggling with is that it isn't clear enough," she said.

"We can't sue them because we can't use student fee money on suing the University, and we just don't have enough money personally to sue the Board of Trustees," said Napolitano.

"The Board of Trustees has the ultimate say on matters such as the creation of chancellor search committees," said Connelly. "That certainly is the position of our general counsel and the position of legal experts who have studied this question."

Graduate students are adding the lack of graduate student representation on the search committee to their list of issues prompting the student strike to be held this Thursday and Friday.

The other demands of the students striking include removing police officers from dorms, not increasing student fees, and reinstating diversity programs.

"The strike is an indication that we're fed up with it and we're tired of being ignored and it if it takes shutting down the University for two days in order for the administration and the Board of Trustees to take us seriously, then so be it," said Napolitano. "Even with just a promise, the strike could be avoided."

There are approximately 5,700 graduate students enrolled at the Amherst campus, and they teach the majority of the University's classes, as well as conduct a significant portion of UMass' research, according to a statement released by the GSS.

"It's making the administration and Trustees accountable for what we already had in the Wellman Document," said Thompson.

Connelly stressed the importance of keeping sight of the committee's goal. "The process which is ultimately the most important issue is for the search committee to identify three or more finalists, and ultimately the president makes the appointment and the Board of Trustees has the final say in naming the chancellor of the University," he said.

"The next chancellor should be someone who actually meets with students, who actually takes the students seriously, who is accountable to the students and who is accountable to all of the constituency of the University – students, faculty and staff," said Napolitano.

The search committee hopes to supply President Wilson three or four recommendations by the spring of 2008 and to have a new chancellor in place at the beginning of the 2008-2009 academic year, according to Connelly.

"After [former UMass chancellor] Lombardi left, Wilson promised a new age of student and administration cooperation and administrative friendliness and following of the Trustee policy, and right off the hat the first thing he did was not do that," said Napolitano. "We just want the Board of Trustees to start following their own rules, and we'd like the University in general to become more transparent."

Anna Dollanitis can be reached at adollanitis1@yahoo.com

Members of the GSS will join other students participating in Thursday and Friday's student strike against the lack of student representation on the UMass search committee, among other issues.

"During my sophomore year, I was having a hard time deciding about majors. She referred me to a colleague in academic counseling who helped me tremendously. I changed majors, stayed on track, and this dramatically affected my experience at UMass – and my career."

While Griffin is retired, she continues to talk in the Social Justice Education Program in the School of Education, and also to high school teachers, parents, coaches and athletic directors about making athletics a place of equality for everyone.

Griffin currently helps speak with athletes and coaches about the importance of making the sports world a better place for gay and lesbian athletes.

"Sports have been a life-long passion," said Wong. "It is hard to understand today how small the sports industry was when I first became interested in this field in the late 1970s. There was only one sport law course offered in the U.S. at Boston College Law School. The sports law course I offered at the University of Massachusetts in 1979 was the first taught in a sport management program."

Wong specializes in the law and business of sports, arbitration and college athletics. A few of his many positions at UMass would include his current position as professor of sport law in the Sport Management Department in the Isenberg School of Management and has been department head of the Sport Management Program. He has also authored and co-authored many books, one of which he will finish this spring, "The Essentials of Sports Law."

Laurie Priest specializes in gender equity and addressing homophobia in sports. While having published many articles, she frequently serves as a presenter at conferences. She has been given awards such as the Mabel Lee Award from the American Alliance for Health, Physical Education, Recreation and Dance and the Massachusetts Association for Intercollegiate Athletics for Women Merit Award for outstanding leadership in women's athletics.

Priest has also been inducted into the Northeast New Agenda Hall of Fame, and the Marymount University Athletic Hall of Fame.

the impact of high school football on small-town life. "Friday Night Lights" was published in 1990, selling close to 800,000 copies as the New York Times bestseller for 15 weeks. His book was also the basis for the 2004 movie "Friday Night Lights" starring Billy Bob Thornton and Jay Hernandez, and the TV series airing on Friday nights at 9 p.m. on NBC.

He returned to Philadelphia in 1992 and spent five and a half years reporting and writing "A Prayer for the City," the epic story of Philadelphia during Mayor Edward G. Rendell's first term in office.

Bissinger then began contributing to Vanity Fair in the late 1990s. In 1998, he wrote "Shattered Glass" about journalist Stephan Glass, who was found fabricating articles for The New Republic. Bissinger's story was turned into the 2003 movie "Shattered Glass," starring Hayden Christensen and Rosario Dawson.

He also wrote "Gone Like the Wind," the dramatic tale of almost Triple Crown winner, Barbaro. And, in March 2005, Bissinger's work "Three Nights in August" was published, capturing the beauty of major league baseball from the perspective of St. Louis Cardinal's manager Tony La Russa.

increase biomass production and favorable cell wall contents, she can help to provide plants that will serve as feedstock for renewable fuels, such as ethanol. Searching for the genes in moss, a simple model plant with genes similar to those in seed plant, can save both time and space.

Moss is a prime candidate for this study because it is "easily manipulated." It also grows at a rapid rate, in about one week, and requires limited space for storage, said Bezanilla.

Bezanilla hopes to translate what happens in the moss into plants that grow in the field. This small scale research may help provide insights and guidance for production of plants in the field.

In order to produce ethanol on a large scale, Bezanilla will work with the Physcomitrella patens, the plant gene functions in the moss. Using her research, she will identify the genes that will enhance the biomass, thus providing an understanding of what causes plant growth.

Om Parkash, assistant professor of plant, insect and soil sciences at UMass, will work with Bezanilla. Parkash has created a genetically modified crambe. His work will help understand the effects of other genes on biomass and cellulose productions. The genes that work to enhance biomass in the crambe will help to find an alternative source of energy using the cellulose the crambe provides.

Bezanilla has been working on this model organism since she arrived at UMass two years ago, though she has been doing research on this plant since 2000 as part of her post-doctoral research.

She plans to continue her studies on what genes make plants grow faster, using the five-year funding provided by the Packard Fellowship Award. Bezanilla explains that no one really knows how this process works, therefore an unbiased view can provide useful insight.

Bezanilla was nominated by UMass last spring and applied for the funding in April; she received news of her win in mid-September. With the amount of qualified applicants who competed for the award, Bezanilla said she was "completely shocked, I had no idea they would like the proposal."

Bezanilla attended Johns Hopkins University where she earned her doctorate in biochemistry and cellular and molecular biology. In addition, she received her bachelor's degree in physics from the University of California at Santa Barbara.

Many assaults never reported

According to junior Joe Polin, it is "probably not the best situation because they could just give [the student] an A."

When power in a relationship becomes overwhelming, it can often turn abusive. According to a 2006 Daily Collegian article, Ilana Gerjuoy of the Everywoman's Center said, "A lot of sexual assault that happens on campus is part of a relationship."

The article also states that "Some 81 percent of on-campus and 84 percent of off-campus sexual assaults are never reported to police, according to a Children Now/Kaiser Permanente poll."

UMass Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor said that the number of reported forcible sex offenses sounded low to her, asking, "Does anyone really think we only had 36 rapes on this campus?"

The Everywoman's Center and UMass Mental Health Services could not be reached for comment.

Latin Americans deal with common stereotypes of culture said Cory Smith, a sophomore. Another student commented on the stereotype of Hispanics as loud and rowdy people.

Since all Latin American countries are placed under the umbrella name "Hispanics," it may lead Americans to think that all these countries are homogeneous. Since these countries differ in culture and customs, stereotypes toward one another do exist.

"Dominicans can't play any other sport than baseball," said Adam Ramirez, a junior, in an example.

The group also spoke of the competition said to exist between the Dominican Republic and Puerto Rico, where Puerto Ricans have a certain animosity towards Dominicans who live on the island. The student expressed how he was in the middle, since some of his friends are Dominican.

Since there aren't that many Hispanics on campus, a Salvadorian student felt people that do not know much about his culture would assume that his behavior constitutes the whole country of El Salvador.

"The main reason we can't come together as Latinos is because of pride; we all want to be our own people," said senior Pete Rojas. "We need to realize that we've got to be one community."

The forum agreed that while all Hispanics must cherish their distinct culture, they can flourish as a community.

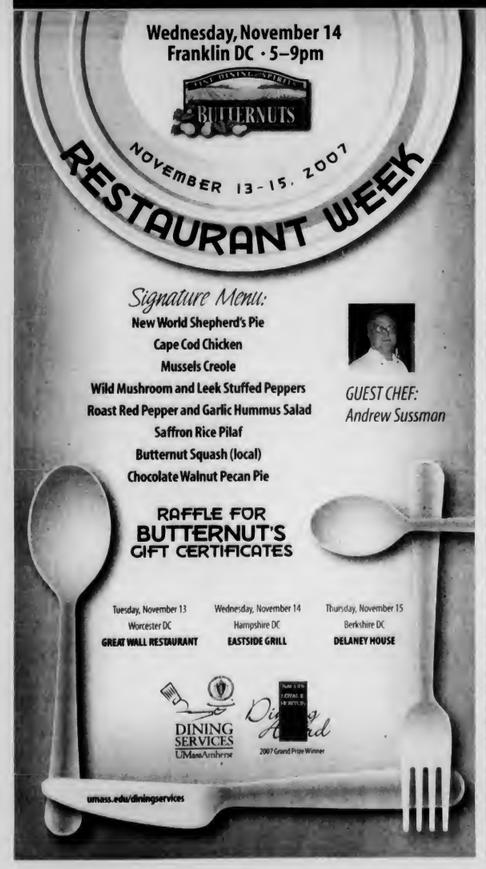
Theory released on dinosaur extinction

By Charles Q. Choi
Associated Press

Instead of being driven to extinction by death from above, dinosaurs might have ultimately been doomed by death from below in the form of monumental volcanic eruptions.

The suggestion is based on new research that is part of a growing body of evidence indicating a space rock alone did not wipe out the giant reptiles.

The age of dinosaurs ended roughly 65 million years ago with the Cretaceous-Tertiary extinction event, which killed off all dinosaurs save those that became birds, as well as roughly half of all species on the planet, including pterosaurs. The prime suspect in this ancient murder mystery is an asteroid or comet impact, which left a vast crater at Chicxulub on the coast of Mexico.



Another leading culprit is a series of colossal volcanic eruptions that occurred between 63 million to 67 million years ago. These created the gigantic Deccan Traps lava beds in India, whose original extent may have covered as much as 580,000 square miles [1.5 million square kilometers], or more than twice the area of Texas.

Arguments over which disaster killed the dinosaurs often revolve around when each happened and whether extinctions followed. Previous work had only narrowed the timing of the Deccan eruptions to within 300,000 to 500,000 years of the extinction event.

Now research suggests the mass extinction happened at or just after the biggest phase of the Deccan eruptions, which spewed 80 percent of the lava found at the Deccan Traps.

"It's the first time we can directly link the main phase of the Deccan Traps to the mass extinction," said Princeton University paleontologist Gerta Keller.

Worse than roaming fees

John Gruenenfelder

"Did you know the NSA has a friends and family plan?" so says the musical troupe, the Capitol Steps. And they're not the only ones. Right now, there are 38 outstanding lawsuits against the big telephone companies alleging complicity in the government's warrantless domestic spying. The big debate last week in Congress was over whether these companies should be granted immunity for any possible crimes because they were doing what the government asked of them.

Last Wednesday, Mark Klein, a retired AT&T technician, was on Capitol Hill to testify before Congress and to urge them not to grant the telecoms immunity. While working for AT&T in San Francisco, he was tasked with installing and maintaining optical splitter devices, which copied all Internet and phone traffic into room 641A at the AT&T building. This was a secret room and only management level people with NSA clearance were allowed in.

Klein was not allowed in the NSA room, but through knowledge of the equipment and schematics he was given to do his job he was able to gain an idea of what occurred in the room. By talking with other employees, he was also able to learn that there are 15 to 20 of these rooms throughout the U.S. And this is just AT&T. It's not a big leap to imagine the other big telecoms having similar facilities.

Innocence or guilt is for the courts to decide, but immunity should most certainly not be given to companies like AT&T, Verizon and Sprint. If this happens it will send some very bad signals to these and other corporations. Anytime the government comes along with a harebrained scheme, the promise of immunity makes it much less likely that these companies will question the request.

Because this entire program is (or was) secret, there are few details about what the NSA and the telecoms are actually doing. The president has offered vague reassurances that only foreign communication is being monitored, but since 2005 when this story first broke, that has become demonstrably false.

Without details it is impossible to know what, if any, debate took place within these companies when the spying plan was first introduced. Back in the 1990s when the Communications Assistance Law Enforcement Act [CALEA] was passed, the telecoms made a lot of noise about implementing it. CALEA requires that these companies make available the means for law enforcement agencies to perform things like wire taps in an age where you can't actually "tap" wires anymore. And this was with warrants, too.

Immunity should most certainly not be given to companies such as AT&T, Verizon and Sprint.

If CALEA was such an annoyance to the telecoms, why no fight over the NSA's spying? For one thing, CALEA was entirely in the open and actively debated. The NSA's plan is, well, secret and out of the public eye. The legal punishments for leaking such secrets are quite unpleasant so any executives who had reservations wouldn't have been able to discuss them openly anyway.

Still, such a massive program would need complicity. If the government had gone to these companies and forced them to do this, you can be sure that they would have fought back in some way. It is also likely that the NSA paid for the equipment and installation. No corporate paper trail that way and fewer complaints from the company about spending their own money.

Even with assurances that what they would be engaging in is legal, shouldn't the executives be concerned with the bottom line? If it should become public [as it has], a secret agreement of legality doesn't mean a whole lot. Plus, your customers will be none to happy to know that you're actively helping the government to spy on everyone and everything. Potential lawsuits mean potential damages.

Of course, if all the big telecoms are doing it, what are your customers going to do? Start their own global communications giant that doesn't kowtow to the government? Fortunately, we've got a court system to resolve issues like this.

It's difficult to guess how this will play out. Congress delayed a vote last week on the issue until this week. Meanwhile, the House has a bill without immunity and the Senate is debating two bills, one with immunity and one without.

As Senator Feingold pointed out in a letter to the New York Times last week, telecoms are already given immunity under the law provided they are given a valid court order. Had this whole effort been done through established (and legal) means, there wouldn't be any debate right now.

The Democrat-controlled Congress appears none too happy with the state of affairs. For two years, they've been looking for a way to fight the administration on the domestic spying issue. This might not be the best way to do that, but at least something will get done. And the upside is that in the future the telecoms will, hopefully, be more hesitant in helping to spy on their own country.

Discrimination in education

Greg Collins

Should race be a factor in determining where students go to school? According to a recent Boston Globe report, attorneys for the Massachusetts Department of Education are prepared to defend the legality of the statewide Metco program in light of allegations that it is unconstitutional due to racially-biased admissions practices.

Regardless of the outcome of the court case, Metco deserves to be criticized for promoting discriminatory admissions standards. In a larger sense, the logic behind state-sponsored racially-mixed classrooms should be scrutinized in light of a glaring fact – there has been little evidence proving that racially-diverse schools foster better educational opportunities or environments than more homogeneous ones.

Few will question the first of Metco's noble intentions, which, according to the Department of Education website, is to expand educational opportunity. As a voluntary initiative, inner-city parents have the opportunity to send their kids to suburban public schools considered to have better educational systems than those in Boston and Springfield. The program enrolls over 3,000 participants in 38 school districts. The long waiting lists for Metco signify the program's popularity and reflect the commitment of parents to subject their children to high academic standards.

Yet Metco's second intention, to reduce racial imbalance, produces the common complaint that the program prefers to enroll black students over non-black students, regardless of their socio-economic backgrounds. The Department of Education website substantiates this criticism by identifying race as one of the key factors considered by Metco when deciding which students to admit.

Factoring race in the admissions process does a disservice to other candidates who are non-black yet who still may fall within a socio-economic bracket which could otherwise qualify them for the program. For instance, the Boston Globe story reported how a child of a white Dorchester resident named John Anderson was denied admission into Metco. By supporting racially-biased admissions criteria, state officials deny educational opportunities to non-blacks merely because educators do not favor the applicant's skin color.

What if we applied similar reasoning to a voluntary athletic program? Say high school athletic administrators created a system to transfer suburban basketball players to the inner city to play in more competitive leagues. If white was the preferred race used as a factor in admissions, non-white suburban athletes would not be provided the same opportunities as white participants. Doing so would hurt blacks and other non-white basketball players who were eager to improve their skills but were denied this possibility simply because of their race.

In both cases, the preference by state officials for one particular race over another engenders a result unintended by the goals of the original programs – the discriminatory restriction of educational and athletic opportunities for white or black teenagers, such as in Mr. Anderson's son's circumstance.

Virtually no publicized study has shown that racially diverse classrooms foster a better academic atmosphere.

In regards to Metco, the larger issue is that virtually no publicized study has shown that racially-diverse classrooms foster a better academic atmosphere, either empirically or psychologically, than more homogeneous ones. If empirical evidence is available, state educators should highlight the improvement of grades and reading and writing skills for students in their new school in comparison to such measurements at their previous school.

But if educators discover that participants' mathematical and literary abilities have not progressed in a systemic fashion, how can we avoid the conclusion that they have not been held up to the strict academic standards intended to be promoted by Metco? Consequently, how can we dismiss the claim that one of the original purposes of the program – to expand educational opportunity – has not been achieved?

There have been many examples in which schools with overwhelmingly white or black populations have fostered intellectually-conducive environments. Dunbar High School, a predominantly black school in Washington D.C. at the turn of the 20th century, produced many students who attended prestigious universities and later became successful professionals. They were able to acquire the necessary academic skills to do so without having white pupils in their classrooms. Contemporarily, would students from Howard University, a historically black school, improve their analytical and research skills merely by having non-black students in their classrooms? There have been no conclusive studies publicized by news outlets that prove this supposed causal relationship to be true.

It is also tenuous reasoning to say that public enforcement of racial integration directly contributes to an enhanced education in terms of psychological benefits. This thinking is predicated upon the assumption that all white and all black students think alike and come from similar backgrounds, when clearly this is not the case. More reliable indicators of a psychologically-beneficial educational environment include diversity of religion, socio-economic status, geographical background and academic interests.

Until Metco values these factors more than race, it should be considered a discriminatory program. More importantly, it should be seen as having failed to live up the goal of enhancing a child's education in a genuine manner, rather than in a way which satisfies the racial biases of state educators.

Don't tolerate intolerance

Devon Courtney

At a liberal campus like UMass, people are receptive to new ideas and hospitable to folks who see things from different perspectives.

Wow, it's really difficult to tell a lie that big with a straight face. I want to believe that statement so badly, but I can't. I've seen so much close-mindedness at UMass on a daily basis. I feel that if I defend my beliefs out loud, I'll ultimately be inviting myself to get jumped by the liberal, atheist student-body thought police.

Most of these feelings come from observations I have made near the library. There are times when Christian speakers have come to preach to whoever will listen. I distinctly remember the most recent instance, where a middle-aged blonde man set up an easel and used a mousetrap to illustrate a point about faith.

There are usually small to middle-sized groups that come to watch the speaker, who typically sets up in between the campus green and the Student Union. Once he begins shaving his thoughts on Christianity, however, people start getting nasty. Instead of thought-out questions or logical arguments, people frequently shout cruel and unjustifiably hateful things at the speaker.

Here are some of the mean and asinine things I've heard from passers-by:

"[Expletive] you! You're a moron," shouts one student, who stands barefoot and in what looks like a dress. The sad thing about these types of people is that they have no intelligent remarks, legitimate questions or valid, alternative viewpoints. They probably feel that swearing at people who are enthusiastic about their belief in God gives them purpose. In reality, it's religious discrimination.

"Do you think the church was right to persecute Galileo?" asks another student. I feel like nobody would dispute the answer to this dumb question. Obviously nobody is going to condone institutional human oppression. Besides that, it has no pertinence to the subject matter. Is the underlying point here that atheists, throughout their own history, are faultless?

"If God exists, why is there so much suffering in the world?" some other student wants to know. This is the most intelligent question I've heard posed to a Christian speaker. On the grand scale of good points, this one is the highest the UMass atheist population on campus can hope for. Still, this question reeks of cliché.

The sad conclusion I've drawn from this whole observation is that UMass is widely intolerant of Christian religious ideas.

If it were a Jew, a Muslim or a Buddhist who was talking about the reasons for his beliefs, I feel like nobody would be so bold as to be so blatantly rude and disrespectful. Instead, every time a Christian comes to speak about his faith or to hand out bibles, he gets mercilessly ridiculed by anyone and everyone.

Granted, some of the ideas these speakers bring up are far fetched. Some of them will insist that the creationist story is true, while evolution is not. Some will ascertain that homosexuality and gay marriages are sins that can be forgiven and healed. Some might even go so far as to demand that the Bible be taken literally, which is downright daffy.

I am suggesting that we shed the anarchistic mindset of middle school punk-rockers and try to argue with reason rather than volume.

Addressing these inconsistencies with religious discrimination is petty and small-minded. We are fortunate enough to go to a school where higher learning is supported and encouraged through the communication of different ideas and scholarly debate.

When we bring ourselves down to the level of swearing at and belittling people who see things differently, we're not being intelligent or scholarly. We're being borderline fascists.

The attitudes of students I see when I pass by religious speakers indicate a much larger problem in the way UMass students deal with opposing viewpoints.

This tendency isn't only manifested in the field of organized religion. Examples of this can be seen through the recent protest of Andrew Card's honorary degree. Instead of intelligently debating his points with strategic questioning or level-headed debate, people swore, interrupted and made wildly unintelligent remarks. This makes the student body at UMass look like a band of half-witted barbarians.

I am suggesting that we shed the anarchistic mindset of middle school punk-rockers and try to argue with reason rather than volume. This change would help bring the now fleeting respect and dignity back to UMass, which is taken away by rioting, rabble and things like the examples listed above.

So whenever you pass by that religious speaker who you don't agree with, think about how you phrase your next remark. Will you sacrifice your standards to give yourself attention, or will you have what it takes to recognize the privilege you have as a student of higher learning?

Chose your words carefully.

Protecting Massachusetts' park system

Dear Editor:

Our state parks and forests, like the Mount Tom State Reservation, have been getting the short end of the stick lately.

Decades of budget cuts for the Department of Conservation and Recreation [DCR], the agency that oversees our parks, has led to $1.2 billion worth of desperately needed maintenance projects going undone. This means visitor centers and other structures are often out of date or poorly maintained. Trails and roads are falling into disrepair, and our parks across Massachusetts are, in general, looking pretty shabby.

It hasn't always been that way. Massachusetts was the first state in the nation to create a system of public parks, preserving some of our most beautiful wild places like the Mount Sugarloaf State Reservation and Skinner State Park, and setting aside green spaces in cities and communities across the state. Our parks, forests and reservations improve our quality of life, support local businesses and give us a place to meet neighbors, walk dogs and spend quality time with our children.

Thanks to the wisdom and foresight of past leaders and citizens, we have inherited an amazing park system. All in all, Massachusetts has the sixth largest state park system in the nation, a remarkable feat for such a small state. This system is one of the gems of our Commonwealth. Unless things change quickly, our children will inherit a parks system that is in much worse shape than the one we grew up with. Massachusetts now ranks 48th out of the 50 states in per capita spending on parks. Given the size of our parks system, it is easy to see why our parks are in the state they are in today.

There is still time to fix our ailing parks and leave them in better shape than we found them, but we have to act quickly. As students can recognize, procrastinating only leads to stress and all-nighters come finals. DCR, struggling with a budget several sizes too small, is much like the student who puts off much of his homework, homework equal to $1.2 billion of maintenance. If we don't reinvest in our parks now, it is only a matter of time before the DCR realizes that the final exam is tomorrow, and they haven't cracked the book.

While Governor Patrick is not the cause of the problems we see in our parks, he has inherited a beautiful parks system that has been neglected for too long. On the campaign trail he promised to put an end to this neglect and restore our parks to world-class status. If he is to accomplish this, the first step is to make sure that the environmental bond includes enough money to eliminate the maintenance backlog over the next decade and get the parks back on track.

Governor Patrick has before him a huge opportunity to invest in Massachusetts' natural legacy. If he can get this right, future generations of walkers, joggers, hikers, fishermen and campers across the Commonwealth will be thankful.

Sex, love and murder

New release from the author of the 'Princess Diaries'

BY TERESA REILLY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

You may know Meg Cabot as the author of "The Princess Diaries." It was a good book when you were 14, but her new book, "Big Boned," is good now.

It takes place in a college dorm nicknamed "Dorm Death" due to the murders that have taken place there. "Big Boned" is the third, but not last, installment of the Heather Wells series, but you could probably catch on without reading the first two.

"Dorm Death's" new murder case revolves around the untimely demise of the interim hall director, Owen Veatch. Dr. Veatch was shot through the back of the head while sipping his morning coffee in his new office. The heroine, Heather Wells, is the first to discover the bloodstained room.

Wells, an ex-teen pop sensation, left the limelight and wound up as the Assistant Dormitory Director at Fischer Hall ("Dorm Death") on New York College's campus. Her luck, as described in the first two books of the series ("Size 12 Is Not Fat" and "Size 14 Is Not Fat Either") is minimal, and people in her dorm keep dropping like flies.

On top of the obvious stress that a murder can cause, the graduate students on campus have decided to strike, leaving Wells to pick up the slack. With the grad students inflating giant rats to gain attention and the police questioning her about the death of her boss, Wells should be able to turn to her new boyfriend, Tad Taco, for advice and support. Except, Wells seems pretty occupied with her landlord, Cooper Cartwright.

Cooper Cartwright is the ever-present brother of Wells' last boyfriend, boy band superstar Jordan Cartwright. Cooper, out of sympathy, let Wells move into his apartment, which just happened to be down the street from New York College.

"I think there is a little bit of my husband in Cooper," said Cabot, "Tad Taco is actually named after someone named Tod Taco. He called (after the book came out) and I looked at the caller ID and was like 'oh my God.' So, now I'm really embarrassed, and I think he thinks I have a crush on him."

"Big Boned" obtains all the characteristics of chick lit but adds in a new element of mystery. "Normally, I have the romance thing, and I just had to come up with the mystery plot," said Cabot. "Its something I've always wanted to do."

Cabot is most widely known as the author of "The Princess Diaries," the popular book series that was turned into two Disney movies. "The Princess Diaries" takes a young Mia Thermopolis through her high school years with the ever-present stress of being a teenage girl combined with the uncommon worry of learning how to run a country (Genovia). The only constant support in Mia's life is her cat, Fat Louie.

Cats often pop up in Cabot's books, a fact she just realized. "I love cats, but that's so embarrassing," said Cabot, "No, I'm not a cat person! I don't go around and wear cats on my sweatshirt. Oh my God, I just put a cat in that new book, and I'm just now realizing it."

Cabot is also one of the first authors to be proclaimed a chick-lit writer. Chick lit is a new genre that has been created to describe the book equivalent of a chick flick movie. "I don't necessarily think of the word chick as a derogatory term," said Cabot, "It doesn't bother anyone I know, but it does seem to bother some of the feminist critics."

Author Meg Cabot takes heroine Heather Wells through yet another murder mystery in her newest release "Big Boned."

Cabot is currently working on several new projects. "Allie Finkle's Rules For Girls", a middle school grade series that delves into the mind of a ten-year-old. The tenth (and final) book for "The Princess Diaries" series is due soon and her editors just asked for a fourth book in the Heather Wells series. Not to worry though, Cabot keeps a tight schedule.

"If I'm really concentrating, I can do like five to ten pages a day. So it can be like a month, usually. There will also be a lot of time when I'm supposed to be writing and I'll end up looking at gossip sites instead. It's horrible. All of a sudden, I'll be like 'what is Britney doing?' That is the worst time sucker," said Cabot.

"Big Boned" is available on Nov. 20.

Artists honor Bob Dylan in recent soundtrack release

"I'm Not There," Todd Haynes' Bob Dylan biopic, stars six actors who play different Dylan "personas." Cate Blanchett, Christian Bale, Heath Ledger, Richard Gere, Marcus Carl Franklin and Ben Whishaw depict Dylan during his various style changes at different points throughout his life.

The soundtrack is similar to the film in that respect. It is a 34-song, two-disc exploration of what happens when assorted musicians take on Dylan songs. It includes artists like Jack Johnson, Yo La Tengo, Stephen Malkmus, Mason Jennings, Sufjan Stevens, Iron & Wine, Calexico, The Hold Steady and Los Lobos, all hailing from various genres.

It seems that all the vocalists attempt to emulate the Bob Dylan voice while maintaining the style their fans expect. Karen O of The Yeah Yeah Yeahs applies her signature howling vocals in "Highway 61 Revisited" while keeping with the twang of Dylan to the point where it is hard to figure out if the vocals are male or female. Jeff Tweedy of Wilco mixes together his manner of singing with the howl found on Dylan's original recording of "Simple Twist of Fate."

Cat Power does an excellent job on "Stuck Inside of Mobile with the Memphis Blues Again." Originally on "Blonde on Blonde," Cat Power, known

mtvU puts on Woodie Awards

BY MICHELE ARMISTEAD COLLEGIAN

mtvU, the only 24-hours a day college network, is hosting its annual award show this coming Thursday, premiering on its Web site. Since its start in 2004, mtvU has been successful in giving college students nothing to complain about, as it brings students all across the country only the music they are interested in.

mtvU is a spinoff project of MTV that is dedicated to every aspect of college life – from emerging music to student life, to campus events. The channel is not only specifically geared toward college students but designed by college students as well. It reflects their eclectic lifestyles and allows them to gain access to fresh, diverse new music or watch videos from some of their favorite mainstream bands.

The award show for mtvU, the Woodies, has also been successful since its start a few years back. During its first three years, college students have established the Woodie Awards as a "crystal ball for the music of tomorrow." It has helped to heighten the careers of past winners such as Fall Out Boy (Streaming Woodie '04), the Killers (Breaking Woodie '04), Death Cab for Cutie (Best Video Woodie '05) and Plain White Ts (Breaking Woodie '06).

This year's Woodies are bigger and better than ever, with performers at the event including The Academy Is..., Rilo Kiley, Lupe Fiasco and Spank Rock. The most interesting thing about this award show is not its diverse lineup of performers or even its creative concept – but rather the unique and unusual awards that it gives. The Woodies do have the typical elements present in any award show like Woodie of the Year, Best Video Woodie and Best Performing Woodie.

However, the awards that stand out include the Viral Woodie (artist who have made the biggest splash on the World Wide Web), The Good Woodie (artist whose efforts towards social concerns affect positive changes) and probably the most important Woodie for aspiring college students in bands, the Best Music On Campus Woodie.

During an interview with some of this year's mtvU Woodie Nominees that include Travis McCoy of Gym Class Heroes (Woodie of the Year, Viral Woodie), Meg Frampton of Meg & Dia (Viral Woodie), Max Bemis of Say Anything (Best Video Woodie) and Brad Delson from Linkin Park (Good Woodie, Viral Woodie), journalists from across the country got a chance to ask the artists up for awards anything they wanted. Some of the top up-and-coming and established artists on the college music scene along with the head of mtvU spilled everything and give a look inside what is going on with their band, their tours and their albums.

John Pinette offers laughs to Northampton audience

BY RYAN MCASKILL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Salad, waiting in lines and all things "nay, nay" were just a few of the topics a full house at the Calvin Theater in Northampton enjoyed last Saturday night with comedian John Pinette.

Opening the show was another Boston native, Jay Larson. With a style reminiscent of Dane Cook, Larson warmed up the very receptive crowd.

His Boston ties were evident as his first joke was about the Red Sox. "I was in New York when they won and I loved watching the news of cars being flipped over but that's not the video I want to see. I want to see when the owner of the car comes back. 'Yeah go Sox. World Series w-w-what the hell (stands over car in disbelief) go Sox.'"

His thick Boston accent also gave away his hometown. "I'm tired of comments, but I have a wire fire way to get them back. Whenever anyone insults you just do this: throw out a random year with some kind of event. Like this (has audience member call him fat) 'what is this, the imitation of 1612,' then walk away. By the time they figure out you have no idea what you're talking about, you're gone."

Like Cook, Larson's material jumped around numerous times, hitting on subjects like being in the marching band in high school, little kids, roommates, growing up in an effeminate household and what happened after midnight.

"Everything is scary after midnight, you ever notice that? Your neighbor comes over at 9 p.m. to borrow a hose, no problem. He comes asking for a hose at 2 a.m. it's like, 'what the hell you need a hose for bro, and what's the bag of cement for?'"

Larson wrapped up and brought on headliner John Pinette.

Pinette took the stage and immediately talked about how nice Northampton is. "I walked around some today, and it's very nice here. I was in Schenectady last night. I think the rest of New York needs to sit Schenectady down and say, 'we need to tell you something, after that you can respond and leave.'"

Continuing down the travel road, Pinette talked about airlines. "I like to fly, and I know the airlines have a tough job, but I hate when they lose

A: We are in Miami currently working with [Dr.] Dre, who called up Busta Rhymes, who is going to collaborate with us as well. We have about seven or eight songs so far, but we're on tour with Fall Out Boy right now, so we have structures of more songs set up as well.
Q: Has Gym Class Heroes had the chance to take anyone under their wing like Fall Out Boy did for you guys years ago?
A: Well my (Travis's) 17-year-old cousin Tyga is the opening act for Gym Class Heroes right now, and we took them on the road so they can get the experience of touring. I wanted to instill that in Tyga, and I think he is going to be a lot more than just a hit single.

MAX BEMIS FROM SAY ANYTHING –
Q: How important has MTV and mtvU been in furthering Say Anything's fan base and spreading your music?
A: Really important. We didn't think we would be one of the bands that would have such a huge [effect], and thought we were going to be one of those bands that has one video that gets played [on MTV] and that's it. Having our video played constantly did a lot more for us than they bargained for.
Q: There are 23 guest appearances on the new album (In Defense of the Genre). What was the motive behind getting so many guest spots?
A: We felt we wanted to make a statement that the music we were surrounded by is worth while, and we thought our music should feature some of our friends.
Q: What can we expect from Say Anything in 2008?
A: A lot of touring, a side project band coming out between myself (Max) and the members of Saves the Day.

MEG FRAMPTON FROM MEG & DIA
Q: Meg & Dia are up for a Viral Woodie; do you think your music reaches people most effectively through the internet?
A: Yes, I absolutely think it does. We've been on a lot of tours so far, the bands and audiences were great, but it wasn't the output. Myspace is definitely the way to reach the most listeners. We started out personally answering fan mail [in emails and messages on Myspace.com], and it has all worked out positively for us in the end.
Q: Where did the sound for "Monster" [their hit single] come from?
A: We did a lot of experimentation with extra instruments, and it just happened to work out. We really liked the sound [of "Monster"], and our music is going to be going even more in that direction in the future.
Q: In past interviews, you've said that a lot of your influences come from books and literature. Are there any specific titles in particular?
A: Well "Monster" is written based on East of Eden by John Steinbeck and "Indiana" is based on a book by the same title by author George Sand.
Q: What can we expect from Meg & Dia in 2008?
A: We are in the process of making a new record and have already started working on it. We are finding ourselves and trying to find our sound and figure out what exactly we want to say lyrically because lyrics are very important for us. We hope to record in the summer.

BRAD DELSON FROM LINKIN PARK –
Q: Are there any more collaborations such as the one with Jay-Z coming up?
A: On studio albums, we tend to not collaborate. "Minutes to Midnight" is a collaboration of all our imaginations, but we try not to repeat ourselves. People asked if we would remix again, and the answer is probably not, but we like to stay original and unique.
Q: You guys put out three studio albums, remixes and collaborations – what did you bring to the table with the last album that made it as good as it was?
A: We didn't want to make a trilogy, and we're proud of the sound we created with "Hybrid Theory." With this, we wanted to reinvent the sound of the band. We spent a year and a half writing over 150 songs, trying everything. (Producer) Rick Ruben was a huge influence and inspired us to create something totally new and focused on experimentation.
Q: How did Linkin Park get involved with the organization you donate to?
A: We helped start Music For Relief in response to the tsunamis in South Asia. We had a more proactive component, to try to create awareness and contributions to climate change, just general awareness to natural disasters. We wanted to make an effort to help make a difference after natural disasters such as the fires in California.

STEPHEN FRIEDMAN, GENERAL MANAGER OF MTVU –
Q: With the way the lineup [of performers] is shaping up this year, did you guys intend to make it a mixture of big bands and smaller bands?
A: We always want artists that resonate with our audience in a big way. We take our cues from college radios and what [college students] listen to. We think people want a diversity of music, and not all just big names.

The 2007 mtvU Woodie Awards will be making its premiere simultaneously on its website and mtvU this Thursday, Nov. 15 at 8 p.m with an encore performance on MTV2 Nov. 18 at 12:30 a.m.

Michelle Abbasciano can be reached at mabbasci@student.umass.edu.

Meg & Dia are nominated for a Viral Woodie, which is given to the artist who has made the most impact on college campuses via the World Wide Web.

New Bob Dylan soundtrack not meant for casual fans

The movie "I'm Not There" produced a lengthy soundtrack that covers six different personas of Bob Dylan. The two disc album depicts the various musical styles Dylan has gone through in his life.

formally as Chan Marshall, keeps the Dylan-twang and adds an element of joy to the arrangement.

Marcus Carl Franklin, who acts as the "Woody" Dylan, covers "When the Ship Comes In" with a degree of child-like vocals and a stronger guitar presence than the one found on its original recording on the album "The Times They Are A-Changing."

"Tombstone Blues" is another interesting cover. Richie Havens, who is well known for his rhythmic guitar skills, uses that famed flair by applying intricate rhythms. The final result is a song with a more soulfully harmonic sound.

Stephen Malkmus, formerly of Pavement, attempts to cover "Ballad of a Thin Man." The original was found on "Highway 61 Revisited" and clocks at just under six minutes. Malkmus' cover starts with a 45-second guitar solo. The first vocal sound could be mistaken for Dylan, but once the song goes on, it is somewhat easier to collect that it is in fact Malkmus covering a well-known Dylan song.

The selection of songs is not what a casual Dylan fan might expect. Although "The Times They Are A-Changing," "Simple Twist of Faith," and the famed cover "All Along the Watchtower" are featured, some songs like "Blowin' in the Wind" and "Like a Rolling Stone" are missing. The selection is so varied that it will appeal to Dylan fans from all of the stages of his career.

The 34th song is the only song actually sung by Bob Dylan: the title track from the movie "I'm Not There." Sonic Youth also contributes a version of the title track on the first disc. Thurston Moore's lyrics complement the dark, musical mood perfectly.
